To the memory of the jungles of Southern India, their birds and animals, particularly elephant, tiger and panther, and their forest-people, Chensoos, Sholagas, Karumbas and Poojarees, I proudly and gratefully dedicate this book, in return for the twenty-five years of unadulterated joy they have given me in making and keeping their acquaintance.

Tiger actually killing a bull (taken from a machan)

Introduction

THE Man-Eating Tiger is an abnormality, for under normal circumstances, the King of the Indian Jungles is a gentle man and of noble nature. He kills only for food, never wantonly, and his prey are the wild beasts of the forest, or, where temptation offers, the village cattle that are sent to graze in the Government Reserves.

Occasionally a tigress will teach her half-grown cub, or cubs, the art of killing their prey in the way a tiger should kill by breaking the vertebrae of the neck. Under such special circumstances three or four cattle may be killed at a time, to provide practice for the youngsters, but such slaughter is never performed wantonly by a single tiger for the sheer joy of slaying. A tigress normally brings up two cubs at a time although I have personally seen four and it is said that the male limits the species by eating half the litter shortly after their birth. The tiger's skill in breaking the neck of its prey, in contrast to the method of leopards and panthers, which strangle their prey by seizing its throat and holding on, has often been debated by hunters. In fact, when attacking, the tiger rises up besides its victim, generally places a paw over its shoulder and seizes the beast by the back of the neck or throat, according to its size, pressing the head to the ground. The paw is then used as a lever to cause the victim to topple over itself, while the tiger continues to hold the head down. Thus, the weight of the animal's own body is the factor that breaks the neck rather than any twisting action by the tiger, although I am personally of the opinion that the latter does exist to a considerable extent. Because of the tiger's ability to open its jaws very widely, it is some times difficult to judge whether the prey was seized by the back of its neck or by the throat, the fang marks being so positioned that either could have happened.

The panther and leopard are for all practical purposes the same animal although even here much argument has arisen from the great contrast in size between the 'Thendu', or forest variety of panther, which kills its prey by breaking the neck after the manner of a tiger, for which it is sometimes mistaken, and the smaller variety of leopard haunting the outskirts of villages, which kills goats and dogs by strangling, and even descends to feeding on rats and domestic fowls. The panther is a much less powerful animal than the tiger, generally of a cowardly disposition, but nevertheless one of the most picturesque inhabitants of the forests of the Indian Peninsula, and of Asia and Africa.

Man-eaters of both varieties have generally been created by the interference of the human race. A tiger or panther is sometimes so incapacitated by a rifle or gunshot wound as to be rendered incapable, thereafter, of stalking and killing the wild animals of the forest or even cattle that are its usual prey. By force of circumstance, therefore, it descends to killing man, the weakest and puniest of creatures, quite incapable of defending himself when unarmed. The same incapacity may sometimes occur through accidental injury, such as a porcupine quill in the foot; and some times the habit of man-eating is passed on by a tigress to her cubs. Occasionally the taste for human flesh is acquired by a panther that has devoured corpses that have been thrown into the forest, as happens when epidemic diseases attack villages in those areas, though this is very uncommon. Equally rare are instances where none of these circumstances appears to account for the propensity.

A man-eating tiger, or panther, when it exists, is a scourge and terror to the neighborhood. The villagers are defenseless and appear to resign themselves to their fate. Victims are killed regularly, both by day and night if the killer is a tiger, and by night only if a panther, the former often repeatedly following a particular circuit over the same area. While the death roll increases, superstition and demoralization play a very considerable part in preventing the villagers from taking any concerted, planned action against their adversary. Roads are deserted, village traffic comes to a stop, forest operations, woodcutting and cattle grazing cease completely, fields are left uncultivated, and sometimes whole villages are abandoned for safer areas.

The greatest difficulty experienced in attempting to shoot such animals is the extraordinary lack of co-operation evinced by the surrounding villagers, actuated as they are by a superstitious fear of retribution by the man-eater, whom they believe will mysteriously come to learn of the part they have attempted to play against it.

A 'rogue' elephant is generally the result of the periodic disease of 'musth', from which all male elephants suffer for a period of about 90 days. An oily discharge from an orifice behind the eye is the outward evidence. They are then extremely aggressive and dangerous, but afterwards they generally regain their normal harmless composure. Some times it is the result of a particularly ambitious young elephant coming into battle with the big tuskers of a herd for the favor of a female, when he gets badly beaten up and expelled by the larger beasts. He then becomes very morose and surly, and takes his revenge on whatever he comes across again, the easiest being man.

It must not be imagined, however, that the forests of India are always stocked with man-eating tigers and leopards, or rogue elephants. Generally they do not exist, and the jungles are then safer to wander in than any busy street of a capital city, where the possibility of being run over by motor traffic at any moment is considerable.

Further, the beauties of nature, of the flowers, insects, birds and animals the glories of an Indian jungle dawn, and of the glowing red sunset, and of the silvery moon-lit night that bathes the swaying tops of feathery bamboos the mystery of the dark nights, the sky set with a myriad stars above all the peaceful solitude and sense of nearness to Nature and to God, fill the wanderer with an assurance that he has at last found a home, from which he will not willingly be torn.

I hope I may be forgiven if, in some of these stories, I have devoted considerable space to geographical and natural descriptions and conditions, and have tried to mimic, in writing, the calls of birds and beasts of the forest. I have done so deliberately, in an attempt to recapture, for the benefit of some of my readers who have been in India and have visited her glorious forests, memories of those days and of those jungles from which I am sure they are sorry to have been separated. I dread the day when that separation must come to me.

In closing, I have to record my grateful thanks to my late father, who taught me how to use a gun when I was seven; although he was not a jungle-lover himself, he delighted in shooting duck, partridge and small game. My thanks are due also to Byra, a wild Poojaree whom I discovered living in a burrow on the banks of the Chinar River in the district of Salem; more than twenty-five years ago, he taught me most of what I now know about the jungle and its fauna, and bred in me a deep love of his home in the wilds. I am grateful, too, to Ranga, my faithful old 'Shikaree', also of the Salem District, who has accompanied me on many trips, has patiently looked after me, guided me, helped me and been staunchly faithful and fearless in the face of danger; Sowree, his assistant and almost his equal in shikaring; and my old hunting friends, Dick Bird and Pat Watson, who between them have killed more tiger than any men I know, for their many tips and instructions in my early days.

The Man-Eater of Jowlagiri

THOSE who have been to the tropics and to jungle places will not need to be told of the beauties of the moonlight over hill and valley, that picks out in vivid relief the forest grasses and each leaf of the giant trees, and throws into still greater mystery the dark shadows below, where the rays of the moon cannot reach, concealing perhaps a beast of prey, a watchful deer or a lurking reptile, all individually and severally in search of food.

All appeared peaceful in the Jowlagiri Forest Range, yet there was danger everywhere, and murder was afoot. For a trio of poachers, who possessed between them two matchlocks of ancient vintage, had decided to get them selves some meat. They had cleverly constructed a hide on the sloping banks of a water hole, and had been sitting in it since sunset, intently watchful for the deer, which, sooner or later, must come to slake their thirst.

The hours wore on. The moon, at the full, had reached mid-heaven and the scene was as bright as day. Suddenly, from the thicket of evergreen saplings to their left, could be heard the sound of violently rustling leaves and deep throated grunts. What could be there? Wild-pig undoubtedly! A succulent meal, and flesh in addition that could be sold! The poachers waited, but the beasts, whatever they were, did not break cover. Becoming impatient, Muniappa, the marksman of the trio, decided to risk a shot. Raising his matchlock, he waited till a dark shadow, deeper than its surroundings, became more evident, and fired. There was a snarling roar and a lashing of bushes, followed by a series of coughing 'whoofs' and then silence.

Not pigs, but a tiger! Fearfully and silently, the three poachers beat a hasty retreat to their village, there to spend the rest of the night in anxiety as to the result of their act. But morning revealed that all was apparently well, for a male tiger just in his prime lay dead, the chance shot from the ancient musket having sped straight to his heart. So Muniappa and his friends were, for that day, the unsung and whispered heroes of the village.

But the next night produced a different story. With sunset came the urgent, angry call of a tigress seeking her dead mate. For it was the mating season, and this tigress, which had only just succeeded in finding her companion the night before, was decidedly annoyed at his unaccountable absence, which she quite rightly connected with the interference of human beings.

Night after night for a week, she continued her uneasy movements, calling by day from the depths of the forest and in darkness roaring almost at the outskirts of the village itself. Young Jack Leonard, who was keen to secure a trophy, and who had been summoned to the village by an urgent letter, arrived on the morning of the eighth day, and acquainted himself with the situation. Being told that the tiger wandered everywhere, and seeing her many pugmarks on the lonely path to the forest-bungalow, he decided to try his luck that evening, concealing himself by five o'clock behind an anthill that stood conveniently be side the path.

The minutes passed, and at 6.15 p.m., dusk was falling. Suddenly there was a faint rustle of leaves and a loose stone rolled down the bank a little to his right. Leonard strained his eyes for the first sight of the tigress, but nothing happened. The minutes passed again. And then, rapidly moving along the edge of the road towards him, and on the same side as himself, he could just discern the form of the tigress. Hastily transferring the stock of his rifle to his left shoulder, and leaning as far out from his sheltering bush as possible, so that he might see more of the animal, Leonard fired at her chest what would have been a fatal shot had it carried a little more to the right.

As it was, Leonard's bullet ploughed deeply into the right shoulder, causing the beast to roar loudly before crashing away into the jungle. Bitterly disappointed, Leonard waited till morning to follow the trail. There was abundance of blood everywhere, but due to the rocky and difficult country, interspersed with densely wooded ravines and close, impenetrable shrubbery, he failed to catch up with his quarry.

Months passed, and the scene changes to Sulekunta, a village deeper in the forest and about seven miles from Jowlagiri, where there was a little temple occasionally visited by pilgrims from the surrounding region. Three of these had finished their devotions and were returning to their home: a man, his wife and son aged sixteen. Passing under a wild tamarind tree, hardly a quarter-mile from the temple, the boy lingered to pick some of the half-ripe acid fruit. The parents heard a low growl, followed by a piercing, agonized scream, and looked back to see their son carried bodily in the jaws of a tiger, as it leapt into a nullah bordering the lonely path. The aged couple bravely turned back and shouted abuse at the marauder as best they could, only to be answered by two more shrieks from their only son, and then all was silent again.

Thereafter, death followed death over a wide area, extending from Jowlagiri in the extreme north to the cattle pen of Gundalam, thirty miles to the south; and from the borders of Mysore State, twenty miles to the west, to the main road to Denkaflikota, for about forty-five miles of its length. Some fifteen victims, including three girls, one just married, had fallen a prey to this monster, when I received an urgent summons from my friend, the Sub-Collector of Hosur, to rid the area of the scourge.

Journeying to Jowlagiri, where the Sub-Collector had told me the trouble had begun, I pieced together the facts of the story, deducing that this was no tiger but a tigress, and the one that had been robbed of her mate by the poachers and later wounded by Leonard's plucky but unfortunate shot. From Jowlagiri I tramped to Sulekunta in the hope of coming across the fresh pug marks of the marauder, but I was unlucky, as no kills had occurred at that place in recent days, and what tracks there were had been obliterated by passing herds of cattle. Moving on to Gundalam, twenty-three miles away at the southern limit of the affected area, I decided to pitch camp, since it was at this cattle-pen that the majority of kills had been reported, seven herdsmen being accounted for in the last four months.

Three fat buffalo calves had been very thoughtfully provided as bait by my friend the Sub-Collector; I proceeded to tie them out at likely spots in the hope of securing a kill The first I tethered a mile down the river bordering Gundalam at that time of the year a mere trickle of water at a point where the river was joined by a tributary named Sige Halla, down which the tigress was reported to keep her beat; the second I tied along the path to the neighboring village of Anchetty, four miles away; the remaining calf I secured close to the watershed, whence both herds men and cattle obtained their daily supply of drinking water.

Having myself attended to the securing and comfort of these three baits, I spent the next two days in tramping the forest in every direction, armed with my .405 Winchester, in the hope of picking up fresh pugmarks, or perhaps of seeing the man-eater herself.

Early in the morning of the second day, I located the footprints of the tigress in the soft sand of the Gundalam River. She had descended in the night, walked along the river past the watershed and my buffalo bait, which, as was evident by her footprints, she had stopped to look at but had not even touched, and up and across a neighboring hill on her way to Anchetty. Here the ground became too hard for further tracking. The third morning found me searching again, and I had just returned to camp, preparatory to a hot bath and early lunch, when a group of men, accompanied by the headman of Anchetty, arrived to inform me that the tigress had killed a man early that morning at a hamlet scarcely a mile south of Anchetty. Apparently, a villager, hearing restless sounds from his penned cattle, had gone out at dawn to investigate and had not returned. Thereafter his brother and son had followed to find out the cause of his absence, and at the outskirts of the cattle-pen had found the man's blanket and staff, and, indistinct in the hard earth, the claw marks of the tigress's hind-feet as she reared to attack her victim. Being too alarmed to follow, they had fled to the hamlet and thence to Anchetty, where, gathering strength in numbers and accompanied by the headman, they had hastened to find me.

Foregoing the bath and swallowing a quick lunch, we hastened to Anchetty and the hamlet. From the spot where the tigress had attacked and as was evident by the fact that no sound had been made by the unfortunate man had killed her victim, tracking became arduous and slow, owing to the hard and stony nature of the ground. In this case, the profusion of thorny bushes among the shrubbery assisted us; for, on casting around, we found shreds of the man's loincloth impaled on the thorns as the tigress carried him away. Had the circumstances not been so tragic, it was instructive to learn how the sagacious animal had endeavored to avoid such thorns and the obstruction they would have offered.

Some 300 yards away she had dropped her burden beneath a thicket at the foot of a small fig tree, probably intending to start her meal. Then she had changed her mind, or perhaps been disturbed, for she had picked her victim up again and continued her retreat towards a deep nullah that ran southwards towards the main Cauvery River, some thirty miles away. Thereafter, tracking became easier, for the tigress had changed her hold from the man's neck and throat; this had accounted for the lack of blood-spoor. Now she held him by the small of his back. Drops of blood, and smears across the leaves of bushes and thickets, now made it comparatively easy for us to follow the trail, and in another hundred yards we had found the man's loincloth, which had completely unwound itself and was hanging from a protruding sprig of 'wait-a-bit' thorn.

Continuing, we reached the nullah where, in the soft dry sand, the pugs of the tigress were clearly imprinted, with a slight drag-mark to one side, evidently caused by one of the man's feet trailing downwards as he was carried. As there was no need of a tracker, and numbers would create disturbance, apart from needless risk, I crept cautiously forward alone, after motioning to the rest to remain where they were. Progress was of necessity very slow, for I had carefully to scan the heavy undergrowth on both banks of the nullah, where the tigress might have been lurking, waiting to put an end to her pursuer. Thus I had traversed two bends in the nullah when I sighted a low out crop of rock jutting into the nullah-bed itself. Keeping as far as possible to the opposite side of the rock, I increased the stealth of my approach. Scrutiny revealed a dark object on the far side of the rock, and this duly proved to be the body of the unfortunate victim.

The tigress had already made a fair meal, having consumed about half her prey in the process, severing one leg from the thigh and one arm. Having assured myself that she was nowhere in the vicinity, I returned to the men, whom I summoned to the spot to help construct some sort of place where I might sit up and await the return of the assassin to its gruesome meal, which I was confident would be before sunset that day. A more unsuitable spot for sitting-up could hardly be imagined. There was a complete absence of trees on which a hide or machan could be constructed, and it soon became evident that there were only two possibilities. One was to sit close to the opposite bank of the nullah, from where the human victim was clearly visible. The other was to ascend the sloping outcrop of rock to a point some ten feet above the bed of the nullah, where a natural ledge was formed about four feet from its upper edge. The first plan I rejected, as being too dangerous in the case of a man-eater, and this left me with the prospect of sitting upon the Rockledge, from where I could not only view the cadaver but the whole length of the nullah up to its bend in the direction from which we had come, and for about twenty yards in the other direction, where it swung abruptly to the right.

Working silently and quickly, at a spot some distance up the nullah, whence the sound of lopping would not be heard, the men cut a few thorny branches of the same variety as grew in the immediate vicinity of the rock, so as not to cause a contrasting background. These they deftly and cunningly arranged below the ledge, so that I would not be visible in any direction from the nullah itself. Fortunately I had had the forethought to bring my blanket, water bottle and torch, although there would not be much use for the last of these during the major portion of the night, as the moon was nearing full and would rise comparatively early. By 3 p.m. I was in my place and the men left me, having been instructed to return next morning with a flask of hot tea, and sandwiches for a quick snack. The afternoon wore slowly on, the heat from the blazing sun beating directly on the exposed rock and bathing me in sweat. Looking down the nullah in both directions, all was still and nothing disturbed the rays of shimmering heat that arose from the baked earth. Absence of vultures could be accounted for by the fact that, in the position the tigress had left it beneath the sharply sloping rock, the body was hidden from the sky. About 5 p.m., a crow spotted it, and by its persistent cawing soon attracted its mate. But the two birds were too nervous of the human scent actually to begin picking the kill. Time wore on, and the sun set as a fiery ball beneath the distant rim of forest-clad hills.

The crows flapped away, one after the other, to roost in readiness on some distant tree in expectation of the morrow when, overcome by hunger, they would be more equal to braving the feared smell of human beings. The cheering call of the jungle-cock broke forth in all directions as a farewell to the dying day, and the strident 'ma-ow' of a peacock sounded from down the dry bed of the stream. I welcomed the sound, for I knew that in the whole forest no more alert watchman than a peacock could be found and that he would warn me immediately of the tigress's approach, should he see her. Now was the expected time, and with every sense intently alert, I awaited the return of the man-killer. But nothing happened, the peacock flapped heavily away and dusk rapidly followed the vanquished day.

Fortunately the early moon had already risen and her silvery sheen soon restored a little of my former range of vision. The birds of the day had gone to roost by now, and their places had been taken by the birds of the night. The persistent 'chuck-chuck-chuckoo' of nightjars resounded along the nullah, as these early harbingers of the night sought their insect prey along the cooling banks. Time passed again, and then a deathly silence fell upon the scene. Not even the chirrup of a cricket disturbed the stillness, and my friends, the nightjars, had apparently gone else where in their search for food. Glancing downwards at the human remains, it seemed that one arm reached upwards to me in supplication or called perhaps for vengeance. Fortunately, the head was turned away, so that I could not see the frightful contortion of the features, which I had noticed earlier that afternoon.

All at once, the strident belling of an alarmed sambar broke the silence and was persistently followed by a succession of similar calls from a spot I judged to be about half a mile away. These were followed by the sharp cry of spotted-deer, and echoed up the nullah by a restless brain fever bird in his weird call of 'brain-fever, brain-fever', repeated in rising crescendo. I breathed a sigh of relief and braced my nerves and muscles for final action. My friends, the night watchmen of the jungle, had faithfully accomplished their task and I knew the tigress was approaching and had been seen.

The calls then gradually died away. This meant that the tigress had passed out of the range of the callers and was now close by. I strained my eyes on the bend to the right, twenty yards down the nullah, around which, at any moment, I expected the man-eater to appear. But nothing happened. Thirty minutes passed, then forty-five, by the hands of my wristwatch, clearly visible in the moonlight. Strange, I thought; the tigress should have appeared long ago. She would not take forty-five minutes to cover half a mile.

And then a horrible feeling of imminent danger came over me. Many times before had that obscure sixth sense, which we all possess but few develop, stood me in good stead in my many wanderings in the forests of India and Burma, and on the African veldt. I had not the slightest doubt that somehow, in spite of all my precautions, complete screening and absolute stillness, the tigress had discovered my presence and was at that moment, probably stalking me, preparatory to a final spring.

In moments of danger, we who know the jungle think quickly. It is not braveness that goads the mind to such quick thinking, for I confess that at this moment I was very afraid and could feel beads of cold sweat trickling down my face. I knew the tigress could not be on the nullah itself, or below me, or I would have seen her long before. She might have been on the opposite bank, hidden in the dense under growth and watching my position, but somehow I felt that her presence there would not account for the acutely growing sense of danger that increasingly beset me. She could only be above and behind me. Suddenly it was borne home to me that the four-foot wall of rock behind me prevented me from looking backwards unless I raised myself to a half-crouching, half-kneeling position, which would make a steady shot almost impossible, apart from completely giving away my position to any watcher on the opposite bank, or on the nullah-bed itself. Momentarily, I cursed myself for this lack of forethought, which now threatened to become my undoing. As I hesitated for another second, a thin trickle of sand slid down from above, probably dislodged by the killer, now undoubtedly very close above me, and gathering herself for a final spring. I hesitated no longer; I forced my numbed legs to raise me to a half-crouching position, simultaneously sluing the cocked .405 around, till the end of the muzzle was in line with my face. Then I raised myself a fraction higher, till both my eyes and the muzzle, came above the ledge. A fearful sight revealed itself. There was the tigress, hardly eight feet away and extended on her belly, in the act of creeping down the sloping rock towards me. As our eyes met in surprise, we acted simultaneously, the tigress to spring with a nerve-shattering roar, while I ducked down again, at the same moment contracting my trigger finger.

The heavy blast of the rifle, level with and only a few inches from my ears, mingled with that demoniacal roar to create a sound which often till this day haunts me in my dreams and causes me to awaken, shivering with fear. The brute had not anticipated the presence of the ledge behind which I sheltered, while the blast and blinding flash of the rifle full in her face evidently disconcerted her, deflecting her aim and deviating her purpose from slaughter to escape. She leapt right over my head, and in passing her hind foot caught the muzzle of the rifle a raking blow, so that it was torn from my grasp and went slithering, butt first, down the sloping rock, to fall dully on the soft sand below, where it lay beside the half-eaten corpse. Quicker than the rifle, the tigress herself reached the nullah-bed, and in two bounds and another coughing roar was lost to view in the thickets of the opposite bank. Shocked and hardly aware of what had happened, I realized I was unarmed and helpless, and that should the tigress return on her tracks, there was just nothing I could do. At the same time, to descend after the rifle would undoubtedly single me out for attack, if the animal were lying wounded in the bushes of the opposite bank. But anything seemed preferable to indecision and helplessness, and I dived down the slope to retrieve the rifle and scramble back, expecting at each second to hear the awful roar of the attacking killer. But nothing happened, and in less time than it takes to tell I was back at the ledge.

A quick examination revealed that no harm had come to the weapon in its fall, the stock having absorbed the shock. Replacing the spent cartridge, I fell to wondering whether I had hit the tigress at all, or if I had missed her at ridiculously close range. Then I noticed something black and white on the ledge behind me and barely two feet away. Picking it up, I found it was the major portion of the tigress' ear, which had been torn off by my bullet at that close range. It was still warm to my touch, and being mostly of skin and hair, hardly bled along its torn edge.

To say that I was disappointed and chagrined could not describe one-tenth of my emotions. I had failed to kill the man-eater at a point-blank range, failed even to wound her in the true sense. The tearing-off of her ear would hardly inconvenience her, beyond causing slight local pain for a few days. On the other hand, my foolish miss would teach her never to return to a kill the second time. This would make her all the more cunning, all the more dangerous and all the more destructive, because now she would have to eat when she killed, and then kill again when she felt hungry, increasing her killings beyond what would have been normally necessary. She might even alter her sphere of activities and remove herself to some other part of the country, where the people would not be aware of the arrival of a man-eater and so fall still easier prey. I cursed myself throughout that night, hoping against hope that the tigress might show up again, but all to no purpose. Morning, and the return of my men, found me chilled to the marrow, disconsolate and disappointed beyond expression. The hot tea and sandwiches they brought, after my long fast since the previous forenoon, followed by a pipeful of strong tobacco, somewhat restored my spirits and caused me to take a slightly less critical view of the situation which, after all, might have been far worse. Had it not been for my sixth sense, I would undoubtedly have been lying a partially devoured corpse beside that of the previous day's unfortunate victim. I had something to be really thankful for.

Approaching the spot into which the tigress had leapt, we cast about for blood-spoor, but, as I had expected, found none, beyond a very occasional smear from the damaged ear against the leaves of bushes, as the tigress had retreated from what had turned out for her a very surprising situation. Even these we eventually lost some distance away, so that it was an unhappy party of persons that returned to the hamlet, Anchetty, and eventually Gundalam, to report complete failure.

I remained at Gundalam for a further ten days, persistently tying out my buffalo baits each day, although I had little hope of success. Whole mornings and afternoons I devoted to scouring the forest in search of tracks, and nights were spent in sitting over water holes, game-trails and along the bed of the Gundalam River in the hope of the tigress showing up, but all to no avail. Parties of men went out in the daytime in all directions to secure news of further kills, but nothing had happened. Apparently, the tigress had deserted her haunts and gone off to healthier localities.

On the eleventh day, I left Gundalam, tramping to Anchetty and Denkanikota. From there I travelled to Hosur, where I told my friend the Sub-Collector of all that had happened and extracted from him a promise that he would tell me immediately of further kills, should they occur, as I now felt myself responsible for the welfare of the people of the locality. Then, leaving Hosur, I returned to my home at Bangalore.

Five months passed, during which time I received three letters from the Sub-Collector, telling of vague rumors of human tiger-kills from distant places, two being from across the Cauvery River in the Coimbatore District, one from Mysore State territory, and the fourth from a place still further away.

Then suddenly came the bad news I feared, but had hoped would not eventuate, A tiger had struck again at Gundalam, killing her eighth victim there, and the next evening had snatched, from the very door of the little temple at Sulekunta, the old priest who had attended to the place for the last forty years. The letter concluded with the request to come at once.

Such urgent invitation was unnecessary, for I had been holding myself in readiness for the worst; within two hours I was motoring to Jowlagiri. Arriving there, I was fortunate in being able to talk to one of the party of pilgrims who had almost been eyewitnesses to the death of the old priest of the temple at Sulekunta. Apparently, a party of men had been on pilgrimage and as they approached the temple itself, were horrified to hear the low growl of a tiger, which then leapt into the forest from the roots of a giant pepul tree that grew some thirty yards away. Bolting for shelter into the temple itself, they were surprised to find it tenantless, and looking out were aghast to see the body of the old priest lying within the folds of the gnarled roots of the old pepul tree that directly faced them. After some time, and very timidly, they approached in a group, to find that the old man had apparently been attacked in, or very near, the temple, and then been carried to this spot to be devoured. The tiger had already begun its meal, consuming part of the skinny chest, when it had been disturbed by the pilgrim party.

I particularly inquired as to whether my informant, or his companions, had noticed anything wrong with the tiger's ears, but obviously, they had all been too frightened to observe any defects. I hurried to Sulekunta with my party of three and arrived near dusk; I must confess that the last two miles of the journey had been very uncomfortable, traversing a valley between two steeply sloping hills that were densely clothed with bamboo. But we heard and saw nothing, beyond the sudden trumpeting of a solitary elephant, which had been inhabiting these parts for some time and had been a considerable annoyance to pilgrims, whom he apparently delighted to chase if they were in small parties. But that is another story.

There was no time to make a proper camp, so we decided to sleep in the deserted front portion of the temple itself, a proceeding which I, and very decidedly my followers, would have declined to do under normal circumstances. But nightfall and the proximity of a man-eater are apt to overcome all scruples and principles. I stood guard with the loaded rifle, while my three men frenziedly gathered brush-wood and rotting logs that lay in plenty nearby, to build a fire for our warmth and protection, for on this occasion there was no friendly moon and it would soon be dark. Under such circumstances, attempting to sit-up for the man-eater, in the hope of its passing near the temple, would have been both highly dangerous and futile. Soon we had a bright fire blazing, on the inner side of which we sat, away from the pitch-black jungle night, which could easily have sheltered the murderer, all unknown to us, within a distance of two feet. Listening intently, we occasionally heard the deep belling boom of sambar, and I could discern the harsher note of a stag, but these did not follow in persistent repetition, showing that the animals had not been unduly alarmed by any such major foe as the king of the Indian jungle. After midnight, we arranged to keep watch in twos, three hours at a time, and I elected, with one of my companions, to take first turn. The other two were soon asleep. Nothing untoward happened, however, beyond the fact that the solitary tusker, who had approached near enough to catch a sudden sight of the fire, trumpeted once again and crashed away.

A kakur, or barking-deer, uttered its sharp cry around 2 a.m., but as this was not continued, I decided it had been disturbed by a wandering leopard. Three o'clock came, I awoke the two sleeping men, and in turn fell into a dream less sleep, to awaken to the early and spirited cry of a grey jungle cock, saluting the rising sun.

Hot tea, made with water from the well nearby, and some food gave us new life and heart, after which I walked across to the giant pepul-tree and inspected the remains of the old priest. The vultures by day, and hyenas and jackals by night, had made a good job of him, for nothing remained but a few cleanly-picked bones, at the sight of which I fell to reminiscing about the old man who had tended this temple for the past 40 years, looking daily upon the same view as the one I now saw, hearing the same night-sounds of sambar, kakur and elephant as I had heard that night, and was now but a few bones, folded in the crevices of the hoary pepul-tree.

For the next hour we cast around in the hope of finding pugmarks and perhaps identifying the slayer, but although we saw a few old trails, I could not with any certainty, classify them as having been made by my tigress. By 9 a.m., we left on the long 23-mile trek to Gundalam, where we arrived just after 5 p.m. Here, upon making inquiries about the recent killing, I gleaned the first definite information about the slayer from a herdsman who had been attending to his cattle at the same watershed where I had tied my buffalo bait on my last visit. This man stated that he had had a companion with whom he had been talking, and who had then walked across to a nearby bush to answer a call of nature. He had just squatted down when, beyond the bush, the devilish head of a tiger arose, with only one ear, soon to be followed by an evil, striped body. The man had shrieked once when the fangs sank into the face and throat, and the next instant tiger and victim had disappeared into the jungle. Here at last was the information I had been dreading, but somehow wanting, to hear. So, after all, it was now confirmed that the killer was none other than my old enemy, the tigress, who had returned at last to the scene of her former depredations, and for whose return and now vastly increased cunning I was myself responsible.

Everywhere I had heard reports that no cattle or buffaloes had been killed by this beast, so I did not waste time, as on the previous occasion, in setting live baits, realizing that I had an adversary to deal with whom I could only hope to vanquish in a chance encounter, face-to-face. For the next two days, I again searched the surrounding jungle, hoping by luck to meet the killer, but with fear and dread of being attacked from behind at any moment. Pugmarks I came across in plenty, especially on the soft sands of the Gundalam River, where the familiar tracks of the Jowlagiri tigress were plainly in view, adding confirmation to the thought that by my poor shot, some five months ago, I had been responsible for several more deaths.

At midday on the third day, a party of men arrived in a lather, having covered the thirty miles from Jowlagiri to tell me of a further kill this time the watchman of the Jowlagiri Forest Bungalow who had been killed and half eaten within a hundred yards of the bungalow itself, the previous afternoon.

Hoping that the tigress might retrace her steps towards Sulekunta and Gundalam, as she was rumored never to stay in the same place for more than a day after making a human kill, I left with my men at once, augmented by the party from Jowlagiri, who, although they had practically run the thirty miles to Gundalam, preferred the return tramp of twenty-five miles to Sulekunta protected by my rifle rather than return by themselves.

Again, we reached the temple of Sulekunta as daylight was fading and, as the nights were still dark, repeated campfire procedure within the temple itself. Our party had now been increased to twelve, including myself, a number which, although it made us feel safer, was far too many for my personal comfort. This time, however, we were not to spend a peaceful night. The sambar and kakur were restless from nightfall, and at 8.30 p.m. we heard a tiger calling from a spot I judged to be half a mile away. This was repeated an hour later from quite close, and I could then easily distinguish the intonations of a tigress calling for a mate. The tigress had also seen the campfire and become aware of the proximity of humans and, obviously hoping for a meal, she twice circled the temple, her repeated mating calls being interspersed by distinctly audible grunts of anticipation. All this gave me an idea by which I might possibly succeed in keeping her in the vicinity till daylight, at which time only could I hope to accomplish anything. Twice I gave the answering call of a male tiger, and received at once the urgent summons of this imperious female. Indeed, she came to the edge of the clearing and called so loudly as almost to paralyze us all. I was careful, however, not to call while she was in the immediate vicinity, which might have aroused her suspicions. At the same time, I instructed the men to talk rather loudly, and not over-stoke the already blazing fire, instructions which were doubtlessly most unwelcome. I hoped by these means, between mating urge and appetite, to keep the tigress in the vicinity till daylight. She called again, shortly before dawn and, congratulating myself on my ruse, as soon as it became light enough to see I hastened down the path towards Jowlagiri where, but a quarter a mile away, stood the tamarind tree beneath which the boy had been killed over a year ago, and which I had already mentally noted as an ideal sitting-up place, requiring no preparation.

Reaching the tree in safety, I clambered up some twelve feet to a crotch, which was reasonably comfortable and provided a clear view of the path at both ends. Then, expanding my lungs, I called lustily in imitation of a male tiger. Nothing but silence answered me, and I began to wonder if after all the tigress had moved on at dawn. A new anxiety also gripped me. Perhaps she was near the temple, waiting for one of the men she had marked down the night before to come out of the building. Before departing I had very strictly enjoined my companions not, on any account, to leave the temple, but I felt anxious lest any of them disobey me, perhaps in answer to a call of nature, or to get water from the well that was temptingly near.

I called a second time. Still no answer. After a short interval, and expanding my lungs to bursting-point, I called again. This time I was successful, for my voice penetrated the intervening forest and was picked up by the tigress, who immediately answered from the direction of the temple. I had been right in my surmise; the wily animal had gone there to look for a meal. After a few minutes I called a fourth time and was again answered by the tigress; I was overjoyed to find that she was coming in my direction in search of the mate she thought was waiting.

I called twice more, my last call being answered from barely a hundred yards. Leveling the rifle, I glanced along the sights to a spot on the path about twenty-five yards away. I judged she would take less than thirty seconds to cover the intervening distance. I began to count, and as I reached twenty-seven the tigress strode into full view, inquiringly looking for her mate. From my commanding height in the tree, her missing ear was clearly visible, and I knew that at last, after many tiring efforts, the killer was within my power. This time there would be no slip. To halt her onward movement, I moaned in a low tone. She stopped abruptly and looked upwards in surprise. The next second the .405 bullet crashed squarely between the eyes, and she sank forward in a lurching movement and lay twitching in the dust. I placed a second shot into the crown of her skull, although there was no need to have done so; actually this second shot did considerable damage to the head and gave much unnecessary extra work to the taxidermist.

The dreaded killer of Jowlagiri had come to a tame and ignominious end, unworthy of her career, and although she had been a murderer, silent, savage and cruel, a pang of conscience troubled me as to my unsporting ruse in encompassing her end. There is not much more to tell. My eleven followers were elated at the sight of the dead marauder. Soon a stout sapling was cut, to which her feet were lashed by strong creeper vines, and we commenced the seven-mile walk to Jowlagiri, staggering beneath the burden. Because of the man-eater's presence, no humans were afoot until we practically entered the village itself. Then word went round and throngs surrounded us. I allowed the people a short hour in which to feast their eyes on their onetime foe, while I retired to a tree some distance away, where hot tea soon refreshed me, followed by some food, and two comforting pipes of tobacco. Then I returned to the village, where willing hands helped me to lash the tigress across the rear seat of my two-seater Studebaker, to begin my homeward journey with the comforting thought that I had lived down my error and avenged the deaths of many humans.

The Man-eater of Jowlagiri

The Spotted Devil of Gummalapur

THE leopard is common to practically all tropical jungles, and, unlike the tiger, indigenous to the forests of India; for whereas it has been established that the tiger is a comparatively recent newcomer from regions in the colder north, records and remains have shown that the leopard or panther, as it is better known in India has lived in the peninsula from the earliest times.

Because of its smaller size, and decidedly lesser strength, together with its innate fear of mankind, the panther is often treated with some derision, sometimes coupled with truly astonishing carelessness, two factors that have resulted in the maulings and occasional deaths of otherwise intrepid but cautious tiger-hunters. Even when attacking a human being the panther rarely kills, but confines itself to a series of quick bites and quicker raking scratches with its small but sharp claws; on the other hand, few persons live to tell that they have been attacked by a tiger.

This general rule has one fearful exception, however, and that is the panther that has turned man-eater. Although examples of such animals are comparatively rare, when they do occur they depict the panther as an engine of destruction quite equal to his far larger cousin, the tiger. Because of his smaller size, he can conceal himself in places impossible to a tiger, his need for water is far less, and in veritable demoniac cunning and daring, coupled with the uncanny sense of self-preservation and stealthy disappearance when danger threatens, he has no equal.

Such an animal was the man-eating leopard of Gummalapur. This leopard had established a record of some human killings and a reputation for veritable cunning that almost exceeded human intelligence. Some fearful stories of diabolical craftiness had been attributed to him, but certain it was that the panther was held in awe throughout an area of some 250 square miles over which it held undisputable sway.

Before sundown the door of each hut in every one of the villages within this area was fastened shut, some being reinforced by piles of boxes or large stones, kept for the purpose. Not until the sun was well up in the heavens next morning, did the timid inhabitants venture to expose them selves. This state of affairs rapidly told on the sanitary condition of the houses, the majority of which were not equipped with latrines of any sort, the adjacent wasteland being used for the purpose.

Finding that its human meals were increasingly difficult to obtain, the panther became correspondingly bolder, and in two instances burrowed its way in through the thatched walls of the smaller huts, dragging its screaming victim out the same way, while the whole village lay awake, trembling behind closed doors, listening to the shrieks of the victim as he was carried away. In one case the panther, frustrated from burrowing its way in through the walls, which had been boarded up with rough planks, resorted to the novel method of entering through the thatched roof. In this instance it found itself unable to carry its prey back through the hole it had made, so in a paroxysm of fury had killed all four inhabitants of the hut a man, his wife and two children before clawing its way back to the darkness outside and to safety.

Only during the day did the villagers enjoy any respite. Even then, they moved about in large, armed groups, but so far, no instance had occurred of the leopard attacking in daylight, although it had been very frequently seen at dawn within the precincts of a village. Such was the position when I arrived at Gummalapur, in response to an invitation from Jepson, the District Magistrate, to rid his area of this scourge. Preliminary conversation with some of the inhabitants revealed that they appeared dejected beyond hope, and with true eastern fatalism had decided to resign themselves to the fact that this shaitan, from whom they believed deliverance to be impossible, had come to stay, till each one of them had been devoured or had fled the district as the only alternative.

It was soon apparent that I would get little or no cooperation from the villagers, many of whom openly stated that if they dared to assist me the shaitan would come to hear of it and would hasten their end. Indeed, they spoke in whispers as if afraid that loud talking would be over heard by the panther, who would single them out for revenge.

That night, I sat in a chair in the midst of the village, with my back to the -only house that possessed a twelve foot wall, having taken the precaution to cover the roof with a deep layer of thorns and brambles, in case I should be attacked from behind by the leopard leaping down on me. It was a moonless night, but the clear sky promised to provide sufficient illumination from its myriad stars to enable me to see the panther should it approach.

The evening, at six o'clock, found the inhabitants behind locked doors, while I sat alone on my chair, with my rifle across my lap, loaded and cocked, a flask of hot tea nearby, a blanket, a water bottle, some biscuits, a torch at hand, and of course my pipe, tobacco and matches as my only consolation during the long vigil till daylight returned. With the going down of the sun, a period of acute anxiety began, for the stars were as yet not brilliant enough to light the scene even dimly. Moreover, immediately to west ward of the village lay two abrupt hills, which hastened the dusky uncertainty that might otherwise have been lessened by some reflection from the recently set sun. I gripped my rifle and stared around me, my eyes darting in all directions and from end to end of the deserted village street. At that moment, I would have welcomed the jungle, where by their cries of alarm I could rely on the animals and birds to warn me of the approach of the panther. Here all was deathly silent, and the whole village might have been entirely deserted, for not a sound escaped from the many inhabitants whom I knew lay listening behind closed doors, and listening for the scream that would herald my death and another victim for the panther. Time passed, and one by one the stars became visible, till by 7.15 p.m. they shed a sufficiently diffused glow to enable me to see along the whole village street, although some what indistinctly. My confidence returned, and I began to think of some way to draw the leopard towards me, should he be in the vicinity. I forced myself to cough loudly at intervals and then began to talk to myself, hoping that my voice would be heard by the panther and bring him to me quickly.

I do not know if any of my readers have ever tried talking to themselves loudly for any reason, whether to attract a man-eating leopard or not. I suppose they must be few, for I realize what reputation the man who talks to himself acquires. I am sure I acquired that reputation with the villagers, who from behind their closed doors listened to me that night as I talked to myself. But believe me, it is no easy task to talk loudly to yourself for hours on end, while watching intently for the stealthy approach of a killer. By 9 p.m. I got tired of it, and considered taking a walk around the streets of the village. After some deliberation, I did this, still talking to myself as I moved cautiously up one lane and down the next, frequently glancing back over my shoulder. I soon realized, however, that I was exposing my self to extreme danger, as the panther might pounce on me from any corner, from behind any pile of garbage, or from the rooftops of any of the huts. Ceasing my talking abruptly, I returned to my chair, thankful to get back alive.

Time dragged by very slowly and monotonously, the hours seeming to pass on leaden wheels. Midnight came and I found myself feeling cold, due to a sharp breeze that had set in from the direction of the adjacent forest, which began beyond the two hillocks. I drew the blanket closely around me, while consuming tobacco far in excess of what was good for me. By 2 a.m. I found I was growing sleepy. Hot tea and some biscuits, followed by icy water from the bottle dashed into my face, and a quick raising and lowering of my body from the chair half-a-dozen times, revived me a little, and I fell to talking to myself again, as a means of keeping awake thereafter.

At 3.30 a.m. came an event, which caused me untold discomfort for the next two hours. With the sharp wind, banks of heavy cloud were carried along, and these soon covered the heavens and obscured the stars, making the darkness intense, and it would have been quite impossible to see the panther a yard away. I had undoubtedly placed myself in an awkward position, and entirely at the mercy of the beast, should it choose to attack me now. I fell to flashing my torch every half-minute from end to end of the street, a proceeding which was very necessary if I hoped to remain alive with the panther anywhere near, although I felt I was ruining my chances of shooting the beast, as the bright torch-beams would probably scare it away. Still, there was the possibility that it might not be frightened by the light, had that I might be able to see it and bring off a lucky shot, a circumstance that did not materialize, as morning found me still shining the torch after a night-long and futile vigil.

I snatched a few hours' sleep and at noon fell to questioning the villagers again. Having found me still alive that morning quite obviously contrary to their expectations and possibly crediting me with the power to communicate with spirits because they had heard me walking around their village talking, they were considerably more communicative and gave me a few more particulars about the beast. Apparently the leopard wandered about its domain a great deal, killing erratically and at places widely distant from one another, and as I had already found out, never in succession at the same village. As no human had been killed at Gummalapur within the past three weeks, it seemed that there was much to be said in favor of staying where I was, rather than moving around in a haphazard fashion, hoping to come up with the panther. Another factor against wandering about was that this beast was rarely visible in the daytime, and there was therefore practically no chance of my meeting it, as might have been the case with a man-eating tiger. It was reported that the animal had been wounded in its right forefoot, since it had the habit of placing the pad side wards, a fact which I was later able to confirm when I actually came across the tracks of the animal.

After lunch, I conceived a fresh plan for that night, which would certainly save me from the great personal discomforts I had experienced the night before. This was to leave a door of one of the huts ajar, and to rig up inside it a very life-like dummy of a human being; meanwhile, I would remain in a corner of the same hut behind a barricade of boxes. This would provide an opportunity to slay the beast as he became visible in the partially opened doorway, or even as he attacked the dummy, while I myself would be comparatively safe and warm behind my barricade.

I explained the plan to the villagers, who, to my surprise, entered into it with some enthusiasm. A hut was placed at my disposal immediately next to that through the roof of which the leopard had once entered and killed the four inmates. A very life-like dummy was rigged up, made of straw, an old pillow, a jacket, and a sari. This was placed within the doorway of the hut in a sitting position, the door itself being kept half-open. I sat myself behind a low parapet of boxes, placed diagonally across the opposite end of the small hut, the floor of which measured about 12 feet by 10 feet. At this short range, I was confident of accounting for the panther as soon as it made itself visible in the doorway. Furthermore, should it attempt to enter by the roof, or through the thatched walls, I would have ample time to deal with it. To make matters even more realistic, I instructed the inhabitants of both the adjacent huts, especially the women folk, to Endeavour to talk in low tones as far into the night as was possible, in order to attract the killer to that vicinity.

An objection was immediately raised, that the leopard might be led to enter one of their huts, instead of attacking the dummy in the doorway of the hut in which I was sitting. This fear was only overcome by promising to come to their aid should they hear the animal attempting an entry. The signal was to be a normal call for help, with which experience had shown the panther to be perfectly familiar, and of which he took no notice. This plan also assured me that the inhabitants would themselves keep awake and continue their low conversation in snatches, in accordance with my instructions. Everything was in position by 6 p.m., at which time all doors in the village were secured, except that of the hut where I sat. The usual uncertain dusk was followed by bright starlight that threw the open doorway and the crouched figure of the draped dummy into clear relief. Now and again, I could hear the low hum of conversation from the two neighboring huts.

The hours dragged by in dreadful monotony. Suddenly the silence was disturbed by a rustle in the thatched roof, which brought me to full alertness. But it was only a rat, which scampered across and then dropped with a thud to the floor nearby, from where it ran along the tops of the boxes before me, becoming clearly visible as it passed across the comparatively light patch of the open doorway.

As the early hours of the morning approached, I noticed that the conversation from my neighbors died down and finally ceased, showing that they had fallen asleep, regard less of man-eating panther, or anything else that might threaten them.

I kept awake, occasionally smoking my pipe, or sipping hot tea from the flask, but nothing happened beyond the noises made by the tireless rats, which chased each other about and around the room, and even across me, till day light finally dawned, and I lay back to fall asleep after another tiring vigil.

The following night, for want of a better plan, and feeling that sooner or later the man-eater would appear, I decided to repeat the performance with the dummy, and I met with an adventure, which will remain indelibly impressed on my memory till my dying day. I was in position again by six o'clock, and the first part of the night was but a repetition of the night before. The usual noise of scurrying rats, broken now and again by the low-voiced speakers in the neighboring huts, were the only sounds to mar the stillness of the night. Shortly after 1 a.m., a sharp wind sprang up, and I could hear the breeze rustling through the thatched roof. This rapidly increased in strength, till it was blowing quite a gale. The rectangular patch of light from the partly open doorway practically disappeared as the sky became overcast with storm clouds, and soon the steady rhythmic patter of rain-drops, which increased to a regular downpour, made me feel that the leopard, who like all his family are not over-fond of water, would not venture out on this stormy night, and that I would draw a blank once more. By now, the murmuring voices from the neighboring huts had ceased or become inaudible, drowned in the swish of the rain. I strained my eyes to see the scarcely perceptible doorway, while the crouched figure of the dummy could not be seen at all, and while I looked I evidently fell asleep, tired out by my vigil of the two previous nights.

How long I slept I cannot tell, but it must have been for some considerable time. I awoke abruptly with a start, and a feeling that not all was well. The ordinary person in awaking takes some time to collect his faculties, but my jungle training and long years spent in dangerous places enabled me to remember where I was and in what circumstances, as soon as I awoke. The rain had ceased and the sky had cleared a little, for the oblong patch of open doorway was more visible now, with the crouched figure of the dummy seated at its base. Then, as I watched, a strange thing happened. The dummy seemed to move, and as I looked more intently, it suddenly disappeared to the accompaniment of a snarling growl. I realized that the panther had come, seen the crouched figure of the dummy in the doorway which it had mistaken for a human being, and then proceeded to stalk it, creeping in at the opening on its belly, and so low to the ground that its form had not been outlined in the 'faint light as I had hoped. The growl I had heard was at the panther's realization that the thing it had attacked was not human after all.

Switching on my torch and springing to my feet, I hurdled the barricade of boxes and sprang to the open door way, to dash outside and almost trip over the dummy, which lay across my path. I shone the beam of torchlight in both directions, but nothing could be seen. Hoping that the panther might still be lurking nearby and shining my torch-beam into every comer, I walked slowly down the village street, cautiously negotiated the bend at its end and walked back up the next street, in fear and trembling of a sudden attack. But although the light lit up every corner, every rooftop and every likely hiding-place in the street, there was no sign of my enemy anywhere. Then only did I realize the true significance of the reputation this animal had acquired of possessing diabolical cunning. Just as my own sixth sense had wakened me from sleep at a time of danger, a similar sixth sense had warned the leopard that here was no ordinary human being, but one that was bent upon its destruction. Perhaps it was the bright beam of torchlight that had unnerved it at the last moment; but, whatever the cause, the man-eater had silently, completely and effectively disappeared, for although I searched for it through all the streets of Gummalapur that night, it had vanished as mysteriously as it had come.

Disappointment, and annoyance with myself at having fallen asleep, was overcome with a grim determination to get even with this beast at any cost. Next morning the tracks of the leopard were clearly visible at the spot it had entered the village and crossed a muddy drain, where for the first time I saw the pug-marks of the slayer and the peculiar indentation of its right forefoot, the paw of which was not visible as a pug-mark, but remained a blur, due to this animal's habit of placing it on edge. Thus, it was clear to me that the panther had at some time received an injury to its foot, which had turned it into a man-eater. Later I was able to view the injured foot for myself, and I was probably wrong in my deductions as to the cause of its man-eating propensities; for I came to learn that the animal had acquired the habit of eating the corpses which the people of that area, after a cholera epidemic within the last year, had by custom carried into the forest and left to the vultures. These easily procured meals had given the panther a taste for human flesh, and the injury to its foot, which made normal hunting and swift movement difficult, had been the concluding factor in turning it into that worst of all menaces to an Indian village a man-eating panther.

I also realized that, granting the panther was equipped with an almost-human power of deduction, it would not appear in Gummalapur again for a long time after the fright I had given it the night before in following it with my torchlight. It was therefore obvious that I would have to change my scene of operations, and so, after considerable thought, I decided to move on to the village of Devarabetta, diagonally across an intervening range of forest hills, and some eighteen miles away, where the panther had already secured five victims, though it had not been visited for a month.

Therefore, I set out before n a.m. that very day, after an early lunch. The going was difficult, as the path led across two hills. Along the valley that lay between them ran a small jungle stream, and beside it I noted the fresh pugs of a big male tiger that had followed the watercourse for some 200 yards before crossing to the other side. It had evidently passed early that morning, as was apparent from the minute trickles of moisture that had seeped into the pugmarks through the river sand, but had not had time to evaporate in the morning sun. Holding steadfastly to the job in hand, however, I did not follow the tiger and arrived at Devarabetta just after 5 p.m.

The inhabitants were preparing to shut themselves into their huts when I appeared, and scarcely had the time nor inclination to talk to me. However, I gathered that they agreed that a visit from the man-eater was likely any day, for a full month had elapsed since his last visit and he had never been known to stay away for so long.

Time being short, I hastily looked around for the hut with the highest wall, before which I seated myself as on my first night at Gummalapur, having hastily arranged some dried thorny bushes across its roof as protection against attack from my rear and above. These thorns had been brought from the hedge of a field bordering the village itself, and I had had to escort the men who carried them with my rifle, so afraid they were of the man-eater's early appearance.

Devarabetta was a far smaller village than Gummalapur, and situated much closer to the forest, a fact which I welcomed for the reason that I would be able to obtain in formation as to the movements of carnivora by the warning notes that the beasts and birds of the jungle would utter, provided I was within hearing.

The night fell with surprising rapidity, though this time a thin sickle of new moon was showing in the sky. The occasional call of a roosting jungle-cock, and the plaintive call of peafowl, answering one another from the nearby forest, told me that all was still well. And then it was night, the faint starlight rendering the tortuously winding and filthy lane that formed the main street of Devarabetta hardly visible, and as if in a dream. At 8.30 p.m., a sambar hind belled from the forest, following her original sharp note with a series of warning cries in steady succession. Undoubtedly, a beast of prey was afoot and had been seen by the watchful deer, who was telling the other jungle-folk to look out for their lives. Was it the panther or one of the larger carnivora? Time alone would tell, but at least I had been warned.

The hind ceased her belling, and some fifteen minutes later, from the direction in which she had first sounded her alarm, I heard the low moan of a tiger, to be repeated twice in succession, before all became silent again. It was not a mating call that I had heard, but the call of the King of the Jungle in his normal search for food, reminding the in habitants of the forest that their master was on the move in search of prey, and that one of them must die that night to appease his voracious appetite.

Time passed, and then down the lane I caught sight of some - movement. Raising my cocked rifle, I covered the object, which slowly approached me, walking in the middle of the street. Was this the panther after all, and would it walk thus openly, and in the middle of the lane, without any attempt at concealment? It was now about thirty yards away and still it came on boldly, without any attempt to take cover or to creep along the edges of objects in the usual manner of a leopard when stalking its prey. Moreover, it seemed a frail and slender animal, as I could see it fairly clearly now. Twenty yards and I pressed the button of my torch, which this night I had clamped to my rifle. As the powerful beam threw across the intervening space, it lighted a village cur, commonly known to us in India as a 'pariah dog'. Starving and lonely, it had sought out human company; it stared blankly into the bright beam of light, feebly wagging a skinny tail in unmistakable signs of friendliness.

Welcoming a companion, if only a lonely cur, I switched off the light and called it to my side by a series of flicks of thumb and finger. It approached cringingly, still wagging its ridiculous tail. I fed it with some biscuits and a sandwich, and in the dull light of the star-lit sky its eyes looked back at me in dumb gratitude for the little food I had given it, perhaps the first to enter its stomach for the past two days. Then it curled up at my feet and fell asleep.

Time passed and midnight came. A great horned owl hooted dismally from the edge of the forest, its prolonged mysterious cry of 'Whooo-whooo' seeming to sound a death-knell, or a precursor to that haunting part of the night when the souls of those not at rest return to the scenes of their earthly activities, to live over and over again the deeds that bind them to the earth.

One o'clock, two and then three o'clock passed in dragging monotony, while I strained my tired and aching eyes and ears for movement or sound. Fortunately, it had remained a cloudless night and visibility was comparatively good by the radiance of the myriad stars that spangled the heavens in glorious array, a sight that cannot be seen in any of our dusty towns or cities. And then, abruptly, the alarmed cry of a plover, or 'Did you- do-it' bird, as it is known in India, sounded from the nearby muddy tank on the immediate outskirts of the village. 'Did-you-do-it, Did-you-do-it, Did-you-do-it, Did-you- do-it', it called in rapid regularity. No doubt the bird was excited and had been disturbed, or it had seen some thing. The cur at my feet stirred, raised its head, and then sank down again, as if without a care in the world.

The minutes passed, and then suddenly the dog became fully awake. Its ears that had been drooping in dejection were standing on end; it trembled violently against my legs, while a low prolonged growl came from its throat.

I noticed that it was looking down the lane that led into the village from the vicinity of the tank. I stared intently in that direction. For a long time I could see nothing, and then it seemed that a shadow moved at a corner of a building some distance away and on the same side of the lane. I focused my eyes on this spot, and after a few seconds again noticed a furtive movement, but this time a little closer.

Placing my left thumb on the switch, which would actuate the torch, I waited in breathless silence. A few minutes passed, five or ten at the most, and then I saw an elongated body spring swiftly and noiselessly on to the roof of a hut some twenty yards away. As it happened, all the huts adjoined each other at this spot, and I guessed the panther had decided to walk along the roofs of these adjoining huts and spring upon me from the rear, rather than continue stalking me in full view.

I got to my feet quickly and placed my back against the wall. In this position, the eave of the roof above my head passed over me and on to the road where I had been sitting, for about eighteen inches. The rifle I kept ready, finger on trigger, with my left thumb on the torch switch, pressed to my side and pointing upwards.

A few seconds later, I heard a faint rustling as the leopard endeavored to negotiate the thorns, which I had taken the precaution of placing on the roof. He evidently failed in this, for there was silence again. Now I had no means of knowing where he was. The next fifteen minutes passed in terrible anxiety, with me glancing in all directions in the attempt to locate the leopard before he sprang, while thanking Providence that the night remained clear. And then the cur, that had been restless and whining at my feet, shot out into the middle of the street, faced the corner of the hut against which I was sheltering and began to bark lustily.

This warning saved my life, for within five seconds the panther charged around the corner and sprang at me. I had just time to press the torch switch and fire from my hip, full into the blazing eyes that showed above the wide opened, snarling mouth. The .405 bullet struck squarely, but the impetus of the charge carried the animal on to me. I jumped nimbly to one side, and as the panther crashed against the wall of the hut, emptied two more rounds from the magazine into the evil, spotted body. It collapsed and was still, except for the spasmodic jerking of the still-opened jaws and long, extended tail. And then my friend the cur, staunch in faithfulness to his newfound master, rushed in and fixed his feeble teeth in the throat of the dead monster.

And so passed the 'Spotted Devil of Gummalapur', a panther of whose malignant craftiness I had never heard the like before and hope never to have to meet again. When skinning the animal next morning, I found that the injury to the right paw had not been caused, as I had surmised, by a previous bullet wound, but by two porcupine quills that had penetrated between the toes within an inch of each other and then broken off short. This must have happened quite a while before, as a gristly formation between the bones inside the foot had covered the quills. No doubt, it had hurt the animal to place his paw on the ground in the normal way, and he had acquired the habit of walking on its edge.

I took the cur home, washed and fed it, and named it 'Nipper'. Nipper has been with me any years since then, and never have I had reason to regret giving him the few biscuits and sandwich that won his staunch little heart, and caused him to repay that small debt within a couple of hours, by saving my life.

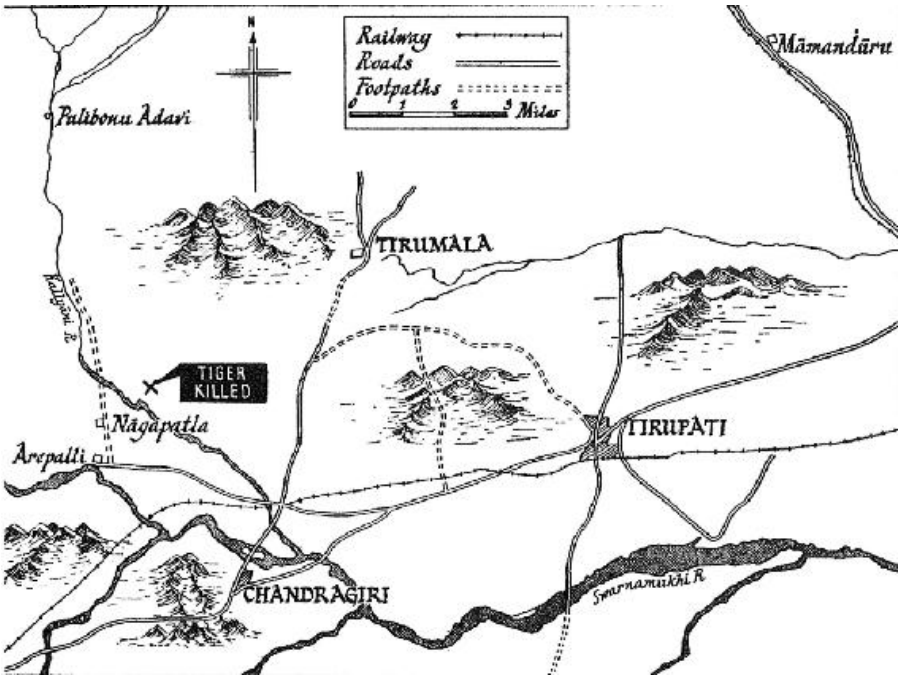
The Striped Terror of Chamala Valley



THE Chamala Valley is part of the northeastern tip of the District of Chittoor in the Presidency of Madras, where it adjoins the District of Cuddapah immediately to the north. It is a comparatively small valley, its main portion extending northwards for some seven miles by five wide, with two branches at its extremity, like the letter 'Y', running respectively north-west and north-east, somewhat narrower than the main valley and each about four miles long. The branches terminate below the bluff crags of a towering escarpment that forms the southern boundary of Cuddapah.

A beautiful stream, called the Kalayani River, flows down the northeastern valley, having its twin sources just below the escarpment, in magnificently wooded forest glens named Gundalpenta and Umbalmeru, where pools of translucent, ice-cold water are always to be found even in the hottest part of summer. The Kalyani then flows southward through the main valley and eventually enters a cultivated area at the hamlet of Nagapatla, with an ancient lake at which the kings of Chandragiri, and afterwards the all-conquering Mohammedan hero, Tippoo Sultan, attempted to construct a dam to feed water to the parched countryside in the terribly hot months of summer. A heavily thatched, but snug forest bungalow has been constructed by the Forest Department on the southern side of the lake, bordering the ancient aqueduct. The sleepy village of Arepalli Rangampet lies about a mile and a half distant, and is of almost recent origin. The Chamala Valley is entirely forested and in the days of British rule was a game preserve. Westward lies the Bakhrapet Forest Block and eastward the Tirupati Forest Range, which culminates in the great pilgrim shrines of Tirupati, famous throughout India. Southward is the ancient town of Chandragiri, with its age-old fort, a mute tribute to the glory of its former Kings.

A metre-gauge railway line passes close to Chandragiri, on its way to Tirupati and Renigunta, where it joins the arterial broad-gauge line from Madras to Bombay. A arrow cart-road leads from Chandragiri railway station for about three and a half miles to Rangampet; then it turns north wards for a mile and a half to Nagapatla, whence it continues still further north and becomes a Forest Depart mental path for all the seven miles of the Chamala valley till it reaches a spot named Pulibonu, which means Tiger's Cage', where it abruptly ends. Two flat, square, cemented campsites, and a well to provide a continuous supply of drinking water, have been constructed at this spot by the Forest Department. The valley and its branches are beautiful, and when I first visited them, eighteen years ago, were a paradise for game. Large herds of chital, or spotted deer, roamed the main valley, some of the stags carrying heads the like of which I have nowhere seen in Southern India. The slopes of the foothills running into the Bakhrapet range on the west, and the Tirupati range on the east, as well as along the foot of the whole northern escarpment, were the home of magnificently proportioned and antlered sambar. The black or sloth bear could be found everywhere, but was especially numerous and dangerous in the dense forest be low the escarpment. Kakar, or the 'muntjac' or barking deer, as it is known, also abounded. The main valley and its northeastern appendage were the regular beat of tiger, which came from the Bakhrapet range, passed up the valleys, crossed the escarpment and into the Cuddapah Forests, thence to the Mamandur range and onwards to Settigunta. Panther were everywhere, and the area abounded in peafowl, spur fowl and grey jungle fowl, the latter especially being very numerous. This was the only forest in Southern India where I have found jungle fowl crowing even at midday, and regularly at 2 a.m., and at about 4.30 a.m., apart, of course, from their usual chorus at sunrise and sunset.

Into this peaceful area, one day, early in 1937, came the striped terror of which I shall tell you. He was a tiger of normal size, and his tracks indicated no deformity that might have accounted for his partiality for human flesh. He suddenly appeared, no one knew from where, nor had any rumor been heard of the activities of a man-eating tiger in any of the adjoining forest areas, far or near. Strange as was his sudden and unheralded coming, it was soon well known that a man-eater had entered the valley, for he killed, and wholly ate, a bamboo-cutter near the pools of Gundalpenta. Within three days thereafter, he practically entirely devoured a traveler on the Nagapatla- Pulibonu forest track, close to the fourth milestone. Thereafter his killings became sporadic and irregular, extending throughout the length and breadth of the three valleys, where in all he killed and devoured, or partly devoured, seven people in the space of about six months.

One day the Forest Range Officer from Bakhrapet, in whose area the Chamala Valley is included, was on his way to take up residence in the Forest Bungalow at Nagapatla, during his rounds of inspection. He travelled by bullock cart, in which he was also bringing provisions, personal effects and other necessities for the period of a fortnight he would stay at Nagapatla.

It was 5 p.m., and the cart was hardly two miles from its destination, when a tiger walked on to the road in front of the vehicle. I should have told you that this road, leading from Bakhrapet to Nagapatla, ran through the reserved forest for practically its whole length, the last two miles being across the beginning of the Chamala Valley itself. Seeing the tiger on the road before him, the cart-driver brought his vehicle to a stop and called out to the Range Officer and the Forest Guard who were with him. As the cart was a covered one and they were inside, neither had seen that there was a tiger on the road.

The three men commenced to shout, when the tiger, walking along the clearing that bordered the road, passed the cart and so came into view of the two men inside. At this juncture, the Forest Guard, for no understandable reason, jumped out of the cart and commenced waving his hands and shouting, to frighten the beast away. However, he sealed his own fate, for with a succession of short roars the animal charged, seized him in its jaws, and bounded back into the concealing forest. The action had been so unexpected and abrupt that the Range Officer had no opportunity to do a thing, although what he could have done in any event was problematical, as he himself was unarmed.

The cart was then driven to Nagapatla in great haste, but it was not until the following morning that a large group could be assembled, armed with matchlocks, hatchets and staves, to attempt to find the unfortunate Forest Guard, or rather what was left of him. The remains were eventually located in a ravine, less than a furlong from the road; only the head, hands and feet, and his bloodstained and mangled khaki uniform and green turban, were left to tell the tale, the latter lying where it had fallen when the tiger jumped with its victim across the clearing that bordered the road.

This tragedy received a great deal of official attention, and was published by the Press throughout the country. A reward was offered by the Government for the destruction of the man-eater, and several venturesome hunters, both local and from the city of Madras, arrived at the valley to destroy the creature. But after its last killing, and as if it had become aware that it had attracted too much attention, the terror completely disappeared for a while, nor could any trace of it be found anywhere in the valley. The assumption was that it had escaped, either by traversing the escarpment northwards into the Cuddapah District, or had wandered into the Bakhrapet or Tirupati blocks. The whole locality was on the alert, but nothing was heard of the animal for the next two months.

Then one day a railway ganger, patrolling the broad gauge railway track near the station of Mamandur, which stands on the Madras-Bombay arterial line, and is situated in a wide, densely-forested plateau, encircled with hills, some eighteen miles north-east of the Chamala Valley, failed to report at the terminal point of his patrol. No particular notice of his absence was taken for a day or two, as sudden absenteeism on trivial grounds is a common occurrence in the East; but when after that the man still failed to put in an appearance, the matter was regarded more seriously, and a squad was sent out to try to find him. Walking along the railway, the first clue to the missing man's fate was the large hammer he had been using, which was found lying beside the track. Gangers are issued with such hammers to keep in place the wooden blocks used to wedge the rails against their supports, known as chairs. On the hard, sun-baked earth, no signs of any struggle were evident, but not far away were a few drops of blood that led down an embankment and into the neighboring forest. Following this trail, the party came across an odd chapli (or country-made slipper) as worn by the missing ganger, together with traces of blood that had been smeared against the leaves of bushes. A little further, they crossed a strip of dry, soft sand, traversing which they clearly found the pugmarks of a tiger.

This established that the missing man had been taken by a tiger. The fame of the man-eater of the Chamala Valley had spread far and wide during the past months, and naturally, it was concluded that this animal was responsible for the latest tragedy. Incidentally, the remains of the ganger were never found. Thereafter, two kills occurred during the succeeding months. The first at Settigunta, n miles north-west of Mamandur, and the second at Umbalmeru, which, as you will remember, was one of the twin sources of the Kalyani river before it entered the Chamala Valley, At this time, I was on a business visit to Madras and had had occasion to visit the Chief Conservator of Forests with regard to a complaint I had earlier lodged against the activities of local poachers in the Salem District. While talking to the Chief Conservator, he mentioned the activities of the tiger of which I had read a great deal in the Press and suggested I make an attempt to bag the animal.

Fortunately, I had not availed myself of privilege leave during the past year, and as I had some months to my credit, I decided to spend one of them in making such an effort. Returning to Bangalore, I spent the next few days in getting together all the many necessities for such an undertaking and ten days later, I was at the Nagapatla Forest Bungalow, which I had decided to make my headquarters in conducting the campaign against the man-eater of Chamala.

The first thing to do was to make exhaustive local inquiries, visit the spots in the Chamala Valley where The kills had occurred, and try to establish some sequence in the localities where the various incidents had taken place, so as to arrive, if possible, at a knowledge of the beat the tiger followed. This I entirely failed to do; it became obvious that this particular animal was a wanderer, who visited the valley there for some time, snatched a human victim wherever opportunity offered, and climbed over the escarpment in the direction of Mamandur or into the Cuddapah District.

Not without considerable difficulty, I purchased four young buffaloes. These I tied up at widely separated points; one at Gundalpenta, another at Umbalmeru, a third at a water-hole called Narasimha Cheruvu, close to the fourth milestone of the Nagapatla-Pulibonu forest road, and the last at a rocky stream named Ragimankonar, a tributary of the Kalyani River, as it issued from the rocky hills of the Tirupati block about two miles east of the road. On the second day the bait at Narasimha Cheruvu was killed, but examination showed this to be the work of a large Tendu', or forest panther, and not of a tiger, as I had hoped. As baits are costly and I could not afford to lose them to interfering panthers, I sat up for this animal by the waterhole, and was lucky enough to bag him by 6.45 p.m., while it was still daylight, when he returned to the kill.

I then bought another bait, to replace the one the panther had killed, and secured it to the same spot at Narasimha Cheruvu. The next week was spent in idleness at the forest bungalow, except for long walks throughout the forest every morning and evening in all directions in the hope of accidentally meeting the tiger. On the morning of the ninth day, when driving early in my Studebaker in the direction of Pulibonu, from where I intended starting out on another stroll through the jungles, I came across the pugmarks of a tiger which had joined the road at the sixth milestone and had walked down the middle of it to beyond Pulibonu. No distinguishing peculiarities about the man-eater's tracks had been so far observed, so that it was impossible to tell whether the animal that had made these fresh tracks was the slayer I was seeking, or just a casual wandering tiger. These pugs were, in places, very clear in the soft roadside sand, and I was able to examine them minutely; but be yond enabling me to say that they had been made by a male tiger of average size, no other peculiarity or distinguishing mark of any sort presented itself. Leaving the car at Pulibonu, I walked up the northeastern valley, the forest track crossing and re-crossing the Kalyani River, where I saw that the tiger had preceded me for some distance. I visited both Gundalpenta and Umbalmeru that day, in high hope that one or other of my baits had been taken, but found both of them alive, placidly chewing at the large piles of hay I had left them so that they might be as comfortable and as contented as possible. After lunch that afternoon I returned and attempted to follow the tiger's tracks from the place I had last observed them. But I only partly succeeded, losing the tracks in some heavy bamboo that clothed both banks of the river along its higher reaches. It was fairly late that evening when I turned back towards Pulibonu. Proceeding a half-mile, and still within the heavy bamboo belt, I came upon a sloth bear which had made an unusually early appearance, as these creatures do not begin their wanderings till after sun down. He was standing up against a large white-ant hill, with his nose and a part of his head inside the hole he had made, drawing the white ants into his ready mouth with powerful inhalations. He looked for all the world like a very black, hairy man, standing against the anthill, while the noises he was making in his efforts were extraordinary, resembling the buzzing of a million bees, interspersed with loud, impatient snuffling and shuffling, as of a giant bloodhound on the trail.

I drew quite close to the bear, yet he did not see me, so engrossed he was in his congenial task. I could have come still closer, but this would have meant that, when eventually he did become aware of my presence, he would probably attack, and I would have to shoot him. This I did not want to do, as personally, I have no quarrel with bears, and secondly, the sound of my shot would disturb the jungle and might result in driving the tiger away. So I stopped at the distance of about forty yards and coughed loudly. The bear heard me, ceased his buzzing and snuffling, and whirled around on his hind feet, to face me with an expression that was amusing, to say the least of it. Annoyance, fear, chagrin and resentment were writ large across his mud-covered features. For a moment, he watched me, rising still higher on his hind-legs, and I thought at first, he would make a blind charge, which is the habit of the sloth bear when disturbed at close quarters. But better judgment prevailed; he sank to all fours and bolted for all he was worth, bounding away like a black hairy ball, muttering, 'Aufl Aufl Aufl'

Early next morning found me back at Pulibonu. There were no pugmarks on the road to indicate the tiger's return, leaving the inference that he was somewhere in the northeastern valley, or that he had departed across the escarpment. Leaving the car, I trudged to Gundalpenta, but found my bait alive, still chewing hay as if nothing else in the world mattered. Then I went on to Umbalmeru, and upon approaching the spot where my other bait had been tethered, found that it was missing. Examination revealed that it had been killed by a tiger, which had then succeeded in dragging it away, after first snapping the strong tethering rope with which I had secured it. To follow the drag mark was easy, and after proceeding about 100 yards, my attention was attracted by a solitary crow, perched on the low branch of a tree, looking downwards in expectation.

This could only mean one thing that the tiger was there and in possession of his kill. If he were not there, the crow would have descended to feed on the carcass, instead of sitting on a branch looking so dejectedly downwards, as he was doing at that moment. The tree on which the crow was sitting overlooked a downwardly sloping bank of spear grass, at the foot of which was a small depression densely covered by a thicket. It was somewhere in this thicket that the tiger, and his kill, were sheltering. To approach this thicket directly was inadvisable. To begin with, the tiger would probably hear me and decamp. On the other hand, and especially if he were the man-eater, he would undoubtedly charge, and the proximity of the surrounding bushes and the length of the spear grass gave me a very poor chance of being able to stop him before he reached me.

I therefore backed away some fifty yards and began casting about for a detour by which I could approach the spot from some other angle, or perhaps from the opposite side, where I could glimpse the tiger from more favorable ground.

To my good fortune, a shallow nala ran diagonally across, roughly from north-west to northeast, on its way to join the early reaches of the Kalyani River. Tiptoeing up this nala, I soon judged I was abreast of the thicket in which the tiger lay. Continuing for another twenty-five yards, I cautiously climbed the right-hand bank and found, as I expected, that I was now some little distance beyond the thicket. A half-grown tamarind tree lay a few yards ahead of me, and creeping up to this, I swung myself into its sheltering branches, and then climbed higher in the hope of being able to look down into the thicket. But I was disappointed, in that I could see nothing. Not even the crow was visible from this position, as the low branch on which he was perched was obscured from my view by the intervening thicket. I had, therefore, no means of knowing whether the tiger was still there, or had moved on.

I remained in this position for about half an hour, hoping that the jungle or rather its inmates would indicate the movements of the tiger if he came out of the bushes. The sun was well up by now, and I knew the tiger would soon move off to one of the water-pools of Umbalmeru, to quench his thirst after the heavy meal he had undoubtedly had.

Then I heard the peculiar alarm cry of a grey langur monkey, 'Ha-aahl Harl Harl' he called, from a hundred yards to my left. This he repeated steadily, to the accompanying, ‘Cheek! Cheek! ‘Of the female of the tribe.

The tiger had moved at last, and the langur watchman had seen him. There is no need for me to tell those of my readers who are familiar with the Indian forests about the wise ways of langur monkeys. Those who are not will be interested to know that these great grey arboreans, with black faces and enormously long tails, live in tribes in the forests, where they exist entirely on wild fruits, certain leaves, and of course the multifarious caterpillars and insects which form a particular delicacy. The flesh of the langur is an out standing attraction on the menu of tigers and panthers, and of some jungle tribes, so that generations of hard experience have taught them to post a watchman, who invariably takes up his position on the highest tree and keeps an intent lookout for prowling felines. It might do some humans good to take a leaf out of the langur watchman’s book, for while he is on duty this langur will not feed or allow his attention to be in any way distracted from his job. He realizes that the safely and lives of the babies, females and other members of his tribe depend entirely on his vigilance. You will see him on top of the highest tree, sitting alert and looking around. Not a movement within visible range escapes his beady, black eyes. Eventually and only after he is relieved by another watchman, will he think of feeding himself?

The normal calls of langurs at play are a series of resounding 'Whoomp Whoomps', that echo down the hillsides and the deep forest glens. When he spots danger, however, the watchman barks, 'Ha-aahl Har I Harl' in a successive series of calls, and the tribe seeks safety in the highest trees. Alas, for all the wisdom of the astute langurs, tiger and panther have also developed an instinctive technique to overcome the cleverness of these monkeys, for they too must eat. When they hear the watchman's call, tigers and panthers who have been stalking the tribe know they have been discovered, and that the monkeys will take to the highest trees. So they now change their tactics, and after having located a tree on which a number of the apes are seated, rush with a series of blood-curdling roars towards it and possibly leap to the lowest fork, as if to climb the tree themselves. Seated on the highest branches, the langurs would be quite safe if they would only stay put. But the horrid snarls and roars, together with the terrible striped or spotted form charging towards them with wide-open jaws, unnerves the poor beasts, and they jump wildly from their perches of safety, either in attempts to reach neighboring trees, or from the great height on to the ground itself, where one of them invariably falls an easy prey to the tiger or panther anticipating the foolish act. But I have digressed, and must return to what happened alter I heard the langur watchman's 'Ha-aah ! Har ! Har !'

Clambering down the tree, I crept forward with my rifle at the ready diagonally towards the spot from which the langur watchman was giving his warning. Knowing the tiger to have fed well, I did not anticipate it would attempt to molest the monkeys on this occasion, but that when seen by the watchman he was making his way towards one of the pools. Spear grass and 'wait-a-bit' thorn grew prolifically in this area and progress was both slow and difficult. Proceeding very cautiously about half a furlong, I caught sight of the langur watchman on the top-most branch of a wild-cotton tree, at the same instant as he saw me. He now had two possible enemies to observe, and I knew if I watched carefully enough I would be able to get a rough idea of the tiger's whereabouts by noting in which direction the langur was looking. I accordingly squatted down on my haunches in the long grass and 'froze'. The watchman looked in my direction for a few seconds, then looked away to his left, then back again at me, then back again left, still voicing his alarm.

I knew by these glances that he was watching both the tiger and me and judged the latter to be ahead of me by at least a hundred yards. Getting to my feet, and bent double, I shuffled forward as rapidly as possible in the direction I judged the tiger to be, much to the consternation of the already excited langur watchman, who could not make out whether I contemplated an attack against the tribe or against the tiger. His alarm call re-doubled both in tempo and volume, a fact which began to worry me as I knew the tiger was listening to him too, and would sense, by this increased excitement, some fresh source of danger to the monkeys and so also, perhaps, to himself.

And I was right. I covered the hundred yards rapidly, and after another twenty-five yards, I judged that I must now be pretty near the tiger and that it was time to redouble my caution. Momentarily, I glanced back at the langur watchman. He was looking intently in my direction, confirming the fact that both the tiger and myself were now in the same area of his vision. 'Freezing' again, I listened and watched minutely the space before me, and on either side. It consisted of the usual clumps of thorn-bush, interspersed by short glades of spear grass, about four feet high. As I watched, I saw a slight movement of the grass to my left, about thirty yards away. I raised myself in order to get a better view, and the tiger saw me. A low growl followed by two bounds, and he had disappeared. I knew it was now both futile and dangerous to follow him, having made him aware of my presence and the fact that he was being followed. Cautiously guarding my rear against a surprise attack, I crept back towards the thicket in which I knew the kill was lying, and I soon found it. The calf had been half-eaten; it was resting on its left side, sheltered by the grass and thicket from vultures, and very fortunately overlooked by a wild mango tree. I had now to make a quick decision. There was a chance of the tiger returning to his kill, in spite of having seen me, which I would miss if I were to lose this opportunity of sitting up for him. At the same time, I had not come equipped for a night vigil, and was carrying no torch, blanket or food. If I decided to sit up, I would have to remain in the tree till morning, as the nights were dark at that time and there was no moon. It would hardly be possible to negotiate the pitch-black forest and return to my car at Pulibonu, apart from the fact that I would be entirely at the man-eater's mercy. If I remained, I was in for a night of extreme discomfort in the bitterly cold breeze that would blow down from the escarpment, against which I could not shield myself. I thought of going back to the car to get the necessary things. The distance was roughly four miles each way, and I feared the tiger might come back in my absence and entirely remove the kill.

Finally, I decided to abandon all thought of personal discomfort and sit it out. Ascending the mango tree, I settled myself in its second fork, where I was able to be fairly comfortable with my back against a branch. I folded my feet crosswise, in Indian fashion, after removing my shoes, and stood the cocked rifle against the branch before me. From this position I had a clear view of the kill to my left, then an interruption by the branch before me, then another view, then a branch, then a view over my right shoulder at an angle from which it was impossible to shoot, and finally the branch against which my back rested. This precluded any view of the rear. At the same time, I was about fifteen feet from the ground and safe from the tiger's spring. To reach me he would have to pass the first crotch in the tree, where he would be almost at point-blank range. The time was 12.50 p.m., and I settled down to what I felt would become one of the coldest and most unendurable vigils of my whole career as a hunter, I will not weary my readers by recounting how the hours dragged by until 6.30 p.m., when the fowl and day birds of the forest had gone to roost, and the langurs had long since moved away from the hated presence of their two enemies, tiger and man. I was alone, except for an occasional nightjar that flitted, chirping, around my tree. At 6.45 p.m., it was almost dark. The nightjar had now settled below me, and commenced its squatting call of 'Chuckoo-chuckoo-chuckoo', when I met one of the strange experiences that sometimes, but very rarely, fall to the lot of a wanderer in the Indian forests.

I had been told stories by jungle men, and had also read, that tigers, in particular localities only, imitate sambar and emit the belling call of a stag, presumably to decoy other animals of the same species to them, particularly the does. I had never placed much credence in this story, and never experienced it myself. That evening, shortly after 6.45, the sudden solitary 'Dhank' of a sambar stag rang out from a thicket in the waning light, in the space still visible between the branch against which my rifle rested before me, and that immediately to the right, and from out of this thicket almost simultaneously stepped the tiger.

Now there could not have been any sambar stag in that thicket, along with or just in front of the tiger, for I could not have missed its hoof beats as it ran from the spot. No Sambar would have stood there and allowed the tiger practically to touch it in passing. Beyond that one 'Dhank' there was no other sound, when, as I have said, the tiger stepped into the open, and there was no possible doubt that the tiger had made the sound. Why it did so is a mystery, as it was not hunting. It had fed well earlier that morning and was now returning to another repast, so that there could have been no thought in its mind of decoying a sambar by imitating its call. I can only recount what actually happened, and what I experienced, and the fact that, beyond doubt, there was no sambar in that thicket when the tiger stepped out. I leave the rest to your own conjecture and conclusion. For my part, having heard it with my own ears, I have no alternative but to believe the old tales I had read and heard of a tiger's ability to mimic this sound.

The animal walked towards the kill and was lost to view behind the branch before me, which opportunity I seized to get my rifle into position. It then reappeared to my left, and very shortly seized the kill in its jaws and lifted it. My shot struck it squarely behind the left shoulder. It spun around to receive my next shot in the neck, then collapsed, kicked and twitched for another minute, and was still.

The tiger being dead, I now felt that it was safe for me to walk to the car, provided I could find my way in the darkness. With all the difficulties involved, I felt this to be preferable to sitting all night in the tree, cramped and shivering, with the cold and on an empty stomach. Abruptly making up my mind, I shinned down the tree without approaching the tiger, and hurried off to find the bed of the Kalyani River before total darkness set in, for I realized it would be possible, even in darkness, to stumble along the bed of the dry river which would ultimately bring me to Pulibonu and the car, although the distance would be about six miles through all the bends of the river. I would almost surely lose the narrow footpath, the only alternative, in the darkness, and have to spend the night in the jungle.

Trying to negotiate the stony bed of the Kalyani in darkness proved a real nightmare. On many occasions, I slipped on the rounded boulders that strewed the bed of the stream in profusion, or barked my shins against hidden tree stumps and rocks. More than once I was in danger of twisting an ankle, or perhaps breaking a leg in jumping from one boulder to another, and twice I fell while holding my precious rifle aloft to prevent dashing it against the rocks. The journey required absolute concentration, and it took me four hours to reach Pulibonu, stepping into the car at ten minutes past 11 pm.

You may suppose that in driving back to Nagapatla I was congratulating myself on having slain the man-eater. But in actual fact, I was not, for many circumstances forced themselves on my mind and made me uneasy as to the degree of success I had achieved. First, the tiger had killed buffalo bait; second, it had remained at that bait when discovered by me and then casually retreated, with me following; third, after becoming aware of my presence it had turned tail and fled; fourth, it had returned to its buffalo-kill; last, it had emitted a close imitation of a sambar's call. All these facts individually and collectively far from indicated the actions or behavior of a man-eater, but pointed instead to an ordinary tiger, more particularly a game-killer. The more I thought about it, the more doubtful I became that I had shot the man-eater. It was good for my peace of mind that, when concentrating on my struggle along the Kalyani River in the darkness, I had not had time to think of these things, or of how I had placed myself entirely in the power of the real man-eater, had he met me in those circumstances.

Next morning I returned with a party of men, carried the tiger to the car and brought it to Nagapatla, where general joy prevailed at the death of the man-eater. Before skinning the beast, I examined it very carefully and found it to be a flawless specimen of adult male tiger, with a beautiful coat and in perfect physical condition. This made me doubt even more that I had bagged the real man-eater.

That evening I left for Bangalore, spending the night with the Collector at Chittoor, to whom I recounted my misgivings, and extracted a promise that he would let me know by telegram should any human kills recur. On the afternoon of the eleventh day from that date, I received his wire, stating that a woman cutting grass, just within the boundary of the Reserve Forest forming the Chamala Valley, and within a mile of Nagapatla, had been carried away by the man-eater. I had failed. I had shot the wrong tiger, exactly as I feared, had been the case.

Next morning found me journeying back to Nagapatla, arriving at the little forest bungalow late that afternoon. Early the following morning, I was shown the spot where the tiger had attacked his most recent victim. The woman had been cutting grass, which she had gathered into a bundle preparatory to carting it away on her head. This bundle she had placed beneath the shade of a tree and was evidently in the act of tying it up, when the tiger, which had stalked her from the adjacent jungle, launched his attack. Another woman, who had also been cutting grass and was about a hundred yards away at the time, had heard a piercing scream, and, looking up, had been in time to see a tiger disappearing into the forest with her companion in its jaws. She had fled to Nagapatla and told the tale, whence news had been conveyed to Rangampet and onwards to Chandragiri, where the Tahsildar had taken immediate steps to inform the Collector at Chittoor, who in turn had telegraphed me. No attempt had been made to follow the tiger, or to rescue the woman. Three days had now elapsed since the occurrence, and the ground was too dry to reveal any tracks. Casting around in a broad semi-circle, we succeeded in finding the woman's saree, which had unraveled itself from her naked body and lay on the ground some quarter mile away. Blood tracks we could not find, showing that the tiger had not released its original grasp of her throat, for there had been no other cries from the unfortunate victim after her first desperate scream for help. We never succeeded in locating the remains of that woman.

Returning to the village, I procured the three remaining buffalo calves, which had been my baits on the last visit and had been left behind; I tied one close to the roadside by the fourth milestone, one at Pulibonu, and this time I tied the third only two miles from Nagapatla, in the bed of the Kalyani River before it entered cultivated areas.

The following morning all three baits were alive, but there were also tiger pugs along the Pulibonu forest road. The tiger had joined the track just before the third mile, passed my bait on the fourth mile without touching it, and had left the road again at the sixth mile, shortly before reaching Pulibonu, making eastwards towards a large, stony hill, known as 'Monkey-hill', that jutted out from the Tirupati block.

The pugmarks were distinct and revealed no deformity in the animal. Nevertheless, it had passed within a few feet of my live-bait, which I had tied by the roadside on the fourth mile, without even stopping to look at it, as the tracks very clearly indicated. This was certainly much more like the behavior of a man-eater, and I felt a sense of elation that at last I seemed to be up against the real thing.

As I have said, the tiger had gone towards 'Monkey Hill'. It was either sheltering on its jungle-clad slopes, or had perhaps skirted the base of the hill and rejoined the track towards Gundalpenta and Umbalmeru, and thence onward to the escarpment, further away. In any case, there was a faint chance that it might return along the road that night, and as now there was a good moon, nearing full, I determined to make an attempt to shoot the animal on this path. A large teak tree stood by the roadside some 150 yards from my bait at the fourth milestone. Like most of its kind, this tree had an upright stem practically impossible to climb, but by seating myself at its base with my back to the bole, I commanded a view of my bait, the road in both directions, and over a hundred yards on all sides, since that section of the forest had suffered from fire about a year before and was therefore free of undergrowth.

I took up my position by 5 p.m. As darkness set in the moon, which had just topped the trees to the east, restored visibility by casting its pale, silvery light over the silent forest. Although in daylight I considered that the position I had selected was quite safe, nightfall had its accustomed effects, and I began thinking of the possibilities of the tiger stalking me from the rear. Commonsense came to my rescue however, and told me this was impossible, unless the tiger first saw me, or heard me for tigers have practically no sense of smell. But to be seen or heard I would have to move first, so you may be certain I sat absolutely still and without a sound, with my back resting against that big tree. I could not smoke nor eat, but had taken the precaution of dressing warmly against the chill that would set in with the early hours of the next day. I remember that the jungle was exceptionally silent that night, leading me to conclude the tiger was not in the vicinity. As I had anticipated, the early hours brought with them a sharp drop in temperature, and as a consequence an equally sharp dewfall, till my clothes were soaking wet and the ice-cold barrel of the rifle streamed with moisture.

Several times, I glanced towards my buffalo-calf, to see how it was reacting. The first part of the night, it spent in placidly chewing the cut grass I had provided, but in the early hours, it settled down on the ground apparently to rest and get what warmth it could against the chill that had set in.

Dawn eventually came to the relief of a very dispirited hunter, and I made my way back the four miles to Nagapatla. Here a wash, followed by steaming tea, bacon and eggs, and two hours' snatched sleep, made me feel a new man again and fit for any eventuality. I motored up the road to Pulibonu, two trackers seated on each mudguard while I drove at a snail's pace, the men scanning the road as we went. But the tiger had not passed anywhere along it that night. Arriving at Pulibonu, we skirted the vicinity of the Kalyani River in both directions, as well as a mile up each of the tracks leading north-west and northeast, but again we found no evidence of the tiger's recent passing.

About noon, we returned to Pulibonu, where I sat down by the forest well to smoke and consider my plan of action for that night. Just across the Kalyani, and two furlongs from where I was sitting, grew a tamarind tree, which overlooked the bifurcations in the forest paths, leading respectively to Pulibonu, and branching off northeastwards to Umbalmeru and the escarpment. I had heard that several tigers had been shot from this tree in recent years; indeed, I had myself bagged a small leopard as it passed below me while I sat in that tree some eighteen months earlier, so that I eventually decided to commit myself to the safety of its sheltering branches for the next few nights, at least while the moon was on, in preference to the danger always present while sitting on the ground.

Having come to a decision, I instructed my two men to make a machan on the same branches I had occupied previously, and while they did so, I fell fast asleep at the foot of the tree. The men knew what they were doing, and some thirty minutes later awoke me to examine their handiwork and put the few necessary final touches. I always carry the frame of a charpoy, or Indian rope cot, constructed in two half-sections, in the rear seat of the Studebaker. Experience has taught me that this makes the best machan. It is light but strong, makes no noise even if you move about on it, is very comfortable, and most important of all, and lends itself to easy erection on any tree as a machan, easy concealment by a screen of leaves, and easy removal when the time comes to go home. Moreover, it is both cheap and portable.

This charpoy had been strung across two branches, to which it had been securely bound with cotton rope, which I also carry for such purposes. The whole had been well concealed by twigs, which had also been built up along the sides to provide further concealment for myself. An opening had been provided through which I could see the crack where it branched immediately below me, and also some 100 yards in each direction, towards both Pulibonu and Umbalmeru. A similar opening in the screen of leaves behind me allowed me to see the road back to Nagapatla for quite 200 yards.

All being to my satisfaction, I drove the men back to Nagapatla, had a hearty lunch and a further short nap till 4 p.m., when I got together the necessary blanket, water bottle, gun-torch, sandwiches and tea, and returned alone to Pulibonu, where I concealed the Studebaker in a forest glade adjoining the well. Walking back to the tree, I was settled for the night before 6 p.m. The hours dragged by practically undisturbed by jungle sounds till 11 o'clock, when a panther made its sawing call from the direction of the Umbalmeru track. 'Ah-hahl Ah-hah!' it sawed, the sound being an almost exact imitation of somebody sawing wood, the expiration and inspiration of breath at each double sound faithfully resembling the forward and backward motions of a saw in action. Then around the bend he strode, a beautiful specimen of 'Thendu', or large forest panther, the rosettes on his hide showing up clearly in the brilliant moonlight. He walked towards the tree in which I was sitting, crossed the road below it and disappeared into the forest on the other side. Filled with admiration, I watched the pretty sight, but let the animal go, for fear of disturbing the tiger which might hear my shot if he was anywhere in the vicinity.

Nothing further turned up that night, and the following night was exceptionally uninteresting, in that I did not hear or see a thing. Returning to Nagapatla next morning, I fell asleep, but was wakened about 10 a.m. with the news that a herdsman had been killed by the tiger scarcely half-an-hour before. Hastily dressing and grabbing my rifle, I followed the bereaved brother of the missing man and a few others for about three-quarters of a mile down the Pulibonu road, where we branched to the right and were soon on the banks of the Kalyani River. The man had been grazing his buffaloes in this vicinity, when the tiger had sprung upon him from the thicket of rushes, which here bordered the river. The man had screamed, and his brother, who was attending the same herd and driving on the stragglers, had seen the whole incident. In this case, the tiger had grasped his victim by the shoulder, so that it was possible for him to continue to scream as he was dragged away into the same bank of rushes from which the tiger had sprung. His brother had then run back to the village to spread the news, and on to the forest Bungalow where I was sleeping. Reaching the actual spot from which the man had been taken, we followed into the rushes, where the slightly bent reeds indicated the direction from which the tiger had approached, while a much more evident path showed how he had left, carrying his victim in his mouth. The victim's turban lay among the reeds, after traversing which we reached the dry bed of the river. The man had possibly been struggling, or his screams may have annoyed the tiger, for he had here released his hold of the man's shoulder and probably grasped his throat. From this place a fresh blood trail became evident, as well as a drag-mark, where the man's legs had trailed along the ground as the tiger hastened with its victim across the exposed sands that formed the bed of the river, into the jungle that clothed the further bank.

Cautiously advancing, we traversed the dense shrubbery that immediately bordered the river on its further bank and came out on to a grassy glade. The tiger with its burden, in crossing the glade, had bent the heads of spear grass and they had not yet had time to recover. Following along land that sloped slightly upwards, I crested a long hillock, beyond which the ground dropped sharply into a small stream as it wended its way to join the Kalyani further down. I felt that the tiger would decide to begin his gruesome meal in the hidden recesses of that stream, and at the moment was in all probability engaged on this task.

To follow the trail directly into the stream would be useless, as, no matter how cautiously I might move, I was bound to make some slight sound among the thorns that would put the tiger on the alert and acquaint him with the fact that he was being pursued. A man-eater in such circumstances is an extremely dangerous animal to deal with, and I knew that he had all the advantages of cover and concealment in his favor. He might decide to abandon his human victim and bolt, or even carry it with him; he might decide to remain by his kill and fight it out; most dangerous of all, he might decide to ambush me in the thick undergrowth, by launching a rear or flank attack. Very quickly reviewing the situation, I therefore decided to cut across to my right in a diagonal fashion, enter the stream about a quarter of a mile down its course, and then work upwards along the soft sand which at least would emit no sound if I covered it on tip-toe. By this means, I hoped to surprise the tiger on its kill.

Retreating accordingly across the small hillock I had just crested, I bent double on its further side, where I knew I would be lost to view from the nala-bed, and in this position, I shuffled forward as rapidly as possible for a furlong or so. Then again cresting the ridge, I noted the direction of the stream by the undergrowth along its banks, and descended in a half-right declination to meet it a furlong further down. Eventually reaching the sandy bed, I halted for a minute to regain my breath, after moving in the doubled position I had been doing, and then, with rifle cocked and held to my shoulder, I began to tip-toe up the soft sand, keeping as much as possible to the centre of the stream-bed and avoiding the thickets and bushes that clothed its banks. I will always remember that nightmare walk. The stream narrowed in places to ten yards; at its widest point it was never more than thirty. I tiptoed forward slowly, every sense alert, scanning every bush and shrub on both banks, looking below them and around them, and as far as I could see. Periodically, I stopped to listen intently, but no sound disturbed the abysmal silence, like that of the land of the dead. How I longed for the slightest living sound, the chirp of an insect, or the call of a bird ! Nothing but total silence enveloped me, broken only by the very faint, grating sounds of my own footsteps as I cautiously tiptoed forward along the sand.

I might have progressed about half a furlong in this way when the stream took a slight turn to the left. Before reaching this point, I halted in my tracks to listen, and it is well that I did so, for next instant, soundlessly and unheralded, appeared the tiger, carrying its human victim by the back, just 25 yards away.

The surprise was mutual. Evidently, the tiger had heard or sensed he was being followed, and without getting down properly to his meal had decided to convey it to some remoter spot downstream. On my part, although I had moved so cautiously at every step, I had not actually anticipated meeting the tiger just yet. Inaction for both of us was only momentary, however. Dropping its prey, the tiger sank its head between its fore legs, its hind-legs gathering beneath it, with tail erect, tensed for the spring. At the same time the rifle spoke, the bullet striking the animal, as I later discovered, just a half inch below the centre of a straight line between the eyes. But this slight inaccuracy was sufficient to have missed the vital brain-shot that would have dropped it instantly in its tracks, and with a gurgling roar, it rushed forward, lurching over its victim and stumbling onward in its stunned efforts to reach me. Leaping to one side, I fired round after round into the striped form, till I stood with empty magazine before the twitching monster at my feet, from whose smashed and mangled skull the blood literally spurted in a heavy red stream.

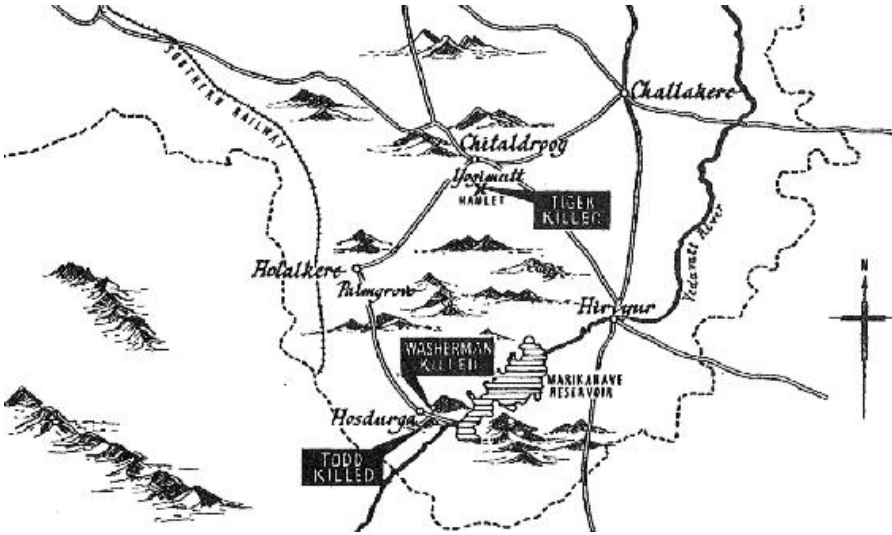
Next instant I felt faint and sick from reaction, I reached the bank, where for a moment I almost passed out. But a strong constitution came to my rescue and I was able to return to the men whom I had left on the main stream of the Kalyani; they had heard my five shots, which told them that now indeed the man-eater was dead.

You may be interested to know that, although we examined that tiger closely, both before and after skinning, and actually held a post-mortem on the carcass, absolutely no trace could we find of any physical or functional disorder or derangement that might have caused it to become a man-eater. Here indeed was a finely proportioned adult animal, able, from all the evidence that could be gathered by external examination, to hunt its natural food, the game of the forest, or even an adopted diet in the form of cattle from the village. But it had deliberately repudiated both these forms of food to follow a perverse taste for human flesh, which had eventually resulted in encompassing its end, and incidentally, very nearly mine. Where it had originally come from nobody knew, but all were glad that it had now gone to the jungles from which there was no return.

The Hosdurga-Holalkere Man-Eater



HOLALKERE is the second-largest town in the District of Chitaldroog, which itself is the northernmost district of the native State of Mysore and borders on the neighboring division of Bellary in the Province of Madras towards the north-east, and on the Province of Bombay to the north west. It has long been the centre of sporadic instances of man-eating by tigers, and there is good evidence to believe that the locality is the habitat of tigers, which have inherited a taste for human flesh.

About ten years ago, several instances of human kills were reported in this area, which was thrown open, by advertisement in the Mysore Gazette, to the free shooting of tigers without the requirement of a big-game license. At that time, there was a very sporting couple in Bangalore, Angus Mactavish and his wife, who were keen on killing a tiger, particularly a man-eater, and suggested to me that we make a party of three and spend some four weeks in the attempt.

Accordingly, we motored in Mactavish's car from Bangalore to Chitaldroog, the capital town of the district of the same name, where we called on the District Forest Officer to obtain all possible information about the most recent kills and where they had taken place. This Officer was most co-operative and informed us that the existing man-eater's beat extended from the very out skirts of Chitaldroog town itself to the town of Holalkere, which lay some ten miles away in a south-westerly direction, and thence southward nine miles to the small village of Hosdurga, where the two recent human victims had been taken.

From Hosdurga the line of the tiger's activities was re ported to proceed eastwards to the borders of the huge reservoir of Marikanave or Vani vilas, as it is sometimes known, five miles away, an enormous lake inhabited by huge fish and crocodile; all along the shores of this lake, and back northwards in a rough line to Chitaldroog town itself. Indeed, he assured us, the man-eater had been reported among the ruins of an old fort, which crested a small hill named Yogi Mutt, rising abruptly to the south of the town. I knew that the environs of this old fort had long been frequented by stray bears and panthers, with an occasional tiger, but after further consultation it was decided to move on to Holalkere and Hosdurga, where we would establish our centre of operations, as circumstances warranted, after hearing local reports.

Leaving early next morning, we reached Holalkere with in an hour, where the usual condition of nervous excitement and fear that accompanies the proximity of a man-eater always prevails. We were told all sorts of stories, some of them completely contradictory, and from this mass of statements were able to gather only that the man-eater was a very astute animal, wandered everywhere and had the knack of appearing unexpectedly at most unlikely places. A prevailing rumor was that it very often frequented a vast plantation of date palms, interspersed with a dense undergrowth of lantana that bordered both sides of the road leading from Holalkere to Hosdurga. This plantation commenced just beyond the outskirts of Holalkere itself. We were told that its pugmarks could be seen almost daily on the road, and were advised to motor up and down the nine miles that connected the two places all night, when we would surely meet the man-eater, sooner or later, particularly when passing the palm-grove. Accordingly, we set out at 7 p.m. that night, and had left Holalkere a mile behind when the tall, spreading leaves of the palm-trees came into view, the close array of their spiky trunks being entirely hidden from view at the base by a dense and continuous stretch of lantana undergrowth.

From this point, we motored onwards at a snail's pace, flashing the spotlight in all directions, while the gleaming headlights pierced the road before us. Proceeding in this fashion for a half-mile, we came upon what looked like a very black, hairy man who had climbed a palm-tree some 15 feet high to the right of us, and was busy gulping down bunches of the small, yellow half-ripe palm dates that hung in clusters from among the spiky fronds.

We approached closer and stopped the car, when this strange man began to climb down. Descending halfway, however, he stopped and looked around at us, and my companions were surprised to discover that their 'strange man' was a sloth bear, disturbed at a feast of dates. I had known from the onset that it was a bear, but had wanted my companions to learn for themselves. With her .3005 Springfield rifle, Mrs. Mactavish brought off a good shot from the car, dropping the creature to the ground with a resounding thud.

We then motored on to Hosdurga without seeing a thing, returned to Holalkere, and twice more backwards and for wards in each direction, seeing nothing beyond a hyena near the carcass of the bear on our final return journey. Fearing, therefore, that if we left the carcass there any longer it would be destroyed, by herculean effort the three of us managed to hoist the heavy body on to the space between the engine and the front mudguard of Mac's car. Although long, the hair of a bear is slippery, and it was most difficult to keep a firm hold of any part of the animal, which began to slip out of one's fingers as soon as its weight was lifted.

Next morning we had tea at t he Travelers' Bungalow at Holalkere, together with steaming porridge, bacon, and eggs, which Mrs. Mactavish prepared in excellent fashion. Then after skinning the bear, we decided to move on to Hosdurga to obtain first-hand information about the two latest human kills.

Traversing the date-palm plantation in day-light enabled us to realize fully the denseness of the surrounding, all enveloping lantana, which it was impossible to fathom the night before, and of what little hope there was to see or shoot a tiger in such a place. At Hosdurga, we were told the story of the two earlier tragedies. The first had happened some three weeks before. A girl aged eleven years, and incidentally a distant relation of the Amildar of the Taluq, was living with her parents in a house on the outskirts of the village. At 8 p.m. she had gone outside, probably to answer a call of nature, and had never been seen again, nor had any cry or sound, explaining her fate, been heard. Anxious about her failure to return, her parents followed with a lantern, but nothing was seen of her, nor were any marks evident on the hard ground. Becoming increasingly alarmed, they aroused the village, and in about two hours a party of some fifty persons, armed with lanterns, staves, hatchets and two-muzzle loading guns, went forth to search for the girl. Nothing could they find, however, in the darkness that night. Next day further efforts were made, and a few fragments of tattered underwear were found entangled among thorns a half-mile away. Nothing was ever found of the remains of that little girl.

The second kill had occurred twelve days ago, in the following fashion. The reservoir of Marikanave lay some five miles away to the east. About halfway to its shore, and crossing the track that led there, was a tiny brook that formed, close to the trackside, a small but fairly deep pool. This pool was used by two brothers of the village, who were professional 'dhobis' or washer men, as a convenient place in which to wash clothes. They possessed three donkeys, which were used for conveying the washing to and from the pool. That evening they had finished their task at about 5 p.m., loaded the donkeys and were returning homewards. These animals, being their only stock-intrade, so to say, were taken particular care of, one brother walking in advance followed by the three donkeys in line, and the other brother bringing up the rear. They were a mile from Hosdurga when a tiger leapt from concealment, seized the leading man and disappeared with him before he could utter a sound. His brother in the rear, seeing what had happened, lost his head and bolted back towards the pool, which they had just left.

When 8 p.m. came and neither the donkeys nor the brothers had turned up at Hosdurga, the two wives became alarmed and spread agitation throughout the village. By 10 p.m. a second search party of some three-score men, armed with lanterns, staves and, of course, the two muzzle loading guns, set forth in search.

In due course, they came upon one of the three missing donkeys, complacently sitting in the middle of the track, the bundle of washing still tied to its back. Farther on, a furlong short of the pool, they came upon the man who had turned tail and fled. He had fainted with terror at finding himself alone in the jungle after seeing what had happened to his brother, and was in a state of collapse. He frothed at the mouth and his eyes were turned upwards. It was nearly an hour before he was in a condition to whisper hoarsely the terrifying news. Together with him, the party then returned to the spot where the attack had taken place, when a half-hearted attempt was made to search for the missing man. Naturally, it proved unsuccessful and it was decided to return next day. Accordingly daylight found the party back again, when extensive search revealed bits of tattered clothing, a blood trail, and finally the remains of the unfortunate man, which had been three-quarters eaten during the night. All that was left was his head, two arms, one whole leg and just the remaining foot, which were duly gathered together and brought back to Hosdurga for cremation. Contentedly grazing a furlong from the track were the two remaining pack-donkeys.

An additional piece of news was now offered, in that four days ago a bullock cart, with a double-yoke of oxen, proceeding to Holalkere, had been attacked by a tiger three miles from Hosdurga at about 3 p.m. In this instance, the driver had jumped out of the cart and escaped, returning by a circuitous route through the forest to the village. A party had gone out next morning to find the cart, with one bull still yoked to it, standing by the roadside. Hardly 50 yards away lay what was left of the other bull, which the tiger had killed, wrenched free of the yoke, carried this distance and then eaten in full view of its unfortunate companion.

Along with all this news, we were also told that a rival party of two huntsmen was in occupation of the small one-room Travelers' Bungalow of which the village of Hosdurga boasted, having arrived by car some five days earlier. This indeed cramped our style, as it would not be cricket to commence attempts at shooting the man-eater when the other sportsmen had preceded us. Further, in keeping with the good old adage of 'too many cooks spoil the broth', too many huntsmen generally achieve nothing beyond frightening off their quarry, that is, if they do not in the meantime accidentally shoot each other.

It was nearing ten o'clock by the time we had gathered all this information, and we were just debating the advisability of returning to Holalkere, when the two sportsmen in question turned up. They were both youngsters, and although inexperienced, were exceedingly keen on the game. Introducing themselves, they repeated all the news we had already heard, and added that they had tied out buffalo bait for the last two nights in the vicinity of where the washer man had been eaten. Nothing had happened during the first night and their party of coolies had gone out that morning to ascertain how the bait had fared the previous night.

We wished these gentlemen the best of luck, and told them we would return to Holalkere so as not to be in their way. They would not hear of the idea, however, considered our action to be a personal affront and begged us to join them in the bungalow till the next morning, when, they stated, they were due to return to Bellary, where they had come from. In the midst of all this friendly talk, their party of coolies arrived to announce that the bait had been killed and half eaten the night before. Those two boys were the acme of hospitality and offered us the chance of sitting over their bait. Of course, we would not consent to this.

After a combined lunch, we set out with them to see the kill and render any possible assistance. We found the boys had chosen rather unwisely in tying their bait in a region scattered with boulders. Moreover, they had not secured the animal properly, with the result that the tiger had broken the tethering rope and dragged its victim partly behind a rock, and completely out of view of the tree in which they had intended to construct their machan. To the spot where the kill had been dragged were two possible lines of approach by the man-eater, if in fact it was a man-eater that had killed the bait; the first being from the direction of the track where the 'dhobi' had been killed, and the other from a hillock lying a quarter-mile away, approximately south-east of the kill. Two separate boulders, among the many that lay around, were so positioned as to command each a view of these possible lines of approach, as well as of the kill and of each other.

The two sportsmen therefore elected to sit, one behind each of these boulders. I ventured to suggest that, as the adversary they were dealing with might also turn out to be the man-eater, it would be safer if they sat on top of the boulders behind a concealing wall of thorns. They did not agree to this, however, and decided to sit on the ground with their backs to the boulders.

Roughly sheltering them behind a few cut thorny bushes, we left these doughty lads by 4 p.m. to return to the bungalow. I was anxious about their welfare and would have liked to linger within calling-distance, to render help if necessary, but finally decided that my presence might frighten the tiger off, and my motive be misunderstood.

Little did we know that afternoon, that our hearty good wishes for a lucky night were the last words that any of our party would utter to one of those fine boys. We spent the evening in the bungalow, drinking tea, smoking and chatting, while interviewing as many villagers as possible to gain additional information. A strong wind was blowing from the south-west, so that it would be impossible to hear any rifle shot fired by the two lads, who were over a mile away. We had an early dinner, and Mactavish and his wife then turned in. I decided, however, to sit on the verandah and listen to any jungle sounds I might possibly hear.

It was nearing 11 o'clock, the village had been silent for the past hour and I was thinking of going to bed, when I heard a peculiar noise, which I soon recognized as running, stumbling footsteps in the distance. Realizing that my intuitive fear of impending trouble, experienced so strongly earlier that evening, had not misled me, I hastily grabbed my rifle and torch and ran out to meet the runner. It turned out to be Ince, the elder of the two sportsmen. His clothes were tattered, he was lathered in sweat and staggered like a drunken man, looking behind him continually as he stumbled forward. Supporting him by the shoulder, I asked what had become of his companion. The poor boy was so exhausted that he could hardly speak, but he finally gasped out the awful words, ‘’Tiger got him carried him off, ooh ! ooh ! " and began to weep on my shoulder like a child.

I hurried him to the bungalow, where I awoke Mactavish and his wife. We gave Ince a stiff dose of brandy, laid him down and covered him with two blankets, for he was now shaking like an aspen with the reaction that had set in. Then, with Mrs. Mactavish chafing his hands, we impatiently waited for his story, and it was indeed an extra ordinary tale. He had sat below the rock commanding the approach from the track, while his companion, Todd, behind the other rock, commanded the approach from the hillock. Shortly before dark, Ince thought he had seen a long, red dish object move in the bushes quite some distance away and beyond Todd, where the land sloped gently down from the hillock. Of course, he had no means of apprising Todd of what he had seen, and knew that the latter did not know about it, as that area was hidden from his view by the very boulder below which he Todd was sitting. Ince had continued to watch the bushes, but had seen nothing there after.

Then darkness fell, and the hours passed wearily by until about 10 p.m. The kill was not visible in the shadows, although the stars shed a faint light that enabled Ince to see in his immediate vicinity. Suddenly Ince heard a faint thud, a slight dragging noise, and then the unmistakable sound of crunching bones. Guessing that the tiger had returned and was eating its kill, Ince waited awhile to give his companion a chance to take the shot, knowing, as he did, that the kill was equidistant, if not a little nearer to Todd, who must also be hearing the sound of the tiger feeding.

Nothing happened, however, and nobody will know why Todd remained inactive. Then the thought came to Ince that perhaps his companion had fallen asleep, and with that, he decided to take the shot himself. Aligning his rifle in the direction of the kill, he pressed the button of his rifle-torch, the bright beam immediately revealing a huge tiger devouring the remains of the buffalo.

At the same time, there was a piercing scream from Todd, a horrible growl from that direction, a slight scuffling noise, another half-muffled cry, and then silence. In the meantime, Ince had shifted the beam of his rifle-torch from the tiger and his kill to the rock, at the base of which Todd had been sitting earlier that evening. The last glimpse he had of the former was as it bounded away from the remains of the buffalo into the concealing shrubs.

Of Todd he could see no sign. Calling to his friend repeatedly, Ince rushed blindly to the spot where he had been sitting. Todd's rifle, water bottle and half-empty packet of sandwiches lay on the ground, but he was nowhere to be seen. Becoming hysterical with the realization that his friend had been taken by the man-eater, Ince floundered about and attempted to search the jungle for him, only to lose his own way. Demented with grief and growing more desperate each minute, he rushed aimlessly about when, by sheer good luck, he succeeded in stumbling on the track leading to Hosdurga, up which he had run top speed. It was now clear from Ince's story that we had two tigers to deal with: one an avowed cattle-lifter and the other an even more determined man-eater. They were probably a pair, male and female, although this was not necessarily so. Never in my life had I met such an unusual combination. The possibility that they were two grown cubs from the same litter, one of which had acquired man-eating tendencies, appeared to be ruled out by Ince's description of the cattle-lifter as a 'huge tiger' and by no means half-grown. The man-eater nobody had seen. Within fifteen minutes we aroused the village, and assembled some twenty rather reluctant helpers, although the owners of the two muzzle-loaders were again to the fore, with lanterns, sticks, staves and hatchets. Mrs. Mactavish insisted on coming too, and so did Ince, although he was almost spent. The search party, together with Mactavish and myself, were soon at the rock from which Todd had been taken.

Casting around, it was not long before we found an odd rubber-soled shoe that had fallen from his left foot. From the place where we found it we judged the tiger was making with its burden towards the little hillock from which it had apparently come. Pressing forward with all possible speed, we eventually reached a spot where the animal had first laid its victim down. From then, probably alarmed by the noise created by Ince in his shouting and floundering, it had moved on. As usual, a blood trail now commenced, which led us to the base of the hillock, which it followed towards the right-hand side. Led by Mactavish and myself, and keeping close together for fear of unexpected attack, we persevered in our search, but it was 3.30 that morning before we came upon what remained of poor Fred Todd. The tiger had eaten quite half of him, and it was a ghastly sight. A severe reaction now overtook Ince, who began to retch, wept and finally collapsed. It was past 6 a.m. that terrible day before we managed to get the remains to Hosdurga, together with a now totally incapable Ince.

We put what was left of Fred Todd into Mactavish's car, while I drove Ince in what had been his poor friend's motor, and we reached Chitaldroog by 9 o'clock. Here Ince was taken into the Local Fund

Hospital, and we spent the major part of the day on the tedious official inquiries that follow an incident of this kind, so that it was almost sun set before we returned to Hosdurga, and a very empty, silent Travelers' Bungalow. We fell asleep that night, sad and disheartened, but grimly determined on revenge. Mrs. Mactavish, in particular, had endured the nervous strain of the past twenty hours in heroic fashion, and was of untold assistance throughout the whole time. Early next morning found us back at the scene of the tragedy, where we spent the next three or four hours in piecing together the evidence. The ground was hard, as no rain had fallen for several weeks, and it was impossible to find an imprint of the man-eater to enable us to determine its size and sex. Ince's description of the cattle-killer led us to think it was a male. The man-eater was therefore, in all probability, a female, although, as I have said earlier, this was not necessarily so. Finding nothing in the vicinity, we followed the trail once more to the spot where we had found Todd's body, but nowhere could we see a solitary pugmark of the killer. We even attempted to look further, but the hard ground hid its secret well, and in spite of all our efforts, the man-eater's size and sex remained a secret.

During our absence at Chitaldroog, the vultures had completely demolished what had remained of the buffalo kill. We now had to make a fresh start in our operations. After due consultation it was decided to secure a fresh buffalo bait close to the original track where the washer man had been killed. Mactavish could sit over it, while I determined to lie prone on top of one of the boulders close to where Todd had been taken. Our plan was roughly this. Should the two tigers move in company, the cattle-lifter would kill the bait, when, in all probability, although a man-eater, the other tiger would not be able to resist the temptation of a feast, and would also join in. That would provide Mac with a shot. On the other hand, even if it did not join in, the man-eater would probably be in the vicinity; and as the rock on which I was going to lie was in a direct line with the hillock, and along the direction of his approach the previous day, I hoped to be able to hear and see him if he should pass near me.

As there were no trees along the track where Mac was to sit up, we solved the problem of protection by scooping a shallow hole in the earth, over which we decided to place an inverted 'Sugar-cane pan'. These pans resemble huge saucers, and are some six to eight feet in diameter, eighteen inches deep, and beaten from sheet iron about one-eighth of an inch thick. They are used throughout India as containers in which to melt the juice from the sticks of cane sugar, previously gathered by means of crushing through a press. This juice is boiled in the pan and becomes a golden brown liquid, which is then allowed to cool and solidify, before being cut into four-inch squares to form what is known as 'jaggery' or brown sugar. Jaggery is the only form of sugar used in Southern Indian villages, white sugar being unknown, and practically every village in any fertile area possesses its own cane-sugar plantations, with accompanying 'Sugar-cane pans'. We had already seen a few of them in Hosdurga.

It was not long before we were back from the village with one of these pans, carried by half-a-dozen men, a length of camouflaged tarpaulin, which Mac had brought in his car, and the other necessities for a night sit-up. This pan we inverted over the shallow hole we had dug and was raised from the ground at four points by rocks, so as to provide a six-inch gap for vision and ventilation, and a space through which to shoot. Over the pan we spread the camouflaged tarpaulin, covering this again with a sprinkling of sand dug from the shallow hole, and with a few thorns, cut-bushes, leaves, etc., to give it a realistic appearance. We made a good job of the whole effort, so that the pan looked no more, from a fair distance, than a small hump in the ground.

A further complication now arose as Mac was about to get in, when his wife insisted on sitting with him. We both did our best to dissuade her, but she was adamant, with the result that finally the men and I raised the pan at one end, allowed the Mactavishes to creep in, and then rearranged the whole affair. Actually, I felt it was quite safe inside, the inverted pan providing a sort of armored turret. The bait was then tied, and before going off to the rock on which I was to lie, it was agreed that, in case of need, we were to signal each other by three sharp whistles. I ascended my rock by 5 p.m., settled myself comfortably, and lay prone to await events. I recollect that the stone was uncomfortably hot after having been exposed to direct sunlight throughout the day. There was no sound as the hours dragged by and the forest seemed empty of any form of life. Even the familiar nightjar, welcome now, was absent. The silence was deep and complete, and the stars twinkled down on me in eerie stillness. I fell to thinking of poor Fred Todd, and of what had happened to him.

Midnight passed, when suddenly I heard a clear whistle, twice repeated. It was the agreed signal from Mac, and wondering what had happened to ail him, I slid down from the rock, switched on the torch, and cautiously approached the place where he and his wife were stationed. I came upon them standing beside the buffalo bait, which was alive and untouched. To one side lay the pan that they had over turned in getting out, and this is what they told me. They had seen and heard nothing till about midnight, when Mrs. Mac, sitting directly behind her husband who was facing the buffalo, thought she heard a faint sigh or moan behind her. Glancing around slowly, and endeavoring to look through the space between the pan and the ground, she had at first noticed nothing. Then she observed what appeared to be a boulder, as big as a bathtub, just six feet away. Remembering that there had been no boulder there earlier in the evening, she had brought her head closer to the opening, and was horrified to see a tiger, lying on the ground on its belly, its forelegs stretched out in front, intently meeting her gaze. Stifling the gasp of surprised horror that almost escaped her, she endeavored, by vigorous nudging, to attract her husband's attention. From his position Mac had seen nothing, and it was almost impossible for him to turn around, for the hole that had originally been dug for one person was too small to allow for the movement of two. Sensing by her continued nudges that something unusual was afoot, Mac had then made a determined effort to turn himself, with the result that the muzzle of his extended rifle contacted the edge of the pan with a slight metallic clang. There was a loud 'Woof' and a thud, as the tiger jumped lightly over the contraption. Knowing that they had been discovered and that no purpose was likely to be served by remaining any longer, they then summoned me by the agreed signal.

To remain longer was useless, so we decided to return to the bungalow at Hosdurga, leaving the bait where it was for the night, pending a decision on some other plan. Early next morning I dispatched a party of men to bring in the bait. They returned with the astounding news that the animal had been killed and entirely devoured. Hastening to the spot, we found their story true. Practically nothing remained of our bait but its head and hooves. Close examination of the ground revealed that two tigers had partaken of the meal, in close proximity, moreover, to the overturned sugar-cane pan and tarpaulin sheet, lying in a heap nearby, both of which had failed to frighten the beasts away.

The deduction to be drawn from this latest development was, therefore, that our man-eater was also a cattle-eater when opportunity offered. Alternatively, there was the possibility that three tigers were operating in the vicinity; a man-eater, and two cattle-killers. For the following night we decided to work to the same plan, tying a fresh bait a quarter-mile further along the same track, and to plant the sugar-cane pan beside it as before, this time making the shallow hole large enough to accommodate both Mac and myself. Mrs. Mac very reluctantly consented to remain in the bungalow. The camouflaged tarpaulin was spread over the pan, under a layer of loose sand and rubble, with grass, thorns and small cut bushes, to give the whole a very realistic appearance of a small rise in the ground. Mac and I sat back-to-back, rifles ready, with Mac facing the bait. On this occasion we also provided for a slightly greater aperture to allow more shooting space, by using larger stones at the four opposite ends of the pan.

Mac and I sat thus throughout three nights in succession, but we saw and heard nothing. But about 10 o'clock on the fourth morning, while we were having a nap in the bungalow, news arrived that a man had been killed a mile from Holalkere, in the same date-palm grove where we had shot the bear some days earlier, and almost at the same spot. Hastening there by car, we were both disgusted and annoyed to find that the relations of the latest victim had in the meantime removed his body for cremation, so that we lost the chance of sitting-up over this human kill, to which the tiger might possibly have returned.

We then procured another buffalo bait at Holalkere, and tied it within fifty yards of the place where the man had been killed. A convenient tree overlooked the road at this spot, and on this tree I erected a machan. As Mac was feeling a bit seedy, and was tired after his vigil of four consecutive nights, he decided to rest on that occasion and I sat up alone.

Again nothing happened, and 6 a.m. found me trudging the mile towards Holalkere with mixed feelings of tiredness, disappointment and disgust. Arriving there, I sent men out to bring back the bait. They came running back in half-an-hour with the news that, as they were about to untie the animal, a tiger had growled in the jungle within a few yards of them. They had then rushed pell-mell back to Holalkere, leaving the buffalo where it was.

Jumping into the car, we hastened to the spot and were truly surprised to find our bait still alive. This was very unexpected, as we were certain that the tiger, or tigers, would have killed the buffalo as soon as the fleeing men were out of sight. Taking a chance, I went up into the machan at once, instructing Mac to return to Holalkere. There was just a possibility, I felt, that the tiger might turn up.

Nothing happened, and as at 1 p.m. I was feeling both hungry and sleepy, I then got down, untied the bait, and walked along with it to Holalkere. That night, we retied the bait at the same spot, and I sat up once again. Mac and his wife went to Hosdurga in the car, and sat up together under the sugar-cane pan, beside the bait we had left there, in the spot where he and I had sat for three consecutive nights.

Again nothing happened, and by 6.30 am. they came along in the car from Hosdurga, picked me up, and proceeded to the bungalow at Holalkere, where we all went to sleep after lunch. At 4 p.m. we were awakened by a great hubbub. Restoring some order in the throng that had collected in the verandah, we came to learn that a company of a dozen men had left Holalkere before noon to drive a herd of cattle to Chitaldroog for market, intending to cover the intervening distance long before sunset. About three miles from Holalkere one of the cattle had strayed from the main road for a short distance of perhaps twenty-five yards. A man who had gone to drive it back was attacked by a tiger that had evidently been flanking the party, and was in hiding in the very bushes that bordered the roadside. Being cut off from retreat to his friends on the road, he had rushed up a rock that happened to be nearby. The whole scene had occurred in full view of the party, all of whom stood huddled together in a bunch and failed to render help of any sort, so stricken were they with fear.

The tiger had then sprung up the rock and fastened the claws of a forepaw in the man's thigh, attempting to pull him down. The man, continuing to scream for help, had clung with both hands to the branch of a tree that over hung the rock, to save himself from being dragged down. The first attack failed, and the tiger slipped backwards to earth, its claws practically peeling the skin from the man's thigh, till it hung like the skin of a partially stripped banana. Becoming infuriated, and no doubt urged on by the sight of human blood, the tiger then made a second attempt, this time fastening both its forepaws squarely in the body of the man and dragging him from his feeble hold. Once it got him down from the rock it had seized him by the neck and bounded off into the forest.

It was a matter of minutes to reach the spot by car. Evidence of the fresh tragedy was available in abundance, the bits of human skin and fingernails embedded in the broken branch testifying to the intensity of that last desperate hold. Spattered blood could be seen everywhere, and there was a distinct trail where the victim had been carried away.

We followed this up in all haste, the trail leading down wards to a valley of dense jungle. It was past 5 p.m. and we had exactly an hour to find the body before dark. Soon we discovered the usual pieces of tattered clothing, then a dark pool of blood where the tiger had deposited his victim, only to go on downwards into the dark valley. Perhaps six furlongs had been covered in this way when we came upon a low out-crop of rock, interspersed with bushes. I was surprised to find that the tiger had not yet stopped to begin its meal, as this was a quiet and secluded spot; but hardly had the thought entered my mind, when a distinct growl came from behind a large rock, followed by the sound of a small stone being dislodged, as the tiger bounded away before we could even see it. Rounding the bend, we encountered the corpse, weltering in its own blood, and about one-third devoured. Time was passing, there was no suitable tree nearby, and the only possible place to sit was on top of the largest of the neighboring rocks, which was about twelve feet high. This rock rose steeply on three sides and was fairly safe against a tiger's spring, but unfortunately it sloped on the fourth side, and still more unfortunate was the fact that this sloping side did not face the dead man but was a little more than a right angle from the body's position. This meant that if I lay on top of the rock I would have to keep a careful watch in two directions, namely, on the corpse below me to the left, and on the sloping side of rock to my right, for fear that the tiger might make a sudden rush up this and be on to me before I was aware of it. As I have said, I considered my rear, which faced one of the sides where the rock dropped steeply, fairly safe against a sudden spring, to do which the tiger would have to leap a clean twelve feet to the top of the rock. If he did not clear that height in one jump, he would have no hold at all and would slip backwards, which would give me ample time to shoot. No tiger, in my opinion, would risk such an uncertain jump.

Screening the top of the rock on the sloping side with a few small stones and bushes, I scrambled up, after telling the Macs to spend part of the night in driving up and down between Holalkere and Hosdurga in the hope of meeting the tiger on the road, in case it had abandoned the kill. With the departure of my friends and the villagers, I was now alone with the mangled remains that were strewn on the ground below me. The hours passed, while I kept an intent watch on the sloping rock to my right. The jungle beyond was hidden in darkness, and appeared just a blur in the hazy background, against which it was impossible to distinguish any animal smaller than an elephant. In the gloom the corpse to my left could no longer be seen.

At about ten o'clock a sambar belled in the distant forest a mile away. This was followed by a tiger calling, which was answered shortly by another tiger in the direction of the road from which we had come. The complexity of the situation was now fully apparent, as I thought the matter over during those silent hours. We had at least two tigers operating in the area, possibly three. Of these, one was a man-killer, daring, cruel and ruthless. The other was a cattle lifter, equally daring and cunning by nature. But this did not necessarily mean that either of the tigers refrained from indulging in both habits, when occasion presented. Again there was the possibility of a third tiger operating in the district, which might itself be a man-eater, or a cattle-lifter, or both. So far, due to the dry weather and hard ground, we had been prevented from picking up any distinguishing pugmarks to be able to identify these various animals. The tigers had ceased calling by now, and all was silent again in the surrounding forest except for the chirping of the tree crickets, the occasional hoot of an owl, and the periodic sound of a gust of wind bending the tops of the giant trees, a sound like the roar of a distant sea. Then suddenly, and without warning or premonition, it happened ! There was a thud against the rock behind me, a violent scratching and scraping against the stone, mingled with a snarling growl, and then another thud as the tiger fell backwards to the ground. Before I could turn and peer over the edge of the rock, he was gone. That man-eater had done the unexpected thing! Having somehow become aware of my presence, he had stalked me from behind and attempted a sheer leap of twelve feet to the top of the rock where I was lying. By good fortune he had failed to make it by a few inches.

I spent the rest of the night sitting up and fully alert, but nothing occurred. I waited till the sun had risen high next morning before venturing to scramble down and return to the road, as I feared the tiger, having discovered my presence, might be lying in ambush for me, but again my luck held out and I reached the road in safety, where Mac came for me in the car in a few minutes, having himself spent a fruitless night in driving up and down between Holalkere and Hosdurga.

Immediately upon arrival at the bungalow I instructed a party of men to return to the human remains and cover them with branches to protect them against vultures, as I intended to sit up again on the rock that night. These men were just setting out, however, when the relatives of the dead man arrived from his village and demanded the remains for cremation. I attempted to persuade them to allow the body to stay where it was for another day. They were adamant, and so any opportunity that might have presented itself of avenging the death of that poor man that night was lost to us through the obstinacy of his relations.

Two hours later, a party of men arrived from Hosdurga to inform us that our bait, which had been left tied near the sugar-cane pan for the past week, had at last been killed. Evening found Mac and myself sitting under the pan, and about midnight we heard a tiger moving around in the vicinity, by the intermittent low grunt it was making every now and then. We waited anxiously for it to come on to the kill but this it would not do, and kept circling the area for the best part of three-quarters of an hour. Quite obviously it had discovered our presence near the kill. A brave but foolhardy idea now entered Mac's mind, which was that he should get up and walk away to give the tiger the impression we had left and that his kill was alone. He hoped it would then approach and I could deal with it.

The plan was likely to meet with success, as you will remember that this is exactly what happened on the last occasion we had left the pan and our bait. At the same time it was a very dangerous thing for Mac to do, in view of the fact that the tiger hovering near might be the man-eater itself, or might be accompanied by the man-eater, as on an earlier occasion. It took me quite thirty minutes to drive the idea from the head of that stubborn but magnificently brave Scotsman, that to venture out in the dark jungle with a man-eater about would be to sign his own death warrant.

In the meantime the tiger continued to prowl around, but went off in the early hours of the morning, and we returned to the little bungalow at Hosdurga, after yet another night of disappointment.

Nothing happened the two following days, the nights of which we spent driving up and down between Hosdurga, Holalkere and Chitaldroog, flashing the spotlight in the hope of meeting one of the tigers on the road. Early on the morning of the third day a party of Lumbani woodcutters reported that they had been camped in the forest four miles away the previous night, in the protection of a huge campfire, around which they had drawn their five carts in a rough circle, and within which they and their five bullocks were sheltering. At dead of night the fire having burnt low, a tiger had crept past the carts and attacked one of the bulls. The rest had stampeded around, awakening the men, who had shouted and thrown firebrands at the tiger. It had then decamped. The bull had been bitten through the neck and severely scratched as well, but it was alive. At dawn they had come on to Hosdurga with four carts and the injured bullock, abandoning the fifth cart, which the bullock was too badly hurt to haul.

One of these Lumbanis, who had been in the area from childhood and knew the forest like the palm of his hand, mentioned that six miles away, in the heart of the forest, was a small stream leading to a clear pool surrounded by sloping rocks, under giant trees. It was in this locality, he asserted, that the tigers had their permanent abode. Now that it was summer, they spent the hours of noonday heat in this cool retreat, and invariably one or other of them would drink at this pool in the evening before setting out on its hunt for prey, or in the early hours of the morning, after returning from the hunt.

This man evidently knew what he was talking about, for intimate speech with him revealed that he was a poacher and a boot-legger to wit, who made quite a lot of money by illicitly distilling in the fastnesses of the forest a very potent liquor called 'arrack' from the bark of the babul tree. Evidently few knew of this place, and those who did dared not venture there, for fear of the tigers. The upshot of the conversation was that it was agreed Mac and I would leave with him after lunch that day to spend the evening, night and following morning at this pool.

3 p.m. found us at the spot, and a more likely tiger-haunt I have seldom seen. The pool was a small one, entirely surrounded by sloping rock, but the banks of the tiny stream that fed it amply revealed the presence of tiger, by repeated tracks that led down to and crossed it. A rough survey of these tracks indicated the pugmarks of two separate animals, a large male and an adult female. From the repeated reports of its large size, the former was in all probability the cattle-lifter, leaving now definite cause for suspicion that his companion, the female, might be the man-eater unless, of course, there was a third tiger in the party.

A wild mango tree overhung the pool at almost the spot where the stream ran in, and on the lower branches of this tree, at about the height of fifteen feet, we put up my portable 'charpoy' machan, which we had brought along with us for just such an occasion, carried by the Lumbani. 4.30 p.m. found all three of us sitting on this machan, it being dangerous to send the Lumbani away by himself, for fear of the man-eater. On account of the overhanging big trees, it was pitch-dark by 7 o'clock, nor did any animals visit the vicinity; no doubt they avoided it because of the habitual proximity of the Kings of the Jungle. The hours dragged by in solemn silence, disturbed once or twice by the distant calls of Sambar and Kakur, or barking-deer.

It must have been past 4 a.m. when we heard a slight sighing, moaning sound, and then the unmistakably heavy but softly muffled tread of a tiger on the carpet of fallen bamboo leaves that covered the sloping bank that faced us. Minutes passed, but we could see nothing in that stygian darkness. Then we heard the distant sound of the lapping of water from the edge of the pool down below in the darkness, and to our right.

The time had come, and as previously agreed, I gently nudged Mac to take the shot. Pointing his rifle in the direction of the sound, while I kept ready for a covering shot if necessary, Mac depressed the torch-switch and the bright beam streamed down upon the form of an immense tiger crouched over the water's edge. The beast looked up, his eyes reflecting the light in two large, gleaming red-white orbs, and then Mac fired. There was a roar as the tiger sprang into the air to turn a complete somersault and fall over backwards, biting the ground and lashing out in a furious medley of bubbling, snarling growls. Mac followed up with two more shots before the tiger rolled over, half into the water, to twitch in the throes of approaching death, then to lie still.

With the dawn we descended, to find that Mac had shot the male of the party. He was a truly magnificently proportioned tiger and a wonderful trophy, but we were all disappointed to know that the man-eater was still at large. Mac's first shot had struck the animal at the top of its nose, smashing the upper jaw and palate, and passing into the throat, which accounted for the bubbling sound we had heard with its snarls. His second shot had passed through the right shoulder and into the abdomen. The third had missed.

I will pass over the events of the next four days, during which no reports were received, and the local population began congratulating us on having slain the man-eater, the opinion of some being that it was this same tiger that had killed both man and cattle. But we knew better and lingered on, certain that sooner or later we would receive news of another human kill, unless of course the man-eater had left the area after the death of its companion. The nights of those four days we spent in driving along the road up to Chitaldroog, and along all passable forest tracks, in the hope of meeting the man-eater, but without success.

Shortly before noon on the fifth day came the news we had feared but anticipated, in the form of three runners dispatched by the Amildar at Chitaldroog to acquaint us with the fact that, late the previous evening, a lad aged fourteen years had been carried away by a tiger from a hamlet at the base of the southern slopes of the hillock of Togi-mutt', which I have already told you lay to the south of the town of Chitaldroog itself, and boasted an ancient, abandoned fort on its summit. Driving there by car, we visited the hamlet and were shown the small hut on its outskirts, from the very door of which the lad had been snatched at sundown the previous evening. As the country to the south of the hamlet was practically bare, there was good reason for believing, along with the inhabitants of the village, that the tiger had carried its victim up the hill, and was probably at that moment sheltering in the ruins of the fort. No organized attempt at searching for the body had been made and only four hours of daylight remained to us when we assembled a party of half-a-dozen men and began to climb the hill.

It was soon apparent that the tiger had not carried its victim up the main footpath leading to the top of the hill, which we more than half ascended without finding a vestige or trace of the victim. Climbing neighboring boulders as we advanced, I instructed men to look in all directions for anything that became visible, and when about three-quarters of the way up one of these men reported vultures sitting in a tree about a quarter-mile to our left. Scrambling across the intervening rocks and thorny bushes, we eventually came upon the remains of the boy, completely devoured, by this time, by the vultures.

There appeared little use or hope in sitting up over the bones, especially as we knew from experience that the killer seldom returned to such a meal. Nevertheless, Mac and two men put up my machan on the tree on which the vultures had been sitting and decided to remain there, while I felt I had just enough time to ascend the rest of the hill and look among the ruins. Regaining the path, I hurried upwards, and reached the ruins just after 5 p.m. The walls of the fort had long since crumbled into decay, and a sea of lantana and thorny undergrowth covered the area as well as the old moat that lay outside. At this point, the remaining four men in the party elected to remain outside; to await my return they ascended to the top-most branches of a tall fig-tree., the gnarled roots of which bit deep into the debris of the fort's wall.

Proceeding cautiously, I endeavored to keep on top of the fallen wall, as far as it was negotiable, in order to maintain some elevation above the surrounding lantana, which was both impassable as well as dangerous to enter, as I would not be able to see the tiger in that undergrowth even were it but a yard away. Progress was most difficult and strenuous, and by the time I had reached the opposite end of the fort, I was breathing heavily from my exertions and bathed in perspiration. Here I faced the sun as the golden orb neared the western horizon.

Years ago I had been over the same fort, and I knew that about this spot were the almost-completely engulfed remains of walled enclosures and what had been dungeons in the distant long-ago. Because of these structures the wall at this point became impossible to follow. I was loath to step down into the lantana, but it soon became apparent that I would either have to do this and struggle through a distance of about one hundred yards to where the wall began again, or retrace my steps. Time was also against me; so to avoid delay I finally decided to risk the lantana, which I commenced to push my way through, as silently as I was able. But this soon turned out to be impossible, for the lantana twigs, covered with minute thorns, clung to my clothing at each step and made considerable noise as I broke my way through.

I knew I was now opposite the remains of the dungeons and enclosures, and that here, if anywhere in this deserted ruin, was where the tiger would most likely be hiding. At the same time, no doubt keyed up as I was by the unfavourableness of my position, my tensed nerves and senses signaled the proximity of danger. A sixth sense cried out that the tiger was near and on my trail, watching me for the moment of attack, which would take place very soon if I did not escape from the lantana. I had felt these warnings too often to ignore them, so while trebling my vigilance and looking in all directions, I pressed forward to higher ground. Thirty yards more twenty yards more fifteen yards more and then from the lantana to my left rose the snarling head of a tiger, its ears laid back in preparation for the spring, its jaws wide open to reveal the gleaming canines. My bullet crashed into the wide-open mouth, as the animal launched itself forward. Rushing blindly on to gain higher ground, I all but lost my eyes in the intervening lantana, the thorns tearing my flesh and clothing, while pandemonium broke loose behind me.

With the back of its head blown out, that tiger tried to get me, and when I had covered those remaining fifteen yards and spun around, it was but two yards away, with a great gaping red hole where half its skull had once been. Almost beside myself with terror, I crashed a second, third and fourth bullet into the beast and as, shattered, it toppled on its side, I sat on a piece of the ruin, shaken, sick and faint.

Ten minutes later I struggled to my feet, and avoiding the bloody mass before me, returned to the tree where I had left the four men, by completing the circuit of the remaining fort wall.

Hearing the four shots and the snarls of the tiger, they had concluded I had been killed, and were debating whether to come down from their tree and hasten back to their hamlet, or spend the rest of the night in its branches. It was quite obvious they had never expected to see me alive again. Collecting them, we had hardly covered a furlong when we were met by Mac and the other two men. From where he was sitting, he too had heard my four shots and, like the staunch friend he was, had hurried forward to give any assistance I might need. As it was, seeing me tattered, scratched and bleeding from my rush through the lantana, his ruddy face drained to a chalky white and he ran for ward to hold me, thinking I had been mauled. Squatting there, I told him what had happened, while I puffed clouds of smoke from my cherished briar and received his warm congratulations. Indeed, I could not help remarking, as I smoked that soothing pipeful of tobacco that I had never expected to smoke again, when I saw that terrible face, contorted with its lust to kill, but a few feet away.

Later that night we carried the tiger down, hoisted it on the car and took it to Chitaldroog town. As we had expected, it proved to be female and was undoubtedly the man-eater that had killed the boy. Its aggressiveness to wards me also justified this conclusion. Early next morning, while skinning the animal, we were visited by the Amildar, who wanted to see the devil that had killed his relative, the little girl at Hosdurga, by the District Forest Officer and no other officials, and by hundreds of the inhabitants. It was late that evening before we could leave for Bangalore with the skins of the two tigers that had formed such an exceptional and unheard-of combination, as cattle-killer and man-eater hunting together.

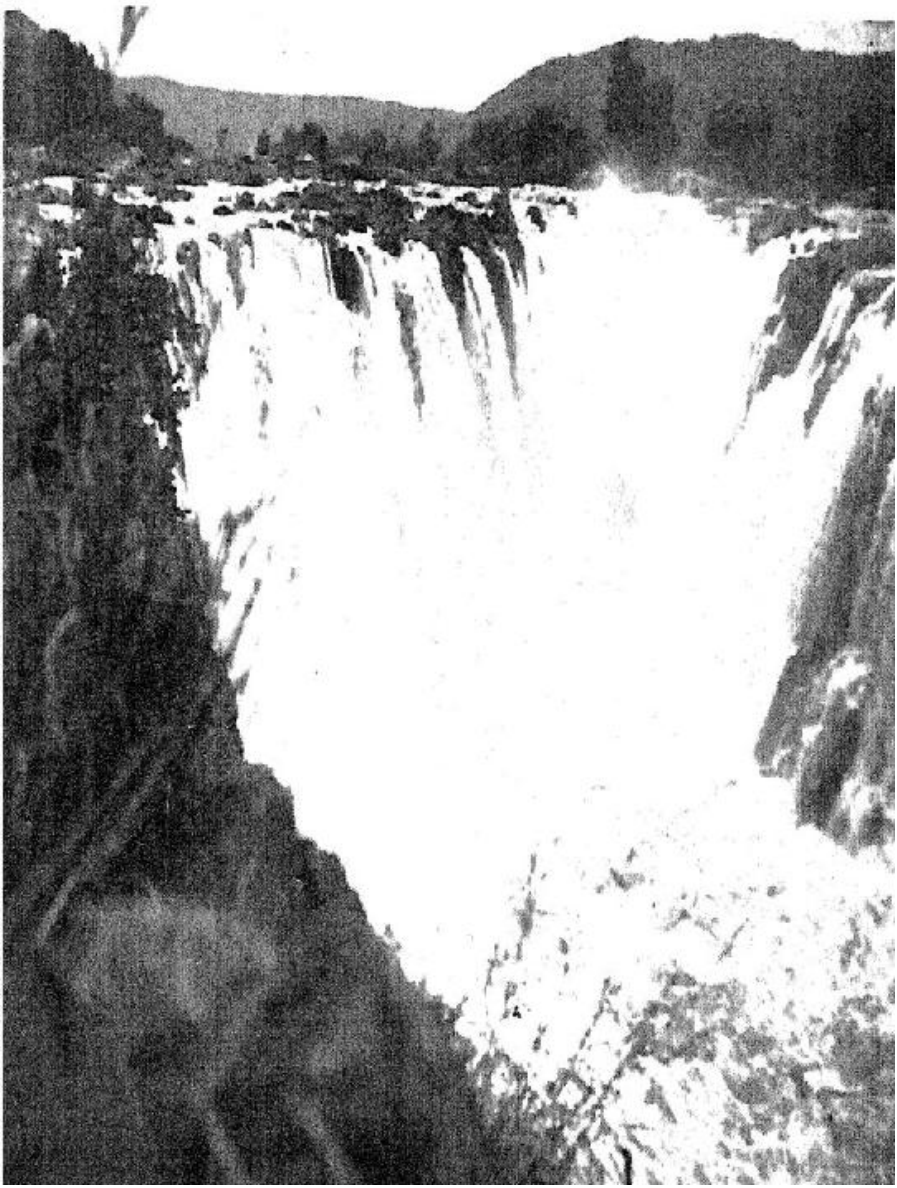
Incidentally, skinning the tigress revealed no sign of the reason for her having become a man-eater. As I have already said, this district had a long history of man-eaters behind it, extending for generations past, and I am of the opinion that this tigress came of man-eating stock. Such an explanation would also account for her mate, the big male that Mac had shot, being a normal cattle-lifter that had not touched human flesh. The tigress had probably only met this male during the mating season that was just over it lasts from November to January and had not been with him long enough to infect him with her man-eating habits. Had she littered she would have undoubtedly have taught her cabs the taste for human flesh, just as she herself had been taught, and so have extended the generations of man-eaters of that district.

The third tiger, whose existence we had suspected, never materialized, for before leaving we left word with all the officials, as well as people, to inform us at once if a third tiger was heard of. This was because we felt there was always the remote possibility that the third tiger might also be the man-eater. But months passed and we received the glad tidings that all reports of man-eating had ceased throughout the district after the killing of that tigress on the summit of Togi-mutt'.

Fred Todd, and the rest of her victims, had been avenged.

The Rogue-Elephant of Panapatti

The Falls of Hogenaikal, with the Cauvery River in flood



A shikar party prepares to cross the Cauvery River as sun sets.

HE was a small animal, as rogue elephants go, standing about seven feet and a half in his socks. This could be gauged by the tracks of his forefoot, twice the circumference of which gives, to within a couple of inches, the height of an Indian elephant. But what he lacked in stature he made up for in courage, cold calculating cunning, and an implacable hatred of the human race, whom he had evidently made it his ambition to decimate, as and when the opportunity presented itself.

He had one tusk, about 18 inches long, while the other had been broken off short, by (it was said) the big leader of the herd inhabiting the banks of the Cauvery River and the jungle fastnesses that comprised the forest block of Wodapatti, in which was situated the cattle-pen of Panapatti, in the district of Salem. This youngster, before he became a rogue, had evidently been ambitious and was more than normally high-spirited, for he had thrust his unwelcome attentions upon the ladies of the herd under the very eyes of their lord and master. A warning scream of resentment and rage from the leader had had no salutary effect, and the youngster had offered battle when the tusker had attempted to drive him away.

This had led to a major encounter, in which years, experience and greater weight had told heavily in favor of the leader. The youngster had eventually bolted, battered and beaten, with vicious gashes in his sides, inflicted by the powerful tusks of the bigger male, while one of his own tusks had been snapped off short in the fray, no doubt to give him bad toothache for many days to come.

He had wandered in this condition, morose and surly, in the vicinity of the herd, but never daring to enter it, when one day, as he was walking down a forest cart-track, he had turned a corner to come suddenly face to face with a buffalo cart, laden with bamboos that had been felled for the contractor. A blind rage had seized him at that moment, together with a deep urge to get his own back on something. Madly he rushed at the cart, and the driver just escaped by jumping off and fleeing for life. But the unfortunate buffaloes were yoked to the heavily laden vehicle and stood helpless to the onslaught. The rogue for rogue he had now become proceeded to smash the cart to matchwood, before turning his attentions on the buffaloes. One he seized by its long, curving horn, and flung bodily down the embankment that bordered the track, where it was found next day with its horn torn out from the roots; one of its fore-legs had suffered a compound fracture, and the broken, exposed bone had dug itself into the soft earth with the force of the fall, so that the weight of the animal effectively anchored it to the spot. The remaining buffalo it had gored with its one tusk, but this animal had bolted down the track, dragging the broken yoke of the cart behind it, and so escaped the fate of its less fortunate companion.

Thereafter the elephant steadily worsened his reputation, and many an unfortunate wayfarer to the river had gone to his death beneath its massive feet or, caught by that terrible trunk, had been beaten to pulp against the bole of a forest tree.

My first experience with this animal was by accident. I had gone down to Hogenaikal, on the banks of the Cauvery River and about four miles from Panapatti, for a weekend’s mahseer fishing and to secure a crocodile if opportunity presented. As rumor had it, at that time the rogue was not in the locality, having crossed the river to the Coimbatore bank in wake of the elephant herd, which had wandered there in search of fresh pasture.

In the evening of the second day, after having met with indifferent fishing, I had returned to the forest lodge for tea, when the call of a peacock close at hand had tempted me to go after the bird, which I hoped would make me a tasty roast for that night's dinner. Slipping a couple of No. 1 shot into the breach of my shotgun, I cut diagonally across the forest to the glen where the peacock was calling. Reaching it, I stepped cautiously forward in an effort to locate my quarry, eventually arriving at the dry bed of the Chinar stream, a tributary of the Cauvery River, which it joined a mile further down.

My rubber-soled boots made no noise on the soft sand. I could hear the rustle of the peacock's feathers as it preened its tail somewhere behind the bushes on the opposite bank, and was just tiptoeing across the stream, when a shrill, trumpeting blast smote the silence, to be followed by the crashing bulk of the rogue as it broke cover fifty yards away and swiftly bore down on me. Realizing the futility of attempting to escape by running away for elephants can cover ground at an astonishing speed and I had no chance of out-distancing him, because of the hampering soft sand and clinging thorny shrubs of the neighboring jungle I covered the curled trunk in the sights of my shot-gun and fired both barrels at a range of about thirty yards.

The noise of the report and the stinging missiles stopped him momentarily and, while he screamed with rage and defiance, I fled up the path by which I had come, carrying my empty gun, at a pace I had never thought myself capable of attaining. Arriving at the Forest Bungalow, I seized my rifle and ran back again. But there was nothing to be seen on the deserted sands of the Chinar stream, and upon approaching the spot I found the rogue had swerved into the forest on the opposite side, where I did not care to follow him, as night was approaching. The next day I had to return to Bangalore on business and could not possibly extend my stay, so I left the honors of the first round entirely to the rogue of Panapatti.

This creature, through his notoriety, had been declared as an undesirable or 'rogue' elephant by the Government, and official notification had been broadcast by the Forest Department, both in print and locally by beat-of-drum, or 'tom-tom' as it is officially called, offering a Government reward of Rs.soo (about £34) for its destruction. An Indian gentleman of the locality then very bravely determined to put an end to the elephant's career and claim the reward. The details of his attempt as I later pieced it together were as follows.

Armed with a .500 double-barreled black-powder Express rifle, which had seen better days, he arrived at Panapatti and was told that the elephant was wandering in the adjacent Wodapatti Forest Block. The same Chinar stream, on the bed of which, near Hogenaikal I had nearly met my end beneath the monster's feet, curves gracefully past Panapatti and meanders through the forest, its north-western bank forming the boundary of the Wodapatti Reserve, and its opposite bank that of the Pennagram Block.

The Indian gentleman of whom I am speaking, having tried for two days without success to meet the rogue, spent the night of the third day in his tent about two miles with in the Pennagram Block, away from the Chinar Stream and the Wodapatti Range, out of which the elephant was said never to stray. But as a precaution he had his followers build a ring of campfires around their two tents, and the men were given instructions to keep plenty of firewood in reserve for replenishing and stoking the fires during the night watches.

All then being peaceful, he apparently fell fast asleep; so, evidently, did his followers. In the early hours of the morning the rogue came upon this peaceful scene. The fires had perhaps died low, with just their embers glowing. Normally, no elephant or any other animal will go anywhere near a fire. But the sight of the white tent and the urge to destroy proved too strong for this beast, for he carefully made his way through at a point where there was no fire and rushed upon the tent with a scream of rage.

The camp followers awoke at the pandemonium created and, realizing the demon was upon them, scattered and fled in all directions. The unfortunate occupant of the white tent had no chance to use his timeworn Express. The structure fell about his ears and was trampled flat beneath the huge bulk of the elephant, which then proceeded to tear it to ribbons. It was while engaged in this congenial task that it came upon the hunter, alive or dead at that time, nobody knows. Curling its dreaded trunk around him, it carried him off in triumph to the clearing of a forest line, which passed nearby. There it literally rubbed him into the ground beneath its huge feet, till nothing remained of the human body but a pulpy mass of bloody flesh and crushed bones, mixed with sand from the forest line. Finally, not liking the smell of blood, it tossed the bloody mass far away and returned to the fastnesses of the Wodapatti block.

As a result of this incident, the Government reward was doubled to Rs. 1ooo/-, while I determined to begin my second round against the elephant. Arriving at Panapatti, I visited the scene of the recent tragedy, where I could not help wondering at the audacity of the bloodthirsty elephant in actually penetrating the circle of fires. The spot nearby, where it had rubbed its victim into the ground, was also clearly evident, although the remains had long since been demolished by vultures. Returning to Panapatti, I requisitioned the aid of one of the cattlemen from the adjoining cattle-pen, who was also a fair tracker, to help me find the animal. Tracks there were a-plenty across the sands of the Chinar stream, but the problem was to find and follow one that had been freshly made. This it was impossible to do, for the good reason that the elephant had evidently made off from the vicinity, and was either somewhere within the Wodapatti block, or had wandered across the low hills to the main Cauvery River, which flowed, as I have stated, some four miles away.

The Wodapatti bank was clothed, for a couple of miles down the Chinar stream, with a species of tall flowering grass, whose roots subsist on sub-soil moisture and which attained a height of ten feet in places, topped by beautiful heads of flowering stems which somewhat resembled the flowering heads of cane-sugar, but were of greater length and much finer texture. In the early mornings, droplets of dew, which had gathered overnight on the fine strands of these flowering heads, glittered in the rays of the rising sun, giving a fairy-like appearance to the graceful fronds and a vision of beauty and peace, which entirely belied the danger that threatened upon entering the grassy belt. The stems had grown to such height and thick profusion that one could not see more than a yard ahead, and to walk through the grass, one had to part the stems with one hand, holding the rifle in the other. A herd of elephants might have lurked within, and nothing could have been seen of them until almost within touching distance. The tracks made by the rogue in his previous excursions were marked by crushed and bent stems, and even these were rapidly reassuming their upright positions. The grass belt varied in width from 100 to 200 yards.

As the hills at this point abutted the Chinar Stream, the jungle was represented by giant bamboo, traversing which was almost as dangerous as crossing the flowering grass. Fallen bamboos lay in profusion everywhere, their spiky ends impeding both advance and retreat. The tall boughs, clothed with their feathered leaves, curved gracefully overhead, bending and creaking to the forest breezes. We spent four whole days searching for the elephant, laboriously traversing the grass belt and the bamboos, crossing the range of foot-hills and descending their further slopes till the purling waters of the Cauvery River flowed past our feet as it hastened to the falls and cataracts at Hogenaikal, the great Mettur Dam some 35 miles down stream, then the eastern plain of Erode and the city of Trichinopoly, and finally the distant Bay of Bengal. In all this time, never a fresh track of the rogue did we see. The afternoon of the fifth day found my guide and my self again on the banks of the Cauvery River, when I decided to follow the bank upstream in the hope of finding some trace of my quarry. We had advanced with considerable difficulty about three miles, stepping over the giant roots of the tall 'Muthee' trees that clothed the bank and ran down into the water for sustenance, interspersed with brakes of tall flowering-grass, when we came upon the fresh tracks of an elephant which had evidently crossed the river early that morning from the opposite bank of the Coimbatore District. Rough measurements revealed that they tallied with the spoor of the

Tracking now became easy, for we had a definite trail to follow, and the footprints and heavy bulk of the elephant had made a clear path through grass, bamboo and undergrowth.

The spoor led up and across a small foothill, near the top of which we came upon a heap of dung. Although quite fresh, this lacked that warmth to the touch, which would have shown that it had been very recently cast. So we followed on, down into a deep valley. Here we found still fresher dung, but not warm to the touch, which showed that our quarry was yet some distance ahead. We struggled up the adjoining slope and across two more foothills, and then observed that the tracks suddenly slued round and made back in the general direction of the Cauvery River.

We were overcome by a fear that the animal had escaped us by returning across the Cauvery. Going forward as fast as possible, we came upon another heap of dung together with the mark of urine, which had soaked, into the ground. But this time minute traces of froth showed in the sand and the dung was warm to the touch. At last our quarry was not very far ahead, nor was the Cauvery River ! Our further progress turned almost into a race to reach the river at the same time as the elephant, and before it crossed out of rifle range. From fallen branches, oozing with freshly flowing sap, we could observe that the pachyderm was grazing casually as it approached the river.

Finally, a sharp dip in the land and a murmur of sound told us that we had almost reached the river's bank, and soon the glint of water between tree-stems told us that we were there. Silently and cautiously we crept forward. The sand became soft. Then we noticed that the elephant, instead of crossing, as we had feared, had changed its mind and walked upstream and across a grassy bank. Here it was apparent that the spoor was very recent, for the tender blades of grass were fast embedded in the moist ooze, from which bubbles of air burst before our eyes. We had gone another 150 yards when we observed that a creek lay ahead, and as we came abreast of it we heard the noise of splashing and the hollow sound of air being blown through an elephant's trunk. Our quarry was having a bath.

Fortunately, the little breeze that blew was in our direction, and as we parted the intervening twigs and stems of grass, we saw an elephant lying on its side in the water, but facing away from us. In this position, it was impossible to tell whether the animal was the rogue, or a wandering elephant from among the several herds that inhabited both banks of the river. So we settled down to watch. After a further five minutes of snorting, blowing and splashing, the animal suddenly rose and began to walk in a leisurely way across the creek. In all this time it had not shown its head, nor had we been able to see whether it had two tusks, or a broken stump at one side. The situation now called for early decision, as once the elephant reached the thick verdure clothing the opposite bank of the creek, it would be lost to view. So I snapped my thumb and finger twice in quick succession. The sound, infinitesimal as it must have been, penetrated the keen hearing of the elephant. With a swish and a swirl of water it spun around, and there before us stood the 'rogue of Panapatti', the stump of his broken left tusk clearly in view, while the right tusk, small as it was, curved viciously up wards. Within a second his small eyes located us, his trunk curled inwards, and with his head raised and his small tail sticking out ridiculously, screaming with triumph and hate, he charged across the intervening water, bent on yet another lustful killing.

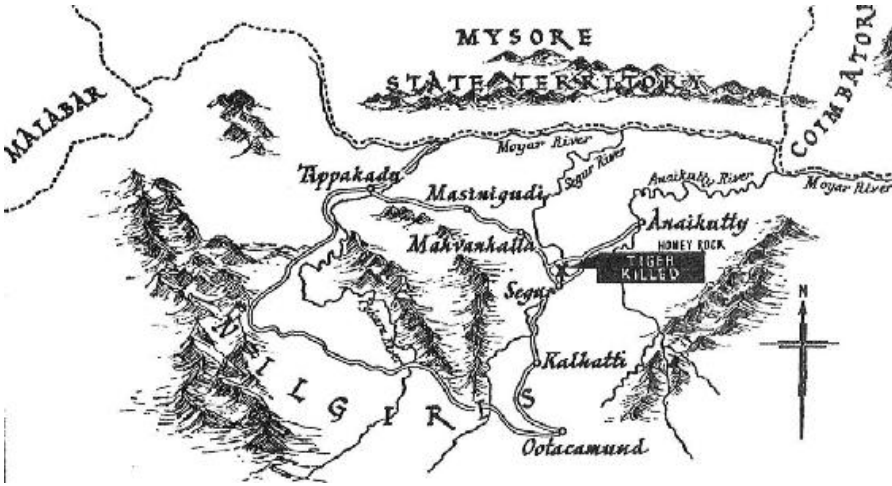
My .405 spoke once, the heavy solid bullet speeding straight to its mark beneath the coiling trunk and into the throat. The animal stopped dead in its tracks, while gout of blood spurted from the severed jugular. It turned sideways in an attempt to make off, when two more rounds both found their marks in vital places, one in the soft depression of the temple, and the other behind the huge ear as it flapped forward.

The great bulk stood still, then shivered as if stricken with terrible ague, and finally collapsed, as if pole-axed, in the shallow waters of the creek, which rapidly became reddened with blood, as the rays of the late afternoon sun vanished beneath the rim of the towering peak of mount Ponachi Malai on the Coimbatore bank, sending streaks of crimson light into the orange sky.

The Man-Eater of Segur



THE hamlet of Segur is situated at the foot of the northeastern slopes of the well-known Nilgiri Mountains in South India, or 'Blue Mountains', which is what the word 'Nilgiri' literally means. On the summit of this lovely range stands the beautiful health resort of Ootacamund, at an average elevation of 7,506 feet above mean sea level. This 'Queen of Hill Stations', as it is affectionately termed, is the focal point of visitors from all the length and breadth of India. Ootacamund has a charm of its own, with a climate that allows the growth of all types of English flowers and vegetables to perfection. The all-prevailing scent of the towering eucalyptus ('blue-gum') trees, which is wafted across the station from the surrounding plantations, mingled with that of the fir and pine, makes memories of 'Ooty' unforgettable, and with its cool climate gives a welcome change to the visitor from the heat and enervating temperature of the sweltering plains far below.

A steep ghat-road, 12 miles in length, leaves Ootacamund, and after passing through graceful, rolling downs, where foxhunting was once a pastime of the English residents the local jackal taking the place of the fox drops sharply downwards to Segur, at the foot of the range, where dense tropical forests prevail. The road is so steep in places as to be almost unusable, except to motor cars of fairly high power. At Segur the road bifurcates, one branch running northwestwards through dense forest, past the hamlet of Mahvanhalla and the village of Masinigudi, to meet the main trunk road, linking the cities of Bangalore and Mysore with Ootacamund, at the forest chowki of Tippakadu. The other bifurcation leads eastwards through equally dense forest, along the base of the Blue Mountains, to the forest bungalow of Anaikutty, nine miles away. Two perennial streams water this area, the Segur River and the Anaikutty River, both descending in silvery cascades from the Blue mountains; here their waters run through giant tropical forests to join those of the Moyar River, some fifteen miles away. The Moyar River, or 'Mysore Ditch', as it is known, forms the boundary between the native state of Mysore on the north, the district of Coimbatore on the northeast, and the Nilgiri Range with its foothills on the south, both Coimbatore and the Nilgiris forming part of the Province of Madras. The evergreen forests of the Malabar- Wynaad extend to the west and south-west.

The Purling waters of the Anaikutty River

All the areas mentioned are densely wooded, hold game preserves on the Mysore, Malabar, and Nilgiri sides, and are the habitat of large numbers of wild elephant, bison, tiger, panther, sambar, spotted-deer and other animals. The forest-bungalow of Anaikutty is built on a knoll, past, which run the swirling waters of the Anaikutty river. In summer it is an unhealthy place, full of malarial mosquito, and the origin of many fatal cases of 'black-water' fever. In the winter it is a paradise. The mornings are fresh and sunny, ideally suited to long hikes through the forest. The afternoons are moderately cool. The evenings chilly, while with nightfall an icy-cold wind descends from the mountaintops to take the place of the warmer air rising from the surrounding forests. The nights are then so in tensely cold that one is invariably confined to the bungalow itself, in all the rooms of which fireplaces have been provided. Here a truly Christmassy feeling prevails, before a blazing fire of forest logs, while the party discusses the latest stories of the 'abominable snow-man', or ghost stories are related in hair-raising detail. Even within the compound of this bungalow elephant and tiger and panther roam, their screams, roars and grunts reminding the sleepy in mate, snugly tucked below double-blankets, with the glow of a fire by his bedside that he is still in the midst of a tropical jungle.

These forests are a favorite resort of mine, and in them I have met with several little adventures that are still memorable after these many years. To relate just one. Wild-dogs, which hunt in packs in India, varying in numbers from three to thirty, sometimes invade these forests from over the boundaries of Mysore and Coimbatore, where they are very numerous, more so in the latter district. These packs are very destructive to all forms of deer, particularly sambar and spotted-deer, which they hunt down inexorably, and tear limb from limb while still alive. On several occasions, both in these and other jungles, I have come across sambar actually being chased by these dogs. The method adopted is that, while a few dogs chase the animal, others break away in a flanking movement, to run ahead of their quarry and ambush it as it dashes past them. When hunting, they emit a series of yelps in a very high pitch, resembling the whistling cry of a bird rather than that of a dog. The quarry is brought to earth after being attacked by these flankers, which bite out its eyes, disembowel it, hamstring or emasculate it, in their efforts to bring it down. I once saw a sambar pursued by wild-dogs, dash into a pool of water to try and protect itself. It had been disemboweled and trailed its intestines behind it for the distance of twenty feet. Sambars are extraordinarily hardy, and sometimes are literally eaten alive by these dogs, before being killed.

One evening, at about 5 o'clock, I was a mile from the bungalow, interesting myself in an unusual species of ground orchid that sprouted from the earth in a spray of tiny star-shaped flowers. Suddenly I heard a medley of sounds whose origin I could not, at first define. There were cries, yelps, and long-drawn bays, interspersed with grunts and Vhoofs' that puzzled me. Then I knew that the noise was that of wild dogs, which seemed to be attacking a pig or a bear. Grabbing my rifle,

I ran in the direction of the din. I may have covered a furlong, when around the corner dashed a tigress, encircled by half-a-dozen wild dogs.

Concealing myself behind the trunk of a tree, I watched the unusual scene. The dogs had spread themselves around the tigress, who was growling ferociously. Every now and again one would dash in from behind to bite her. She would then turn to attempt to rend asunder this puny aggressor, when a couple of others would rush in from another direction. In this way she was kept going continually, and I could see she was fast becoming spent.

All this time the dogs were making a tremendous noise, the reason for which I soon came to know, when, in a lull in the fray, I heard the whistling cry of the main pack, galloping to the assistance of their advance party. The tigress must have also heard the sound, for in sudden, renewed fury, she charged two of the dogs, one of which she caught a tremendous blow on its back with her paw, cracking its spine with the sharp report of a broken twig. The other just managed to leap out of danger. The tigress then followed up her momentary advantage by bounding away, to be immediately followed by the five remaining dogs. They were just out of sight when the main pack streamed by, in which I counted twenty-three dogs, as they galloped past me without the slightest interest in my presence. Soon the sounds of pursuit died away, and all that remained was the one dead dog.

During the affair I had been too interested, and too lost in admiration at the courage of the dogs, to fire at either the tigress or her attackers. Next morning I sent out scouts to try to discover the result of the incident. They returned about noon, bringing a few fragments of tiger-skin, to report that the dogs had finally cornered their exhausted quarry about five miles away and had literally torn the tigress to pieces. As far as they could gather, five dogs had been killed in the final battle, after which the victors had eaten the tigress, and even the greater portions of their own dead companions. Three distinct tribes of natives inhabit these areas. There are the Badagas, descendants of long-ago invaders from the state of Mysore, themselves fleeing from Mahommedan conquerors from the north. These Badagas have now become rich; they own lands, vast herds of cattle and semi wild buffaloes, with tremendously long, curved horns. Next come the Kesavas, the greatest in numbers but laziest in disposition, who work under the Badagas as herdsmen and tillers of the soil. Lastly, come the Karumbas, comparatively few in number, the original inhabitants of the land and now entirely jungle-men; they live on wild honey, roots, hunting and the trapping of small animals and birds. These Karumbas make excellent trackers, and like the Sholagas of the Coimbatore District and Pujarees of Salem, are true children of nature, who are born and live in the forests till the day of their death. Having given the reader a little idea of the country in which the adventure took place, I shall lose no further time in telling the story of the 'Man-eater of Segur'.

This tiger was reported to have come originally from the jungles of the Silent Valley Forest Block in the District of Malabar-Wynaad, below the extreme opposite, or southwestern face, of the Blue Mountains. This area is infested with elephant, of which it holds the record for 'rogues', and with bison. As a rule it does not hold many tiger. A few human kills took place in the Silent Valley and then ceased entirely, to recommence at Gudalur, some twenty miles from Tippakadu, at Masinigudi, and finally in all the areas between Segur and Anaikutty. How and why the tiger came so far from its place of origin, encircling the greater portion of the Nilgiri Mountains in doing so, nobody knows.

It was midsummer and the tiger had been particularly active, killing at Segur and, within a week, at Anaikutty, when I arrived. The last victim had been a Kesava herdsman, tending his herd of semi-wild buffaloes some two miles from Anaikutty along the lower reaches of the river, as it wended its way towards the Moyar. In this instance, the man-eater had stalked and attacked the man, completely ignoring the surrounding grazing buffaloes. It had killed him, and was perhaps carrying him away, when the buffaloes had become aware of its presence.

These animals, as I have already stated, are only semi domesticated, and extremely dangerous to a stranger, especially if he happens to be dressed in the unusual mode to them of a European, when they frequently charge on sight. Seeing the tiger, they had evidently attacked him en masse, and succeeded in driving him off, leaving the dead man where he had been dropped. That night, neither buffaloes nor herdsman returned to the kraal, so early the next morning a search party set out to discover the reason for their absence. It did not take them long to find the dead herdsman, surrounded by his herd of placidly grazing buffaloes, which had effectively prevented the tiger from returning to its prey. An examination of the corpse, the pugmarks of the tiger, and the pursuing hooves of the charging buffaloes, revealed the sequence of happenings as I have related them.

The kill that had taken place a week earlier at Segur had been that of a woman, as she went down to the Segur River with her water-pot to fetch the daily supply of water for her family. In this case the tiger had succeeded in carrying off its victim, the only evidence of the occurrence being the mute testimony of the broken water-pot, the pugs of the tiger in the soft mud that bordered the river, a few drops of blood, the torn saree, and a few strands of human hair that had become entangled in the bushes as the tiger made off with its prey.

I visited both localities and by careful measurement and examination of the pugs, which were very clear on the riverbank at Segur, determined that the tiger was a smallish-sized male of considerably less than adult age. Reports had it that the tiger very frequently traversed the ten miles of forest road between Segur and Anaikutty, his pugs being seen, along this track, especially in the vicinity of both places. As a preliminary, I therefore decided to sit up along this road at differently selected places, and without wearying the reader with details, put this plan into practice, spending thus a whole week, alternately in the vicinity of Segur and Anaikutty, without seeing any signs of the tiger.

The seventh night I spent on a tree a mile-and-a-half from Segur. Returning the next morning to the Anaikutty forest bungalow, where I had established my headquarters, I was informed that a Karumba, who had left the previous morning to gather wild honey from the combs of the giant rock bee that abound by the hundred in the region of a place called 'Honey Rock', about four miles from the lower foothills of the Nilgiris, had not yet returned.

Assembling a group of twenty persons as a search party, I accompanied them to this wild and densely wooded spot. Splitting the party into four groups of five men each, as protection against possible attack by the man-eater, we searched till noon, when one of the men discovered the body of the dead Karumba lying in a nala, and brought me the news. I went to the spot and found the man had been killed by being bitten through the throat. Beside him lay his empty kerosene-tin, in which he had been gathering honey, all of which had spilt on the ground to form a feast for a colony of black-ants, which covered the tin in a black mass.

Thinking at first that the tiger had killed him, and wondering why it had not devoured him in that quiet, secluded spot, we cast around for tracks, but soon discovered that the killer had been a female sloth bear, accompanied by its cub. The human-like imprints of the mother's feet, and the smaller impressions of the cub's, were clearly to be seen in the soft sand that formed the bed of the nala. Evidently the she-bear had been asleep with its cub, or perhaps about to cross the nala, when the Karumba, in his search for honey, had suddenly come upon it. The sloth bear has a very uncertain temperament at the best of times, being poor of sight and hearing, so that humans have often been able to approach them very closely before being discovered, when in the fright and excitement of the moment, they will attack without any provocation. Undoubtedly this is what happened, when the she-bear, surprised, frightened and irritated, and in defense of her young which she fancied was in danger, had rushed at the Karumba, bitten him through the throat, severing his jugular, and then made off as fast as she could.

I did not wish to spend time in hunting a bear which, after all, had only killed in defense of its cub, and was for returning to the bungalow at Anaikutty, when the four Karumbas that were included in the party, urged me to track down and shoot the animal, which they felt would be a menace to them when they, in turn, came to the same place for honey. More to please them than because I had any heart in the venture, I therefore sent the rest of the party back and followed these four men on the trail of the she-bear.

The tracks led along the nullah and then joined a stream, down which Mrs. Bruin and her baby had ambled for some distance before breaking back into the jungle. Thence she had climbed upwards towards the many rocks and caves that gave them shelter, where hundreds of rock-bee hives hung from every conceivable rock-projection in long, black masses, sometimes attaining a length of over five feet, a width of a yard, and a thickness of over a foot. The ground we were now traversing was hard and stony, and to my unskilled eyes presented no trace of the bears' passing. But the Karumbas were seldom at fault, and their powers of tracking really worth witnessing during the long and tiring walk that followed. For more than two hours they led me up hill and down dale, and across deep valleys and stony ridges. An overturned rock or stone, a displaced leaf, or the slightest marks of scraping or digging, showed them where the bears had travelled. At last we approached the mouth of a cave, high up over a projecting rock from which hung twenty-three separate rock-bee hives. This cave they declared, was the home of the she-bear and her cub.

Standing ten yards from the entrance, and to one side, I instructed the men to hurl stones into the interior, which they did with unabated vigor for quite twenty minutes. But not a sound did we hear. Then the Karumbas made a torch of grasses, which we ignited and threw into the cave, but still nothing happened. Finally they made five similar torches. Lighting one of these, I followed the Karumba that carried it into the cave, while the remaining three Karumbas came behind us, carrying the four spare grass torches. The cave was comparatively small inside and was obviously empty, the occupant and her youngster having left at hearing our approach, if not before. But I was glad of this, because, as I have said, I had no quarrel with this animal, and would have regretted having to shoot it and leave the baby an orphan.

We had lit our third torch, and were just about to leave, when one of the Karumbas came upon an interesting curiosity of the Indian forest, of which I had heard but never seen, and the existence of which I consequently never believed.

He found in a corner what the natives call 'bear's bread', or 'Karadi roti', as it is named in Tamil. This was a roughly circular mass, about ten inches across, an inch thick, and of a dirty blackish-yellow, sticky consistency. Female bears are reported to seek out the fruits of the 'Jak' tree, a large fruit with a rough, thorny exterior; wild 'Wood-apple' fruit, the size of large tennis balls and with hard shells; and pieces of honey-comb, including bees, comb and honey. Each of these ingredients is first eaten by the she-bear in turn, the whole being then vomited in the cave in a mass, which the she-bear allows to harden into a cake, as reserve food for her young.

Due possibly to its long hair, the bear is marvelously impervious to the stings of the rock-bee, which prove fatal to a human being if suffered in large numbers. It can climb trees and rocks with astounding ability in search of wild fruit and honeycombs. A cave, inhabited by a she-bear with her young, is reported to contain sometimes a dozen such cakes. In this case we had found only one, but in as much as I had never come across or seen one before, I was immensely interested. As evidence of the wholesomeness of this 'bread', the four Karumbas offered it to me for immediate consumption, but I declined with thanks. They then divided it equally between themselves, and ate it with evident gusto.

We were now sitting at the entrance of the cave. Whether the flames of the torch, the smoke, or the sound of human voices disturbed them, I do not know, but suddenly a few black objects buzzed around us, and as we sprang to our feet to make off, the rock-bees from the hive immediately above, grossly disturbed and angry, descended upon us in an avalanche.

It was every man for himself, and as I grabbed my rifle and sprinted down the hillside, the agile Karumbas out distanced me very quickly. What I lacked in speed I made up, however, by being clothed, the bees being able to register some twenty stings on my neck and hands and other exposed parts, as compared with about forty that I counted on each of the bare skins of the Karumbas, when we slowed up half-a-mile away. It was indeed a comical ending to a tragic but interesting morning, and we returned to Anaikutty a far wiser, but very sore and smarting party. I set out at 8 p.m. that night, motoring slowly to Segur in my Studebaker, a Karumba acting as assistant by my side and flashing the beams of my 'sealed-beam' spotlight along the jungle on both sides. Meeting nothing, we continued for six miles along the northwestern road, past Mahvanhalla and Masinigudi, and finally the four miles to the forest chowki at Tippakadu. Here we allowed an hour to pass before returning, this time encountering, three miles from Tippakadu, a herd of bison along the roadside. These animals crashed away as the car approached closer. Between Masinigudi and Segur we met several spotted-deer, and just after taking the turn to Anaikutty a large bull elephant in the centre of the road, his tusks gleaming sharply white in the powerful beams of the spot light. A gentle toot of the horn sufficed to send him scurrying on his way, and finally we reached the Anaikutty bungalow without seeing a trace of the man-eater.

The following morning dawned bright and fine, and I set out with my Karumba guide across the forest towards the Moyar River, nine miles to the north. Again we encountered no trace of the tiger, but came across the pugs of an exceptionally large forest-panther as the land began to dip sharply to the basin of the Moyar. Judging by its tracks, it was indeed a big animal, approaching the size of a small tigress, and would have made a fine trophy, had I the time to pursue it. We returned to the bungalow in the late after noon, tired and somewhat disappointed, after our long and fruitless walk.

Again that night we motored to Tippakadu and back, encountering only a solitary sambar, when returning, at the river crossing before the Anaikutty forest bungalow. With dawn I undertook another hike with my Karumba, this time in a southeasterly direction and towards the Nilgiris. We found a dead cow-bison in the bush four miles away, an examination of the carcass revealing that the animal had died of rinderpest. The Forest Department had reported some two months earlier that this epidemic had spread from the cattle of the Badagas, whose herds it afflicted in a contagious and epidemic form, to the wild animals, especially bison, and here lay proof of the statement.

That afternoon a report came in from Mahvanhalla that the tiger had taken a woman near the bridge by which the main road to Tippakadu crosses the Mahvanhalla Stream before it joins the Segur River. Motoring to the spot I was shown the place where, the previous evening, the tiger, which had been lurking on the banks of the stream, had attacked the woman, who had been among the herdsmen watering the large number of mixed cattle and buffaloes kraaled at Mahvanhalla. Apparently nobody had actually witnessed the incident, the woman having been a little apart from the rest of the party assembled near the bridge and hidden by the bend the little stream takes just before it passes under the road. She had screamed shrilly and silence had followed. The remaining grazers, five in numbers, had hastened to Mahvanhalla, gathered reinforcements in the form of six others, including the husband of the unfortunate woman, and returned to the spot to look for her. They had found the basket she had been carrying, and close by in the soft earth, the pugmarks of a tiger; then the whole party had returned to Mahvanhalla. At dawn the next day, the four men who now reported themselves had set forth by footpath to cover the ten miles to Anaikutty and report the incident to me, it having become known that I was in the area to shoot the tiger.

We went to the place where the woman had been attacked, and with the expert help of my Karumba tracker were soon able to pick up the trail of the tiger and its victim. Before following I dismissed the party from Mahvanhalla, together with the bereaved husband, who made me promise faithfully that I would bring back at least a few bones of his beloved spouse to satisfy the requirements of a cremation ceremony. Almost without faltering, my Karumba guide followed what was to me the completely invisible trail left by the tiger. The man-eater was evidently making towards a high hill, an out-spur of the Nilgiri Range, that ran parallel to the road on the west at a distance of about two miles. Years ago I had partly climbed this very hill in search of a good bison head, and knew its middle slopes were covered with a sea of long spear grass, which gradually thinned out as the higher and more rocky levels were reached. In that area, I felt we had little chance of finding the tiger or its prey.

Nevertheless my stout little guide continued faultlessly, and within a mile of the foot of the hill came across the woman's saree, caught in the undergrowth. Shortly afterwards the tiger appeared to have changed its mind, in that its trail veered off to the right, parallel to the hill, which now was quite near, and back again towards the bed of the Mahvanhalla Stream. Still following, we eventually reached the stream, which here ran through a deep valley. Scattered bamboo-clumps grew in increasing numbers down this declivity, and the shrill squeal of vultures and the heavy flapping of their wings soon heralded the close of our search. The remains of the woman lay below a clump of bamboo, eaten by the tiger, and the vultures had finished what had been left over from his feast. We found the head lying apart, the eyes picked out of their sockets by the great birds, which had also devoured most of the flesh from the face. This ghastly remnant, together with her hands and feet, her glass bangles and silver anklets, we gathered to gather and wrapped in grass, and in fulfillment of my promise, the Karumba very reluctantly carried the bundle to her husband. Sitting up at the spot seemed a waste of time, as the tiger would not return to such scattered remnants.

That night I continued my hunting by car but without success, and next day procured a young buffalo, which I tied close to the bend in the stream at Mahvanhalla, where the woman had been attacked. The chances of the tiger visiting the same spot being remote, I decided not to sit up over the live buffalo, but to await a kill, should it occur. In this surmise I was wrong, for before noon next day runners came to Anaikutty to report that the buffalo had been killed and partly eaten by a tiger. By 3 p.m. my machan was fixed, and I sat overlooking the dead bait, at a height of some fifteen feet.

A large red-martin, a big species of mongoose that in habits the lower slopes of the Nilgiris, was the first visitor to put in an appearance at the kill. He came at about 5.30 p.m., at first nibbled cautiously, and then began to gobble chunks of the raw meat. By 6 o'clock he had filled himself to bursting-point, and made off to pass the night in dreamless contentment, or with a heavy attack of indigestion. As dusk fell the shadowy forms of three jackals slunk forward. With the greatest temerity they approached the dead animal, sniffed it while glancing around apprehensively, and made off in frightened rushes, only to return each time, as hunger and the demands of a voracious appetite urged them on. At about the fourth attempt they finally settled down to eat, but had hardly taken a few mouthfuls when there was a rush and a scamper and they were gone. This was surely the coming of the tiger, I thought, and sure enough a slinking, grey shape flitted into the open and cautiously shambled up to the kill. No tiger would so shamefacedly approach his own kill, however, and the hyena for hyena it was began all over again the cautious and frightened approaches of his smaller cousins, the jackals. Several times he sniffed at the meat, the while he glanced furtively to right and left. Several times he shambled away, to scurry around in a wide circle and see if the coast was clear, before cautiously slinking up again to take a hasty mouthful. Then off he went in another wide circle to make sure that the rightful owner of the kill was not in the vicinity to catch him red-handed. This continued for quite half-an-hour, before the hyena settled down to a serious meal.

He had been eating for ten minutes when a tiger called nearby. 'A-oongh, Aungh-ha, Ugha-ugh, 0-o-o-n-o-o-n', was four times repeated in the silent night air, and the hyena whisked away as if by magic and did not return. I sat in readiness, momentarily expecting the appearance of the king of the jungle. But the hours dragged on and he did not come. Whatever may have been the reason that tiger gave the kill a wide berth that night, and the false dawn found me shivering with the intense cold that had now set in despite the summer season. I remained till day light to descend from my machan, cramped and stiff, thoroughly disgusted and disappointed with the world at large and with the tiger in particular. What caused him to approach so close to his kill that night without actually putting in an appearance will ever remain a mystery.

I rested the next day and followed my usual nightly procedure of motoring along the road to Tippakadu and back, but without seeing any sign of the tiger. This time a small panther jumped off a roadside culvert exactly at the turning point on the road to Anaikutty, and crouched in the ditch, its bright eyes gazing into the spotlight as the car passed by. I let the little brute alone, to pass its days in happiness in the beautiful forests where it rightly belonged. The next week proved uneventful, and I began to think of giving up the chase and returning to Bangalore, but eventually I decided to wait three more days before departing. One of these three days passed uneventfully, when, at midday the second day, a Badaga boy, the son of a rich cattle-owner at Segur, was carried away by the tiger while taking the midday meal to his father, who was with the cattle, and other Kesava herdsmen. I was soon at the spot with my Karumbas, to follow up the trail. The tiger had carried the boy across the Segur River and into the jungle to the north. Again we followed, without delay, and this time found the body hidden in a nala and only half-eaten. Unfortunately, the father arrived at the scene, and wanted to remove the body, and an hour was lost in argument to persuade him to let it remain and give me a chance of sitting up.

In the vicinity of the body there was no suitable tree or rock in which to conceal myself, and eventually it was decided to move the corpse some fifty feet towards a bamboo clump, on the top of which an unstable machan was erected. To reach this, I had to climb up the notches of a cut bamboo stem, only to find the machan one of the worst I had ever sat on in my life. It swayed alarmingly with every current of wind, and my slightest movement caused the bamboos to creak ominously below me. Besides, I did not have a good view of the body, which was over thirty yards away. The bamboo stems growing around me completely obstructed any view at a close range. The beginning of my vigil was most uninteresting, and no living thing put in an appearance beyond a peacock, which alighted higher up the nullah bank from the place where the corpse was lying. From there it walked slowly downwards, till it suddenly caught sight of the prone, human form in the nullah where we had left it, when with a great flapping of wings it sailed away above my head, its flowing tail glinting a greenish-red in the rays of the setting sun, for all the world like a comet flapping through the forest.

At 9 p.m. I became aware of the presence of the tiger by the low moan he emitted from near the spot where he had originally left the corpse. I cursed myself for having shifted it, but realized that this had had to be done, as there was absolutely no shelter for me at that spot. Finding his kill had been moved, the tiger then growled several times. After all, we had shifted it a bare fifty feet, and from where he stood the tiger would undoubtedly see it in its new position and come towards it; or so I hoped. But moving the kill had been fatal, raising within the tiger a deep suspicion as to why the man it had left dead, and had partly eaten, had now moved away.

It is extraordinary how very cautious every man-eater becomes by practice, whether a tiger or a panther, and cowardly too. Invariably, it will only attack a solitary person, and that, too, after prolonged and painstaking stalking, having assured itself that no other human being is in the immediate vicinity. I believe there is hardly any case on record where a man-eater has attacked a group of people, while many instances exist where timely interference, or aid by a determined friend or relative, has caused a man-eater to leave his victim and flee in absolute terror. These animals seem also to possess an astute sixth sense and be able to differentiate between an unarmed human being and an armed man deliberately pursuing them, for in most cases, only when cornered will they venture to attack the latter, while they go out of their way to stalk and attack the unarmed man.

This particular tiger was definitely possessed of a very acute sixth sense, for it guessed something was amiss. Instead of openly approaching its kill, as I had hoped it would, it then began to circle the whole area, plaintively moaning at intervals, as if in just complaint against the meanness of fate at having moved the kill. Around and around it travelled for quite an hour, till it finally decided that the kill was forbidden fruit, and the last I heard was its plaintive moaning receding to southwards, as it made for the sheltering hills.

This last episode, with its attendant failure, caused me to redouble my determination to bag this most astute animal, and to postpone my departure, if need be, for another fortnight, to enable me to do so. Gossip with the Karumbas now suggested that the tiger might be met at nights along the many cart tracks that branched into the forest from Anaikutty, Segur and Mahvanhalla, rather than along the main roads on which I had been motoring for several nights. As these cart tracks were unmotorable, I hired a bullock cart for the next week, and determined to spend each night in it meandering along every possible track in the vicinity of the three places. The driver of this cart, a Kesava, was an unusually doughty fellow, and my two Karumba scouts were to accompany me to suggest the most likely tracks.

The next three nights we spent in this fashion, encountering only sambar and spotted-deer, and on the third night, an elephant, which gave us some anxious moments. It was where the track crossed the Anaikutty River, two miles from the village, that we first met him. He had been standing under a mighty 'Muthee' tree, as motionless as a rock, and quite unnoticed by us. In the cart we carried the car battery, which I had detached together with the 'sealed beam' spotlight, to be used in emergency only. For ordinary illumination, and for picking up eyes in the jungle, we were using two torches, a seven-cell and a five-cell respectively.

As I was saying, we were crossing the river, and the cart was about midway in the stream, the bulls struggling valiantly to pull the huge wheels through the soft sand, when the elephant, alarmed and annoyed by the torches, let forth a piercing scream, like the last trump of doom, and came splashing at us through the water. Switching on the 'sealed-beam', I caught him in its brilliant rays about thirty yards away. The bright beam brought him to a halt, when he commenced stamping his feet in the water and swinging his great bulk and trunk from side to side, undecided whether to charge or to make off. We then shouted in unison, and focused all lights on him, and with a parting scream of rage he swirled around and shuffled off into the black forest, a very angry and indignant elephant indeed.

We continued these bullock-can prowls for the next three nights, but without success. On the morning of the seventh day, the tiger killed the son of the Forest Guard stationed at Anaikutty, a lad aged eighteen years. At 9 a.m., and in bright sunlight, he had left his hut in the village and gone a short distance up the path leading to the river and to the bungalow where I lay sleeping after my nights in the cart. He had gone to call his dog, which was in the habit of wandering between the village and the bungalow, less than a mile away, because of some scraps, which I daily gave it after each meal. That boy was never seen alive again. His father, the Forest Guard, thinking he was with me at the bungalow, took his absence for granted. When noon came, and it was time for the midday meal, the youth had not yet appeared and the Guard decided to come to the bungalow and fetch him. By the roadside, within a furlong of the river, he came across his son's cap. This alarmed him, and he called aloud to the boy. Receiving no answer, he ran the remaining distance to the bungalow and awoke me, to tell me what he had found.

Feeling something had befallen the lad, I picked up the rifle and accompanied the anxious father to the spot where the cap was still lying. Looking around, we found his slipper under a bush ten yards away and realized that the worst had happened. Remaining at the spot, I told the now weeping guard to hurry back to the village and summon the Karumba trackers. Within a quarter-hour these men had joined me and we started on the trail. The boy appeared to have struggled and had probably cried aloud, although none had been there to hear him, for within a few yards of where we found the slipper, the tiger had apparently laid him down and bitten him savagely. This was made clear by the sudden spurts of blood that smeared the dried grass for the area of quite a square yard. The tiger had then proceeded with its prey, leaving a trail of blood on the ground, which gradually petered out as the blood began to coagulate.

The river here turned north-west and we found that the tiger was making in its direction. Pressing forward, we soon reached the thick jungle that clothed the river-banks, where the blood-trail once again became evident in the occasional red smear that marked the leaves of the under growth as the tiger, holding its prey in its mouth, had pushed through.

In the soft mud of the riverbank we saw the fresh pugmarks of the killer, which passed across the shallow water to the opposite bank. Here it led up the slope to the shelter of a clump of jungle-plum bushes, before which we found the lad's remains. He had been almost half-devoured and was a ghastly sight. The reason for the sudden spurts of blood on the trail we had followed now became apparent.

The boy had obviously been still alive when carried off by the tiger, as we had already surmised, and must have screamed and struggled in an effort to get free. Annoyed, the tiger had thrown him down and dealt the boy a smashing blow across the skull with its forepaw. The forehead had been crushed inwards, like a squashed eggshell, while the sharp talons had half-torn the scalp away, leaving the bare bone of the skull exposed to view. One of the eyes had also been gouged out by a claw, and hung from its socket.

The grief of that poor father was truly heart-rending to watch, as he prostrated himself at the feet of his only son, kissed the poor mangled remains, and called aloud to heaven and earth for vengeance, while heaping dust, that he scratched from the dry ground, on to his own head. Shaking him roughly to bring him to his senses, and telling him earnestly that the more noise he made and the more time he wasted correspondingly lessened our chances of shooting the tiger, we succeeded in reducing his cries to a whimper.

A medium-sized 'Jumlum' tree overshadowed the plum bush beneath which the boy lay, and on this tree I determined to erect my machan. I sent the father and the two Karumbas back to the bungalow, instructing the latter to bring my portable 'charpoy' machan, and pending their return climbed up into the 'Jumlum' tree, both for my own protection, and to get a shot if the tiger should suddenly put in an appearance.

The two Karumbas were back in under an hour with the machan, which they securely and efficiently tied in the lower branches of the 'Jumlum' tree at the usual height of a little over fifteen feet. They had also brought my water bottle, gun-torch and blanket, as instructed, and soon after noon I climbed into the machan in high hopes of securing a shot.

Evening came, and nightfall, without a sign of the tiger. Then followed a sudden rainstorm, such as sometimes occurs in the midst of a dry summer in India. Lightning flashes illuminated the forest as bright as day, vividly revealing the corpse beneath the plum-tree below; thunder crashed, reverberating against the adjacent hills; and the rain literally descended in torrents, preceded by a sharp shower of hailstones.

Within a minute I was soaked to the skin, and as the downpour continued, before my very eyes the river rose with the mass of water that rushed down from the surrounding hills, till I judged it to be unfordable. This dreadful state of affairs continued till well past midnight, when the rain died down to a thin, cold drizzle. Then a horribly chill wind set in, blowing down from the Nilgiris to the sodden forest. The drizzle finally ceased, the wind continued and, as evaporation began in my soaking clothes and blankets, the cold became intense and unbearable.

Gladly would I have faced a dozen man-eaters and returned to the bungalow, but this was impossible owing to the swollen river, which still remained unfordable. The waters swirled by, carrying with them uprooted tree trunks, stripped branches, and debris of all kinds, including dead logs that had been lying for years along the riverbank. To attempt a crossing of that raging torrent, in pitch darkness, would have been to invite death by drowning, if not by a blow across the head from a racing tree-trunk. To add to my difficulties, the acute cold, the exposure, the lack of proper sleep and my now generally exhausted condition, brought on a sharp attack of malaria. The onset of the attack was in the usual form of ague, which caused my teeth to chatter like castanets, followed within an hour by high fever to the verge of delirium. I lost all interest in shooting the tiger, and how I passed the remainder of that never-to-be-forgotten night without falling off the machan, I shall never know. It was past 8 o'clock next morning before my Karumbas returned, to find me almost unconscious and still in a high fever. Somehow they got me across the river and to the bungalow, where I spent the next forty-eight hours in bed in the grip of successive attacks of malarial chills and fever, which only abated on the third day with the assiduous use of paludrine.

How I did not contract pneumonia as an after-effect of this terrible experience is a question to which only Providence knows the answer. On the third day, when I began to take a little more interest in life, my men told me that the tiger had returned, either during or after the raging storm, and removed its victim while I was huddled, so ill, in the tree above it. This gave me an added reason for gratitude to Providence, for had I fallen off that tree in delirium, I might easily have become a fresh victim. I took it easy for the next two days to give myself a chance of recovering completely from my bout of fever, and also to await news of a fresh kill, which was bound to occur, sooner or later. The third day I spent in procuring three buffalo baits, tying one each at Anaikutty, Segur and Mahvanhalla. They were all alive the following morning, so on the next day I resumed my peregrinations, roaming the forest around Anaikutty in the morning in the hope of Meeting the tiger accidentally, and driving by car to Tippakadu and back by night.

Two days later, the run of bad luck I had been experiencing over the past three weeks suddenly changed for the better. That morning, for a change, I decided to follow the course of the Segur River for some miles downstream; driving with my Karumbas to Segur village, I left the car at a large banana plantation and began to put this plan into effect. Hardly a mile downstream is a swampy area, much in habited by bison in years gone by, and still locally known as 'Bison Swamp'. A half-mile beyond this, a large patch of dense bamboo jungle covers both banks of the stream. These bamboos have always been a favorite haunt of elephant and sambar, tiger occasionally passing through on their way down from the hills.

It was 8.30 a.m., and we had just entered the bamboos, when a sambar doe belled loudly from the opposite bank, to be taken up almost immediately by the hoarser cry of a stag. The Karumbas and I sank to the ground among the rushes that grew profusely along the river edge at this spot. The two sambars repeated their calls in quick succession, and it was obvious that something had alarmed them. At first I thought they had seen or winded us, but I dismissed the idea with the realization that what breeze existed was blowing upstream, from the sambar to us. Also, they could not have spotted us, being, as they were, some distance within the bamboos, from where we were quite out of sight. Our progress had been very silent and cautious, so the only conclusion to be drawn from the continued strident calls of the sambar was that they had seen or winded a tiger or panther, as no other human beings would be about in such a lonely place, due to the panic created by the man-eater.

We lay in the rushes for almost ten minutes when, with a loud clatter over the loose stones in the riverbed, a sambar stag, closely followed by a doe, dashed across, to disappear among the bamboos on the same bank as that on which we were hiding. Not a move came from any of us as the anxious moments passed and then, silently, gracefully and boldly, a tiger stepped out of cover from the opposite bamboos and glided down the steeply declining bank to the river's edge. With out hesitation he walked into the river, ignored the cobbled stones, and when the water had reached his chest, he stopped and commenced lapping.

Taking careful aim, I fired behind his left shoulder. He sprang backwards, emitting a coughing-grunt, and then rolled over on his side, facing away from me and towards the bank from which he had just come. Running forwards out of concealment, I advanced some forty yards, from where I could just see a part of the side of his face, the rest having sunk below the water. Here I waited quite fifteen minutes, to put in another shot if need be, but it proved unnecessary, for the tiger was dead.

I have mentioned that I had taken careful measurements of the man-eater's pugs, which I compared with those of the specimen now before me, to find they corresponded exactly. Thus I knew that at last, after many tiring efforts and exasperating failures, I had shot the man-eater of Segur.

The reason for his man-eating propensity also became apparent, in that the animal had only one eye. The remaining eyeball had shrunk to nothing. When skinning this tiger I took particular trouble to investigate the cause of the loss of that eye, and upon digging out what remained of the organ with a knife, I found a gunshot slug embedded in the socket. Here was clear reason why the animal had become a man-eater. Someone, in all probability a poacher armed with a muzzle-loader, had fired at the animal's face, in the far-away Silent Valley of the Malabar-Wynaad. A slug had entered the eye and blinded him. Desperate, in pain, and hampered by the loss of his eye, the tiger had found it difficult to hunt his normal prey, and so had taken his revenge upon the species that had been responsible for the loss of his eye.

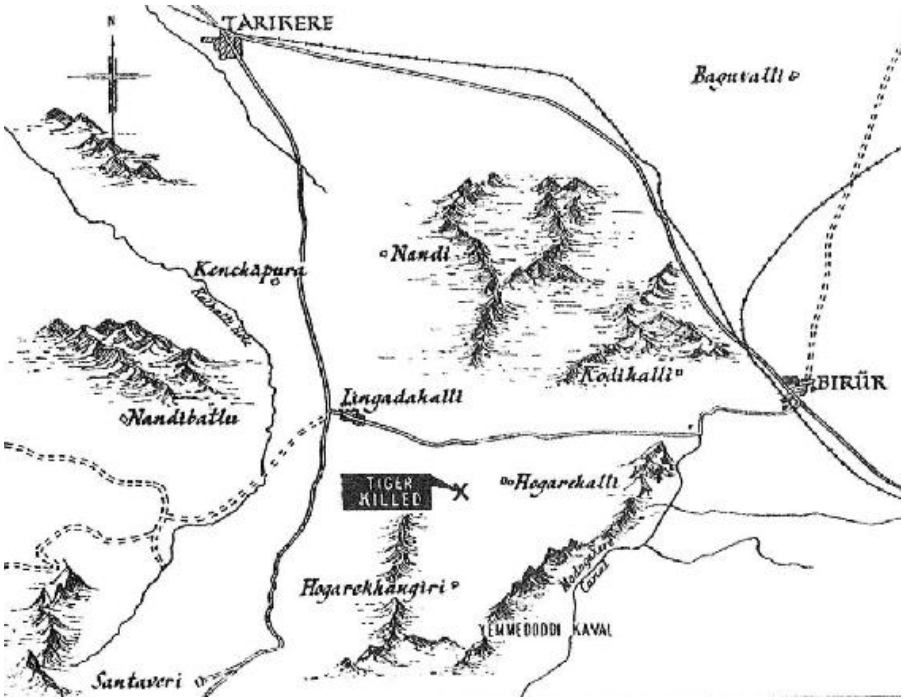
The Man-Eater of Yemmaydoddi



YEMMAYDODDI is an area of forest in the Kadur District of Mysore in Southern India. It is bordered by a ridge of foothills, the highest of which is named Hogar Khan that form the eastern spurs of the great mountain range known as the Baba Budans, which reach a height of 6,500 feet. A magnificent lake, called the 'Madak', entirely surrounded by forest-clad hills, forms the southern limit of this area, from which a narrow water-channel, paralleled by an equally narrow forest road, runs for ten miles north-east wards, till the former joins a smaller lake about three miles north of the little town of Birur.

This area is rich in game, and still richer in vast herds of cattle that are driven into the forest by day to graze, and driven back each evening to Birur. Small wonder it is, then, that the surroundings abound with tiger, that come there in the first instance as game killers, to feed on the plentiful sambar, spotted-deer and wild pig, but sooner or later become cattle-lifters, because the cattle are so much easier to kill and because of the complete complacency and indifference with which the local herdsmen look after their charges. It is no exaggeration to say that hardly a day passes without the loss of a fine cow or bull in the jaws of a tiger, while the panther's destruction of calves, goats and village dogs on the outskirts of Birur is almost as common. Actually, these smaller carnivores are fewer in number than their bigger cousins, and confine themselves to the outskirts of the town itself, well out of the tiger area, because of their fear of the larger animal to whom they themselves sometimes fall prey.

Early in 1946 a small male tiger appeared in this locality with habits distinctly its own. It began with minor killings of calves and goats, snatched in the evenings from returning herds, near the outskirts of Birur, and its depredations were at first taken for those of a panther, except for the characteristic breaking of the neck in the case of the larger calves. This method of killing is almost exclusively followed by tiger, and sometimes by the larger species of forest panther, known as 'Thendu' in Hindustani, so that there was appreciable cause for mistake in identifying the marauder as one of the latter, till on one occasion a frightened herdsman actually witnessed the killing of a young cow, where after the question was no longer in doubt.

This young animal rapidly grew to adulthood in the area, miraculously escaping the shots of various shikarees, both indigenous and foreign, and grew in cunning and daring too, till in eighteen months it became a major menace to the cattle-grazers, killing twice, and occasionally thrice a week, and invariably selecting a particularly fine specimen on each occasion.

Towards the end of 1948, I accompanied a party of friends to Yemmaydoddi, with the object of procuring a trophy for one of them, Alfie Robertson, who was shortly due to return to England. I had received news of the tiger on several occasions and felt sure it would be a fairly easy matter for my companion to bag the animal, provided we camped at Birur a few days till receiving news of a kill. We motored from Bangalore, the distance being 134 miles. Unfortunately I was detained at my office and we left late in the evening. The roads were execrable, and we met with an accident near a place called Tiptur, 86 miles from Bangalore. We were using my friend's car and he was driving. The rear wheel went over a deceptively flat stone, which stood up on its edge when the wheel passed over one end of it, the other cutting a nine-inch slit in the petrol tank, which was at the rear of the car. Eight gallons of gasoline thereupon poured on to the road, and the vehicle came to a stop.

We had no spare petrol, but were carrying a Primus Stove, for which we had brought two bottles of paraffin oil. Passing one end of the rubber lead of the foot pump into a bottle of paraffin, we contrived to fit the remaining end on to the pipe leading into the carburetor after having first started a siphon-feed. Thus we managed to cover the short remaining distance to Tiptur. Here we awoke the only tinker in town, unbuckled the fuel tank and managed to patch up the rent with the side of a paraffin tin which I found outside some sleeping inhabitant's house.

Next came the major problem of fuel for the onward journey. We pushed the car to the one petrol station in the town, only to be informed that the supply of gas had been exhausted the previous day and would not be replenished till noon the next day, at the earliest. It seemed that we were doomed to a prolonged halt at Tiptur. There were one or two lorries in the town. We awoke the sleeping drivers and offered them fabulous prices for just one gallon of petrol to carry us the sixteen miles to the next town of Arsikere, where was a Burma Shell petrol pump at which we were bound to be able to get a fresh supply. But one and all pleaded they themselves had run out of fuel, and were awaiting the expected fresh stock at noon next day. The situation was disheartening, till I decided on adopting desperate measures. It was about 3.30 a.m., and scruples and conscience, like the town of Tiptur, had long since fallen asleep. Calling to Alfie to bring the paraffin tin, from which we had cut the patch for our fuel tank, and carrying the rubber-lead of the foot-pump myself, we commenced a stealthy stalk through the silent streets of Tiptur.

In a lane we spotted a battered 'A' Model Ford. Instructing Alfie to keep careful watch against the owner awakening. I crept forward on the offside of the vehicle. Reaching the bonnet, I removed the fuel-tank cover behind the engine, slipped one end of the rubber tube into the tank, and siphoned a little over a quart of the precious fuel into the tin, which I balanced between my knees. A second trip procured us another quart. Mixing the fuel with the remaining bottle of paraffin oil, we made off hastily to Arsikere, where we obtained a fresh supply.

As a result, we did not arrive at our destination, the small town of Birur, until about 7.30 in the morning. We passed through the town and had gone about two miles to wards the forest, when we came upon an open field in which a number of vultures were crowded. My friend took a photograph, while I got down to investigate the cause of this assembly, and was agreeably surprised to find a half-grown bullock, killed by a panther, right up against the hedge that bordered the road we had just traversed. There was no doubt that the kill had been made by a panther, as the fang marks on the throat of the dead animal showed where it had been strangled. The vertebrae of the neck were intact and had not been broken, which would have been the case had the killer been a tiger. Besides, the under portion of the animal had been eaten, while the en trails were still inside the carcass, conclusively proving a panther to have been the miscreant. For a tiger is a clean feeder, and before beginning a meal makes an opening in the rear portion of its kill, through which it removes the entrails and stomach to a distance of ten feet, so that its meal shall not be polluted with excreta.

We were highly delighted at this early stroke of luck, and after protecting the kill from the vultures with branches broken at a distance from the hedge, I constructed a hide in the hedge itself, overlooking the kill at pointblank range. We made a good job of this construction, and Alfie felt himself more than compensated for the trouble we had experienced with his car the night before, in the certainty of bagging the panther when it returned to its kill late that evening.

We then moved on some distance, ate, and slept in preparation for the night's adventure. By 5 p.m., we re turned to the kill and our hideout, removing the covering which had effectively kept the vultures from the dead animal. Alfie then sat himself inside the hide, complete with rifle, torch, blanket and water-bottle, and I was in the act of driving back to Birur in the car, when a breathless herdsman ran up to inform us that one of his large milch cows had just been killed by a tiger, hardly half-an-hour earlier and not a mile away. I gave the decision to Alfie. Would he prefer a panther as a certainty, or a tiger as a chance? In keeping with what would have been my own decision, he chose to make an attempt on the tiger. We accordingly bundled the paraphernalia out of the hide and into the car, drove swiftly up the road for half-a-mile till the herdsman told us to stop, brought the things out again, and then hastened after him into the forest and to the kill.

We did not have far to walk, and within three furlongs came upon the dead animal, a fine black milking cow. The neck had been distinctly broken and bubbles of froth were still coming from the nose. But the tiger had not eaten a morsel, evidently having been disturbed by the herdsman, or perhaps by the buffaloes, which had been grazing along with the cattle. It was now 6 p.m. and was rapidly growing dark. Unfortunately, there was no tree at this spot, and a few minutes' search made it evident we would have either to abandon the kill or risk a ground shot at the tiger when it returned. Alfie was too keen even to hear of abandoning the kill, so with the help of the herdsman I broke a few branches from adjoining bushes, and made a very rough hide, into which we all clambered shortly after 6.30 p.m. It was almost dark by now, and within fifteen minutes the outline of the dead cow, twenty-five yards away, faded into obscurity. Although moonless, the stars diffused sufficient light to enable us to see in the immediate vicinity, but the kill itself was just out of range. An hour passed, and then about half-a-mile away I heard the weird cry of the solitary jackal. Much has been written and many theories propounded about this strange phenomenon of the forests the lone jackal. Jackals usually wander in packs near the outskirts of towns and villages, the precincts of which they enter at night in search of offal. Their chorus cry, headed by a leader, is distinctive, familiar to the people of India, and sounds something like : 'Ooooooh! Ooo-where? Ooowhere? Ooo-where-where-where ? Here! Here! Here! Here! Here! Heee-re! Heeee-re! Heee-jah ! Heee-yah \ Heee-ee-ee-yah ! Here-Here-Here- Here-Heeeee-yah. yah ! yah \ yah !'

The lone jackal, however, although a jackal of the same species in every sense of the word, adopts a very different call. His solitary, long-drawn, "Ba-Ioo-ah \ Baa-oooo-ah' had earned him a reputation, coupled with endless superstitions, fables and jungle-lore. But from this maze of conjecture two theories stand out. The first is that this jackal accompanies a tiger or panther, generally the former, which it leads to a kill by its weird cry, claiming as its share of the strange partnership a bite at the remains after the rightful owner has gorged its fill. The second theory is that the lone jackal attaches itself to a particular carnivore, which it follows at a very safe distance, most tenaciously, in order to make certain of regular meals at what is left over from kills every time his patron feeds. Whichever of the two theories is correct, the presence and cry of a lone jackal is a certain indication of the proximity of a tiger or panther, a fact of which I have had personal corroboration in many forest areas of India.

Therefore, the cry of the lone jackal told us that night, in as definite a way as if we had seen the tiger itself that the cattle-slayer was approaching. About ten minutes elapsed and then we heard a distinct 'Ugha-ughl Ughl' in the direction of, and beyond, the kill. The tiger had arrived! Softly I nudged Alfie's leg, but he was all attention. Time passed, and we heard a slight crackle in the scrub followed by a faint thud and dragging sound. Alfie depressed the torch switch and a bright beam of light flared out. Unfortunately, with the uncertain background, he misjudged the spot where the kill was lying, and shone a little too far to the left. The warning was enough for the tiger, and with a guttural 'Wrr-oof ! Wrroof !' it sprang back into the shelter of the undergrowth. We remained an hour longer, but I knew it was time wasted, and that the tiger would not return. At the end of this time we heard a faint 'A-oongh\ Aungh-hal O-o-on-o-o-n!' as the tiger crossed a ridge over a mile away, leaving us to ourselves.

Ruefully we packed up and returned to the car, only to find that Alfie had mislaid the switch-key. While searching, the night bus, carrying passengers from the town of Lingadhalli to Birur, passed us. Then Alfie found the key, and we followed in the wake of the bus. Arriving at the spot where we had constructed our hide out for the panther, we were surprised to see, reflected in the glow of the headlights of the bus before us, the eyes of the leopard, which had now returned and was devouring its kill. At the same time the driver of the bus saw the eyes, and brought the ponderous vehicle to a halt with a screech of brakes, and a cloud of suffocating dust, which enveloped us behind.

Alfie and I got down, walked abreast of the bus and located the panther sneaking away half-across the intervening field. He fired and the animal sprang into the air with a sharp 'Arrr-aarh !' and then streaked across the field like greased lightning.

Too late we realized that we had done the wrong thing. Alfie should have got back again in our hide-out and I should have driven away in the wake of the bus. The leopard would undoubtedly have returned to its kill within minutes of the departure of the two vehicles, and given Alfie an easy shot. As matters stood, I had not counseled correctly, and we had now a wounded leopard on our hands. But it was no use crying over spilt milk, so we returned to Birur, to spend the night at the Travelers' Bungalow.

Next morning found us back at the spot, and after casting around I found a faint blood-trail, which began to make itself evident only at the extreme end of the field, increasing as we entered the dense undergrowth. Here we were confronted with a tough proposition. The leopard had evidently been hit in the flank, and it had taken time for the blood to flow down the animal's side and drip to the ground, which is why it only appeared as a blood-trail at the end of the field. Thereafter it had dripped freely, while the animal had crawled into the densest undergrowth, consisting of lantana and 'wait-a-bit' shrubs, where it was impossible to follow except on hands and knees. A timeworn wild pig trail led through this undergrowth, and the leopard had passed along it, as was evident by the copious blood-trail he left.

On hands and knees, and pushing my cocked .405 Winchester before me as I progressed, I crawled in the wake of the wounded beast with Alfie bringing up the rear, as a safeguard against a flank attack, or one from behind. We had progressed about seventy-five yards in this fashion when, without warning, the leopard, which had been lying up at the next bend in the trail, saw fit to launch his attack.

There was hardly room for a miss, and I hit him almost at muzzle-length, the soft-nosed bullet smashing his skull and completely removing the rear segment of the brainpan. He died in front of me, the fluid from his brain oozing from his shattered skull.

We remained at Birur a full ten days, but in all this time only one further kill occurred, and that on the forenoon of the seventh day at a place six miles down the Yemmaydoddi channel. By the time that word of the incident was brought us and we arrived at the spot, it was late evening and we found that vultures had completely demolished the kill, no precaution having been taken to hide it with leaves. A tree overlooked the remains at about forty yards distance, and Alfie sat in a crotch till midnight, but the tiger did not put in an appearance.

Thereafter nothing happened, as I have said, and on the morning of the eleventh day we left for Bangalore. Time passed. Then one dark night along the road from Lingadhalli to Birur motored a quartette of 'Car-shikaris' people who shoot from their car with the aid of spotlights, never so much as setting foot to the ground when passing through the forests. Of tracking, the science of big-game shooting, and the beauties of the jungle and Mother Nature, they know nothing and care less. For them, the highest form of sport lies in casting intense beams of light from their sealed-beam spotlights into the bordering forest and discharging a volley of rifle and gunshots at whatever eyes might catch and reflect the brilliance of their sealed beams.

As to what animal they fire at, male, female or young, they do not care, for they are filled only with the lust to kill or wound. Needless to say, such activities are against all existing regulations, but they often take place nevertheless. And so it transpired that, when about four miles from Birur, they picked up the large fiery-white eyes of a tiger as it crested a bank that bordered the road. Two shots rang out and the tiger sprang away, its lower jaw smashed at the extremity by a rifle bullet, while the other shot had gone wide. Needless to say the 'car shikaris' did not stop to investigate, nor did they return next morning to trail the wounded beast and put it out of its misery. They merely went on their way, seeking for other eyes at which to fire.

The wounded tiger must have suffered intense agony for the next two months, nor could it eat properly. Being unable to maintain a death-grip on its prey with a badly healed broken lower-jaw, it was unable to procure its usual food in the form of game or cattle. One day, about three months later, it attempted to secure a goat from a herd that had been driven to graze in the forest. With infinite caution, it stalked the herd and had just sprung upon a fat nanny to kill her with a powerful blow from its paws instead of the usual neck-breaking process with the jaw, when the audacious herdsman, standing close by, flung his staff. The chance aim proved true in this instance, and the staff caught the tiger a flanking blow. Enraged, it charged the herdsman, the paw-blow substitute again proving eminently successful in almost completely scalping the unfortunate man while still alive. His scream of terror and agony was cut short by another powerful blow of the forepaw, which this time crushed the man's skull as if it had been an egg.

The man collapsed, leaving the tiger the choice of two victims to eat, the goat or a human being. It hesitated over the carcass of the latter, and licked the blood that oozed from the smashed skull As if to make a fair comparison it then went across to the nanny, which it seized by the neck and after a moment began to carry away into the jungle thickets. But within a few paces, and for no accountable reason, it stopped, dropped the nanny, walked across to the dead herdsman, and seizing him by a shoulder, disappeared into the all-concealing fastnesses of the surrounding forest.

The dreaded man-eater of Yemmaydoddi was thus created, and his reign of stark terror had commenced. Thereafter, deaths attributable to this beast occurred within an area of about 250 square miles, ranging from Birur, Lingadhalli and up to Bhagavadkatte on the north, across to Santaveri on the Baba Budan Mountains on the west, and southwards past the Ironkere Lake to Sakrepatna and back to Birur. While human kills followed each other with alarmingly increasing regularity, they were spaced along a definite beat and had the distinctive mark that every victim had been killed by a powerful blow of the paw and not by die usual fatal jaw grip. Further, the fact that the tiger was unable to use its lower jaw effectively was amply evident through examination of the various corpses, to none of which was it the man-eater's custom to return for a second meal. The flesh had been scraped from them in a peculiar way, obviously by the upper-jaw working alone on the strips of human flesh, which this animal would lay bare with its powerful claws to facilitate the difficult task of eating.

With the advent of the man-eater, the activities of the erstwhile very energetic cattle-killing tiger which had been operating along the Yemmaydoddi and Lingadhalli routes, ceased abruptly, leaving room for the conclusion that it was this cattle-lifter, and none other, that had now developed into a man-eater. The story of the 'car-shikaris' did not become known for some time, till one of them, in a moment of boastful hilarity, revealed that they had fired at and wounded a tiger on the Birur-Lingadhalli Road. A subsequent piecing together of these facts brought the story to light as we now know it. As I have said, the man-eater followed an almost well defined beat, killing at the outskirts of villages and hamlets bordering the places I have named, and in regular succession. These facts I gathered upon reading the reports that appeared in the Press regarding the beast's activities, and by marking off on my forest map the names of these places and the dates on which people had been killed.

The centre of this region, which the tiger had chosen as a regular beat, comprised the rocky and heavily forested slopes of the foothill range, topped by the hill called Hogar Khan, some 4,500 feet in height. I concluded that these fastnesses, almost without population, sheltered the tiger, that from them it made forays into the more populous areas in a series of almost regular calls. A study of the dates of past killings revealed that the animal almost regularly returned along its rounds every third or fourth month. The total number of killings had by this time reached twenty-seven. In making my attempt to shoot this animal, I decided to operate at the village of Hogarehalli, which lay almost midway between Birur and Lingadhalli, and was only three miles and a half from the base of Mount Hogar Khan itself through downwardly sloping scrub jungle. I selected this area primarily because I was fairly well acquainted with the geography of the surrounding forest, and was fairly well known to the inhabitants, from whom I could expect reasonable co-operation. Further, the village of Hogarehalli was, as I have said, near to the foothills of Hogar Khan, where I was sure the tiger had its headquarters. Most important of all, this village had not escaped losing a life every time the tiger passed on his rounds. In other words, it was almost a certain call for him.

I arrived at Hogarehalli a full fortnight before the close of the three-month cycle that is within two to six weeks of the next projected visit. Thus, I gave myself plenty of time to make inquiries into the details and nature of the various killings, and to arrive at a plan of circumventing this brute if possible.

The village itself is fairly large and although not very heavily populated, contains houses of a permanent nature, constructed from stone of reddish hue, which abounds in the vicinity, occurring in the form of flakes and varying in size from the palm of one's hand to an area of several square feet. Hogarehalli is also old; it dates from distant times and possesses two ancient and solidly built temples. It is bounded on the west, south-west and north-west by the dense scrub leading to Hogar Khan, and on the south by a large and beautiful lake that abounds with geese, wild duck and teal in the winter-months, to the south of which a track leads to the Yemmaydoddi water-channel about three miles away. To the southeast lies a belt of dense plantations of coconut and banana trees, interspersed with the tall slim stems of the areca nut, the whole being thickly matted below by growths of the betel-vine, the leaves of which are liberally chewed by Indians throughout the peninsula. This area consists of very moist land, naturally low-lying and irrigated by a channel from the lake to the south of the village. Southward of Hogarehalli lie a few scattered rice fields, and then south-eastwards and east wards and northwards fields of dry crops, fed only by the monsoon rains, extending up to the Birur-Lingadhalli road, about 1 $_{1/2}$ miles away.

As you may have guessed by now, the majority of kills occurred in the scrub-belt to the west, south-west and north-west, while two had taken place in the heart of the coconut plantation itself, one of the victims being a cousin of the owner. The remaining and more open areas had been avoided by the man-eater. Furthermore, the kills had taken place in the late afternoon in the majority of cases, as the inhabitants had, since the killings commenced, cultivated the healthy habit of securing themselves indoors before sundown. The tiger's pug-marks had shown, on several occasions, that he had entered the outskirts of the village in early morning, but that the stoutly-built houses and solid wooden doors had prevented him, at least so far, from effecting any nocturnal entries. It was difficult to formulate a plan of action in these circumstances. I knew that once the tiger killed he would move on and not visit Hogarehalli again for another three or four months. At the same time, it was humanly impossible for me to anticipate where the next man would be attacked and killed. The only remaining and obvious line of action, therefore, was for me to attempt to attract the tiger to myself by acting as bait, a procedure which, you may be quite well assured, 1 felt most reluctant to follow. Nevertheless, it appeared to be the only way.

Since my arrival at Hogarehalli a week had passed in obtaining all these details, studying the circumstances in which the various kills had taken place and visiting the spots where they had actually occurred. The time was now fast approaching when the man-eater's next visit fell due. I found that the victims in the scrub area to the west had been either woodcutters or herdsmen grazing cattle. Not one of the cattle had been harmed by the man-eater, although an occasional wandering panther had taken its toll. An idea then occurred to me, which, I flattered myself, was quite ingenious. Selecting a tree about half a mile in side this scrub, I arranged for a chair to be tied within its branches about fifteen feet from the ground and out of range of the tiger's leap. I then procured a stout piece of wood, about six feet in length and three inches in diameter, one end of which I suspended from a branch by a stout cord while the other end rested, at an angle, against a branch of the tree below me. To this end I tied another piece of string, which I passed through a loop on to the front portion of my shoe. It was thus possible for me to remain comfortably seated in a chair, armed and prepared, while by merely moving my foot up and down on its heel, I would cause the piece of wood suspended below to strike against the branch it rested upon, emulating the sound made by a wood-cutter, although, of course, considerably less in volume. When one foot became tired, I could change the string to the other foot. I even left this string long enough to operate by hand, when, by increasing the length of the pull, I could increase the swing of the wood and consequently the noise of the blows. Above my head, as shelter from the sun, I arranged a canopy of the leaves of the tree itself, without cutting them. It was also comforting to know that I could smoke, eat, drink, cough and move about in my chair without any need for cramped concealment.

In fact, as I was acting as bait myself, the more I advertised my presence, the greater chance would there be of the tiger attempting to stalk or attack me. The patel or headman of Hogarehalli village, Moodlagiri Gowda, gave me his fullest co-operation. I explained my plan to him and stressed that from the time I started operating from my perch, it would be his business, at all costs, to see that nobody entered the scrub jungle, or the coconut plantation, thus ensuring that the tiger had no bait to attack but myself. This he promised to do, and forth with broadcast to the village, and to the surrounding areas, under threat of dire consequences, that nobody was to be about after midday, especially in the direction of the scrub jungle and plantation. There was enough hay and dried grass around the village on which to feed the cattle for a fortnight to three weeks, by which time I hoped the tiger would have put in an appearance. The Patel's instructions were all the more popular because nobody wished to die beneath the paws of the tiger, and because it provided the villagers with the attractive prospect of being completely idle for the next three weeks.

Precisely on the tenth day after my arrival at Hogarehalli, I began to put my plan to the test. After an early lunch I arrived at the tree shortly before n a.m. armed with water bottle, sandwiches and pipe, and of course my .405, and my first day's vigil commenced. Moving my foot to create the tapping sound was, I soon discovered, a monotonous and tiring pastime, added to which the reflected rays of the noonday sun caused me great discomfort and proved extremely tiring to the eyes, gazing as I must, through the shimmering heat haze, at the scrub jungle around me. I remained on my perch till sundown and continued to do so for the next week, without hearing or seeing any indication of the tiger's return. By this time I had completely familiarized myself with the position of every large bush within my range of vision, and had men tally mapped out the various lines of approach, consistent with available cover, the tiger was likely to take in stalking me on my tree, that is, when and if he returned.

After the first unproductive week, and to relieve the deadly monotony I had experienced, I purchased a couple of cheap novels from the small bookstall at Birur Railway Station, which I read while sitting on my perch, automatically operating the string that pulled the tapping wood, and relying on my hearing to tell me of anything that was happening while I read. Thus I reached the end of the second week, still without any indication of the tiger's return.

It will be appreciated that by this time I was growing impatient; I was, in fact, very fed up with my forced in activity. I racked my brains to think of some better plan but failed to arrive at any conclusion offering a more likely line of action than the one I was following. We were now in the fourth month, and the return of the tiger was due at any time, provided of course that he was still following his beat. I had arranged with the Deputy commissioner at Chikmagalur, the headquarters town of the district, to keep me posted of all human kills in the area through his subordinate, the Amildar at Kadur, which was only four miles from Birur. A runner was to be dispatched to me as soon as any news was received of a kill, and sure enough, two days later the runner arrived from the Amildar, telling me the tiger had killed at a hamlet on the Chikmagalur-Sakrepatna road four days earlier. The very next day the runner came again, to inform me of the slaying of a cowherd on the northern shores of the Ironkere Lake. This was five miles from the Madak Lake, which in turn was about nine miles from Hogarehalli. Reports so far had been satisfactory, inasmuch as they definitely indicated that the tiger was still following his regular beat and was only some fourteen miles away at the time of the last killing, two days before the news had reached me. I could therefore expect that by this time the tiger was very near to the outskirts of Hogarehalli, if not already there, and as the morrow would make the third day since he had eaten, there was every hope that he would be eagerly looking for a fresh victim.

That evening I told Moodlagiri Gowda to warn the in habitants of Hogarehalli and the neighborhood that the killer was in the vicinity, and to keep away from the scrub area and the plantation at all costs. The next morning found me seated in my accustomed place even earlier than usual. This time I had not brought a novel, but concentrated on banging the piece of wood as loudly as I could, coughing, and moving about on the branch of the tree so as to show myself as much as possible. In returning to the village that evening I took the greatest precautions against a surprise attack, but another two days passed and nothing happened. Nor did I receive any word regarding further kills. It now occurred to me that the tiger might have returned to his fastnesses in the Hogar Khan ridge, or perhaps by passed Hogarehalli and gone in a northwesterly direction to Lingadhalli and Bagavadkatte, or even westwards to Santaveri.

As the weather was comparatively warm and a half-moon had risen, I determined to spend the entire after noons and nights of the next two days in the tree, in the hope that I might thus be afforded an opportunity of attracting the tiger, which undoubtedly would also be on the move after dark. This would place a still greater strain on me, tired out as I was with fifteen days of fruitless sitting. Nevertheless, I determined to undertake the ordeal in a desperate attempt at success. The next forenoon found me back again, this time with a basket containing my dinner, a flask of hot tea, a blanket, water bottle, torch and other accoutrements that accompany the night-watcher who spends long, cramped hours on a tree. I also brought three tablets of Benzedrine to make sure that I did not fall asleep. I repeated the same ordeal of tapping all afternoon, and kept it up until late at night. The jungle was inordinately silent except for the call of a horned owl, and the far-away bark of a Kakar or jungle sheep. The moon set by 1 .30 am. and it became pitch dark and also very cold. Around 3 o'clock I felt sleepy and swallowed two out of the three tablets of Benzedrine. Half an hour later I heard a rustle, and then the excited cackle of a hyena as he winded or saw me. 'Ha \Ha\Ha\Ha\Ha\ What-have-we-here? Ha Ha\' he commented, and then slunk on his way in the darkness.

Again silence and darkness, till the pale glow of the false dawn heralded one hour to sunrise. That hour passed, and then, 'Whe-e-e-ew I Kuck-kaya-kaya-khuck'm', crowed the grey jungle cock, greeting the rising sun, as I dropped wearily from my perch, to struggle back to Hogarehalli and snatch four hours of sleep. Eleven a.m. found me back again on the tree to continue the tiresome watch. I had come to the conclusion that I could not stand much more of it. The hot afternoon passed as usual, the 'Tok-tok-tok-tok' of a green barbet, and the 'Ko-el ! Ko-yel of the Indian Kweel, which is related to the cuckoo family, being the only sounds. Evening approached, and a spur fowl, picking among the dried leaves below a nearby bush cried 'Kukurruka-wack. Kukurruka-wack.' There was the excited chatter of a group of birds colloquially known as the 'Seven-sisters' as they prepared to roost for the night, and as the sun sank below the slopes of Hogar Khan, a peacock issued his farewell note, 'Mia-a-oo- Ah-oo-Aaow-Ah-h-o-o-Tar-h-oo.' Then the birds of the night took up the cry. 'Chyeece-Chyeece' chirped the Night-jars, as they flitted overhead, to alter their call to 'Chuckoo-chuckoo-chuckoo', when they perched on the ground or branches of trees nearby.

Ten o'clock came, and, shortly afterwards a series of calls 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' from a herd of spotted deer in alarm. 'Aiow! Aiow!' they repeated persistently, in warning. Undoubtedly a carnivore was on the move, and had been seen or winded by the watchful hinds, but whether a panther or ordinary tiger or the man-eater itself, remained the question to be answered. I tapped louder and more vigorously with the wood, hoping the tiger would not ponder as to how this mysterious woodcutter came to be operating by night.

The minutes dragged on, and then there came abruptly the strident belling-cry of an alarmed sambar stag not half-a-mile away: 'Ponk\-Whee-onk\-Whee-onk\' he repeated, moving up towards Hogar Khan. Then deathly silence reigned again ! Continuing the tapping, I scanned every bush that was visible in the half-moon, mentally revising the various lines of cover I anticipated the tiger might take in stalking the tree. Nothing moved along any of these, and all was still, except for one last 'Ponk !' from the sambar, at a distance.

The strange feeling that something would occur at any moment came over me, and I felt that I was being watched, yet not a sound or crackle disturbed the stillness. Tapping away, I coughed, then moved and finally stood up from my seat, coughing and spitting in true Indian fashion. Yet not a sound, and then, like a bolt from the blue, he came!

'Woof! woof!' he roared, and an enormous grey mass, as large as a Shetland pony on wings, appeared as if by magic from behind a bush barely ten yards away, to charge the trunk of the tree and reach the crotch below me. A great grey head appeared only three yards directly below me; I depressed the torch switch and fired between the glaring eyes. With the explosion of the rifle the tiger fell backwards to earth, emitting a nerve-shattering roar. I put in a second shot. He acknowledged this, too, with a further roar, and the next second was gone. From the scrub a hundred yards away I heard a last 'Wrrr-uf !' and then complete silence.

I knew that neither of my shots had missed, but cursed myself, nevertheless, at not having dropped the animal with, at least, my second shot. Nevertheless I was certain it had been severely wounded and could not go very far. I allowed myself to doze for the rest of the night, and with the rising sun warily returned to Hogarehalli, to organize plans for following up the wounded beast.

Moodlagiri Gowda rallied splendidly, and while I had a short rest, followed by hot tea, toast and bacon, arranged with the owner of a buffalo herd to drive his animals through the bush in the wake of the wounded tiger in the hope that it would be induced to reveal its whereabouts when the buffaloes came near.

By 9 a.m., I was back at my tree, accompanied by Moodlagiri, two scouts, fifteen buffaloes and their owner. First I ascended to the top of the tree, and tried to locate the tiger, but nothing could be seen. At the foot of the tree, splashed against the bark, were flecks of blood from his face or head, as my first bullet hit him. Behind the bush, where he had retreated, we picked up a copious blood-trail, showing my second shot had also taken effect. Thereafter we drove the buffaloes slowly in the direction the retreating tiger had taken, spreading them out as far as possible into a rough line. I followed the buffaloes, the two scouts keeping immediately behind me. Moodlagiri and the owner of the buffaloes remained in the tree where I had sat.

We had covered about 200 yards when we heard a deep growl. At the same time the line of buffaloes stopped, and lowered their heads, horns extended, in the direction from which the growl had come. A tree grew a little to my left, and I whispered to one of the scouts to climb it and see if he could locate the tiger. This he did, but signaled back to me that he could see nothing. The buffaloes had meantime backed from the spot, nor could we get them to go forward. Leaving them there, and the scout still up the tree he had ascended, the remaining scout and I tiptoed back to Moodlagiri and instructed him to return to the village and try to collect some of the village dogs to help us. This he agreed to do, but it was a full hour and a half before he returned, accompanied by two mongrels only, saying that these were all he could succeed in collecting. We now set the dogs on the buffaloes to cause them to move forward, and so gained twenty-five yards, when the tiger set up a horrible growling. The buffaloes immediately came to a standstill, while the curs began yapping vociferously. Creeping forward for shelter behind the two foremost buffaloes, I endeavored to peer between their legs in an attempt to penetrate the undergrowth and catch a glimpse of the tiger, but could see nothing. I then attempted to prod the animals forward, but one of them turned on me suddenly, and I narrowly escaped the sweep of the long horns.

My position was awkward in the extreme, with a wounded tiger before me that might charge at any moment, and nervous buffaloes around, that would defend themselves with their horns in a united stampede against the tiger, or myself, whichever provoked them first. Re treating a few steps, I signaled to the scout, who was still in the tree, to descend. With his and the other scouts' help, I then began throwing stones over the buffaloes into the undergrowth at the point from which the growls had come. This action was greeted with a fresh outburst of growling, but nothing we could do would induce the tiger to break cover and show himself. Nor would he retreat, and this fact indicated that he was in a bad condition. Further stoning proving useless, I withdrew the two scouts, leaving the buffaloes where they were, and with their help, and accompanied by the two curs, made a wide detour of the jungle, to come up in the rear of the tiger and about 300 yards beyond it. From here we advanced very slowly, the scouts under my instructions climbing every tree and point of vantage as we crept forward in an Endeavour to see the tiger. Thus we covered some 200 yards, when one of the scouts signaled he could see some thing from the branch into which he had climbed. Descending, he whispered he had glimpsed a white and brown object beneath a bush about fifty yards away and roughly halfway to where the buffaloes were standing.

Climbing into the branch with him, he indicated a clump of bushes, at which I first stared in vain before I saw an indistinct brown and white patch just beyond the clump. Aiming at this object, I fired, and the tiger, mistaking the direction of our approach, charged the buffaloes with a series of short roars. The nearest was taken by surprise as the tiger leapt on him. The remainder got together and rushed forward with lowered horns. Meanwhile, the buffalo, which had been attacked, bellowed with pain and fear and endeavored to shake his adversary off. The tiger remained perched on the buffalo, snarling and growling vociferously.

From my point of vantage in the tree the scene was clear to me, but I dared not risk a shot for fear of killing the buffalo, or one of the herd that was fast approaching. And then the remaining buffaloes reached the spot and the scene became a medley of tossing horns and struggling brown bodies. Finding his position precarious the tiger leapt off the buffalo he was straddling and rushed back to cover, behind a bush only twenty-five yards away. I could clearly see him, crouched and watching the buffaloes. A single shot behind the left shoulder gave him his quietus. Later, on examining the tiger, I found that my first bullet of the night before had struck his right cheek, some two inches below and to the right of his eye, passing through his flesh and shattering his cheekbone. My second shot had cut through his belly, and in passing out had formed a gaping hole through which his entrails were trailing. My third and recent shot had penetrated his heart. The broken jaw, smashed by the 'car shikaris' months ago, had healed badly, thus explaining why the animal had been unable to bite properly and had turned man-eater in consequence.

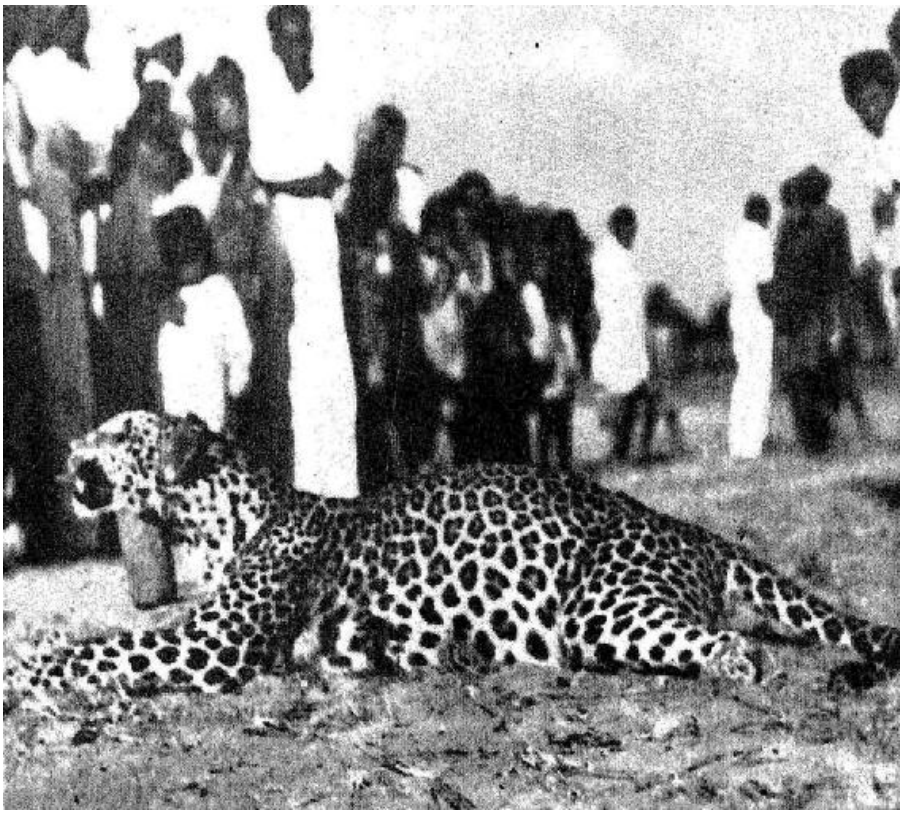
The attacked buffalo had been badly mauled by the powerful claws, but not bitten. Compensation satisfied the owner; I am certain the animal recovered from the wound, as buffaloes are invariably much hardier than cattle and can survive severe physical injuries. Thus ended the career of 'The Yemmaydoddi Man Eater', and while the district was well rid of a murderous and unrelenting killer, it must be remembered that the irresponsible and unsporting shot from the 'car shikaris' was the root cause of all the trouble, and to their discredit must be laid the twenty-nine innocent human lives that were lost.

The Killer of Jalahalli



THIS is not the story of a man-eating tiger, nor even of a man-eating panther, but of an ordinary leopard of very average size, who fought bravely in defense of its own life, fought cleverly and effectively, killing three persons and mauling eleven others in the process, dying gamely at last, undefeated and after days of suffering.

In 1938, prior to the outbreak of World War II, the village of Jalahalli, situated barely seven miles north-west of Bangalore, near the road to Tumkur, was an unimportant hamlet, perhaps boasting 150 houses, some of which were made of brick and others of thatch. As the city of Bangalore is the headquarters of the government of My sore, the Forest Department of that state, which is rich in forests of both evergreen and monsoon varieties, had its headquarters in Bangalore. The systematic loss and destruction of various forms of natural forest woods by insect and other pests was then engaging the close attention of the Government, and a plantation of forest seedlings had been set within a mile of Jalahalli, covering about four square miles of land, in which sandalwood, rosewood, red rose wood and other trees had been grown in natural array, in order to study the action of the various insect pests (which had also been introduced), in close reach of the laboratories at Bangalore. These plants had grown to an average height of ten feet, while the usual undergrowth of spear-grass, lantana, and occasional wait-a-bit thorn thickly carpeted the ground, to form dense thickets that had become the home of innumerable snakes, quite a number of rabbits, an occasional pea-fowl, and of course partridge and quail in considerable quantity.

Into this area one day strayed a wandering leopard from the rocky hills of Magadi, twenty miles away. It began its sojourn by living on the rabbits, rats and other small in mates of the Forest Plantation, but soon learned that it had a ready larder in the nearby hamlet of Jalahalli, in the form of goats and village dogs, which it began to eat with irksome regularity.

All went well till one day the leopard destroyed a goat belonging to the fat police-daffedar (or Sergeant) of Jalahalli. This act the official held to be an affront to his dignity and rank, and he swore to avenge it with the death of the leopard. The native police force had been armed with service . rifles, from which the magazines were removed, so that only one round could be fired at a time. This had been done as a precautionary measure against over-enthusiastic policemen firing round after round into mobs during local riots, which are sometimes common at relatively slight provocation.

So the daffedar sat up in a tree over his dead goat, armed with a single-shot service .303. Along came the panther at sundown, quite unsuspectingly, to receive a wound in its left foreleg, for the daffedar's aim had become unaccountably unsteady due to equally unaccountably shaky hands. The panther bounded away with a grunt, the fat daffedar shivered through the night in his tree, descended next morning, examined the ground for blood but found none, and concluded that he had very fortunately missed the leopard. Anyhow, he figured that it had been taught a lesson and would leave his goats severely alone in future. This happened on a Friday night. The next day, Saturday, passed uneventfully, and that evening the villagers decided on conducting a large-scale rabbit beat the following morning. Yards and yards of two-foot high rabbit-net were laid along the edge of the Forest Department plantation, and around some three acres of casuarinas trees that adjoined it. The beat next morning was to be conducted by about a hundred villagers, accompanied by dogs and armed with short wooden clubs. The rabbits would run into the nets and while struggling to get free, would be clubbed to death. All went according to plan till the casurina clump was reached, where, to the surprise and horror of all nearby, out jumped a leopard instead of a harmless rabbit. It rushed the ring of beaters in the near vicinity, and in less time than it takes to write had mauled six of them in various degrees of intensity from a scratch or two to a regular bite, or a deep raking from the razor-sharp claws. The beaters scattered in every direction and the panther returned to the casuarinas.

Nearby lived Hughey Plunkett and his mother. He had been a hunter of considerable repute in his days, having shot a round dozen tiger, and perhaps twice that number of panther, in the forest areas of Diguvametta in the Kurnool District of the Madras Presidency. The dispersed beaters approached him with news of the leopard, and appealed for help. Hughey had been spending a late morning in bed, and was in pajamas. He had not heard about the incident of the police daffedar's wounding the leopard, and scarcely credited the possibility of such an animal having strayed to within seven miles of the city of Bangalore. Anyhow, to appease the worrying villagers he slipped an L.G. and a ball cartridge into the respective barrels of his .12 bore shotgun, and accompanied them to the casurina belt.

Here he saw the mauled beaters and realized for the first time that a panther was actually in the vicinity. A careful stalk through the casurinas commenced, a small crowd of half-a-dozen men following in a knot at his rear. Hughey had passed more than halfway through the trees when the panther made the mistake of showing itself by darting from one patch of cover to the other. A quick left and right from Hughey bowled him over, and the animal lay twitching on its side.

Hughey dashed up, trailed by his followers, and then made the mistake, which cost him his life. He touched the now still form with his foot. The animal came to life, galvanized into action. It sprang upon Plunkett, fastened its fangs into his upper right arm, so that he could not use his weapon, while its hind claws raked him into streaming red ribbons. The men around scattered, only one of them attempting to beat off the animal with his ridiculous rabbit club. The panther then left Hughey and sprang upon this man, whom, together with four others, it clawed and bit before rushing back to the sheltering casuarinas, leaving its own blood-trail behind.

The scene of carnage can well be imagined, with Plunkett as its centre. It took quite sixty minutes for the men to pull themselves together and carry Hughey, who had fainted and whose right arm hung on by a mere strip of sinew, back to his farm-house. He bled profusely during this journey, and I wondered, when following the trail two days later, that a human being could lose so much blood and still live.

Mrs. Plunkett, with commendable presence of mind, bundled him into their car, together with four of the more severely wounded men, and headed for the Bowring Hospital in Bangalore. The remaining seven mauled villagers were taken to the Victoria Hospital, also at Bangalore. Blood transfusion was given to Hughey and an effort made to save his arm, but when gangrenous symptoms set in the following day it was amputated. The shock and loss of blood proved too great for him, and he died the next day in a delirium of fever.

All this had happened on a Sunday morning. That same afternoon a wandering goat-herd observed the blood-trail of the leopard as it entered the outskirts of the Forest Department plantation, having left the casuarinas trees, and informed two brothers living in the village of Jalahalli, named Kalaiah and Papaiah respectively. Next morning Monday these two brothers very pluckily, albeit foolishly, determined to follow-up the leopard on their own. The elder brother, Kalaiah, owned a hammer .12 bore of old design. The younger brother, Papaiah, had a single-barreled muzzle-loader. Loading up, these two brave men, shoulder to shoulder, followed the blood-spoor into the undergrowth of the plantation.

Wandering along like this they became separated, and in a twinkling the leopard pounced upon Kalaiah, throwing him to the ground and biting through bladder and testicles with savage ferocity. The force of the pounce had knocked the .12 bore from his hands, and as he lay screaming with the animal on top of him, his younger brother rushed to the rescue, discharging his muzzle-loader into the panther as it lay on top of Kalaiah. How he did not also shoot his brother remains a mystery.

The leopard, now still further wounded, left Kalaiah and pounced on Papaiah, who fell on his face, the fangs tearing through his back into his lung, while the talons of the hind feet raked the unfortunate man's buttocks and the backs of his thighs. The animal then made off. I was eating lunch that day when a man appeared at my door in a lather of sweat to give me the news. Hastily, I grabbed rifle, shotgun and torch and jumped into the car, my wife, not to be outdone at the last moment, determining to come with me. As I turned out of the gate of our bungalow on to the main road, I met Eric Newcombe of the local police force, who was on his way to visit me. Telling him what had happened and making my apologies, I endeavored to get away, but Eric refused to be excluded from the party and piled into the car also. It did not take us long to reach Jalahalli, and the sight that met us there was ludicrous in the extreme. Every in habitant, from the youngest to the oldest, had come out. A vast concourse had approached the edge of the plantation in order to catch a glimpse of the leopard, if possible. These had all taken to the branches of trees for personal safety, until the trees in the vicinity literally bent almost to breaking point with the load of humanity they carried. But nobody had gone forward to rescue Kalaiah and Papaiah, who still lay in the plantation where they had fallen four hours earlier, feebly shouting for help.

The first thing was obviously to succor these men, so we recruited a dozen carriers and entered the bush. Kalaiah we found in a very bad way and in extreme agony. Bubbles of blood were oozing from Papaiah's punctured lung. We conveyed them to the car, and I had started the engine to carry them to hospital, when a villager dashed up, with quite the longest spear I had ever seen in my life (of what practical use it is impossible to say, being up wards of twelve feet in length) and the news that he had just seen the panther slink into a big bush 300 yards away, where we could easily shoot it if we would only go with him.

I am aware that what happened hereafter was my own fault, in that I failed in my duty of first conveying the injured men to hospital. I plead, however, that the excitement of the situation and the temptation of this easy opportunity to bag the panther overcame my better judgment and caused me to go after the animal. Eric Newcombe insisted in accompanying me, so I handed him my .12 bore shotgun, loaded with L.G. in the left barrel and a lethal cartridge in the right, together with a few spare shells, while I retained the .405 rifle for my own use. This again was another mistake, as future events proved. I should have armed myself with the shotgun instead. We were accompanied only by the individual with the exaggerated spear, the remainder of our party having melted away. My wife brought up the rear, as a spectator, at a distance.

We approached to within twenty-five yards of the big patch of scrub not one particular bush as had been stated by the spearman into which the panther was seen to have crawled, and I told Eric to move over about thirty yards to my right, so as to avoid each other's line of fire, while completely covering the animal's every possible escape from the vicinity. I then instructed the spear-holder to stone the scrub, which he did very thoroughly for about twenty minutes. However, we heard and saw nothing. I confess that I then became very doubtful whether the panther was in the neighborhood at all. A little later Eric called out that he could see right into the scrub and that the panther was not there.

By this time some bolder spirits from the crowd had joined us. One of them was accompanied by a dog, which we tried to induce to enter the scrub, in the hope that its sense of smell would locate the leopard. But the dog refused to have anything to do with this proposition, and remained on the outskirts, barking at the undergrowth. This made me revise my opinion with regard to the panther being absent. Eric had by this time, however, become impatient and approached to within a few yards of the scrub, which he then commenced to stone on his own account. Nothing happened when his first few stones fell. Then he threw a large one, which evidently landed directly on, or very near, the panther. There was a loud 'Augh! Augh!' and like a streak of yellow light the beast shot from out of the scrub. He had no time to raise the shotgun, but nervous reaction evidently compelled him to press his trigger-finger and thus probably save his life. The gun went off, blowing a hole in the ground before him and undoubtedly scaring the panther considerably. The next second it landed upon him, sweeping the gun out of his grasp, while Eric and panther, in close embrace, rolled down a short steep bank of khud and into the long spear grass that clothed a small adjacent nullah.

All this time Eric was shouting to me to shoot and the leopard growled horribly. I could only see the violent agitation of the spear grass. I rushed forward, afraid of risking a shot from my heavy rifle at such close quarters, which would pierce both the leopard and Eric, tangled up as they were together. Then the panther left Newcombe and sprang into the Lantana bordering the khud. I fired, and as subsequent events proved, scored but a furrowing wound along the top of the beast's neck.

I expected Eric to lie prone after that encounter but was gratified to see him spring to his feet and race in the opposite direction, at really marathon speed. I have often chided him on his running abilities since that day, and it is, with him, a very sore point. He had been bitten right through his side, one of the ribs being cracked by a fang, while his thighs and arms were badly lacerated by the sharp and powerful claws.

We called it a day then and went to the Bowring Hospital, the seats of the car being soaked with human blood by the time we got the three wounded men there. The rest of that evening was spent in writing statements for the police, and in answering innumerable questions, some of which were inane.

Poor Kalaiah died that night in extreme pain. His brother Papaiah recovered after a month, having narrowly missed succumbing to the injury to his lung. Eric Newcombe, due to the intervention of Providence and a good constitution, did not run even the slightest temperature and made a complete recovery in a fortnight. The next day, Tuesday, saw several hunters after the wounded animal. There was Lloydsworth of the Tobacco Factory, a famed shikari who had shot many tigers and panthers, and Beck, an equally renowned shot and big game hunter. Never a trace could we find, however. All blood trail had petered out, and the panther had vanished, seemingly into thin air. That evening it killed a herds boy, aged about twelve years, who had ventured too near the spot where, unknown to him, the beast was lying. Incidentally, this spot was over a mile from the locality where the earlier incidents had taken place. The boy was killed outright; the panther had seized his throat and bitten through the jugular and windpipe.

The morning of the fifth day, Wednesday, found me at the spot where the herds boy had been killed. We made every Endeavour to follow the wounded animal which, although very severely hit, had ceased bleeding by this time, due to the congealing of the blood, at least externally. I floundered about in the dense grass and lantana, which grew thicker as the ground sloped into a hollow. Halfway down this slope the leopard heard or saw me coming, and began to growl its warning against further approach. This was fortunate, for otherwise I might not be here to tell you his story. The undergrowth being almost impenetrable, I called a halt to further advance, which would have been suicidal and decided to await events, which I was almost certain would end in a day or two with the death of the panther from its many major wounds.

Later that day occurred an amusing incident. The police had turned out in force from Bangalore. Some thirty of them, armed with single-shot service rifles, had been crowded into a police-van, which was protected all around by expanded metal meshing against stoning by mobs during times of riot. The driver of this improvised armored car had been instructed to scour the plantation till the enemy was located and brought to book by the riflemen. This he proceeded to do to the best of his ability, but, not knowing where he was going in the long spear grass and tangled undergrowth, he eventually succeeded in half-capsizing the vehicle in a concealed, overgrown ditch. The driver and men were imprisoned inside and shouted lustily for help. None of them would venture out, for was there not a man-killing leopard loose that would kill and eat the first to alight?

Hearing cries at a distance, we approached the spot and released the imprisoned representatives of the law, who then managed to set their vehicle back on its wheels and return to their barracks, hardly any the worse for their adventure. Before leaving, they stated they had heard growls in the undergrowth, but this I put down to a bad attack of mass nerves. I had made it a point to be at the plantation daily from 7 a.m. till sunset, and at about noon on the sixth day, which was Thursday, I saw vultures gathering in the sky. Watching them through my binoculars, I saw them alight in the midst of the small valley that divided the plantation, the same one, in fact, as that into which I had tried to force my way the previous day.

I knew these sagacious birds had found something dead. It was either the panther itself, or something that had been killed by the panther. Cautiously I forced myself through the dense lantana and clinging wait-a-bit thorn, expecting any moment to hear the guttural coughs of the leopard as it charged me. Nothing happened, however, and at last, lacerated by the thorns, I reached the valley. I had gone about fifty yards when four vultures rose from the ground with a heavy flapping of wings. Advancing, I came on a small pool of water, with the panther lying dead beside it, in the act of drinking.

The unfortunate animal had bled internally a great deal and suffered the pangs of thirst and fever. The exertion of crawling to water and drinking must have increased the bleeding, for it had vomited great gout of thick blood into the water before dying, and this stained half the pool a clouded crimson. The vultures had just settled upon my arrival and fortunately had had no time to destroy the skin.

Going back to Jalahalli, I soon found the men to carry the dead animal to my car, lashed to a pole. I took it to Yesvantapur Police Station to make an official report. Here I was delayed for three hours while awaiting the arrival of the necessary officials, much to my annoyance, as I feared the skin might spoil from not being removed from the carcass.

At last I was given permission to take away the dead animal, which you may be sure I lost no time in doing. While skinning, I had ample opportunity to piece together the sequence of facts that had resulted in the death of three persons, and the several maulings. The wound in the leopard's left foreleg, which had been inflicted by the .303 bullet of the fat police daifedar, was crawling with worms and completely gangrenous. Hughey Plunkett's shotgun ball had passed completely through the animal, cutting through the stomach without inflicting an immediately fatal wound. A single L.G. pellet from the other barrel was imbedded in the bone of the forehead and had evidently stunned the animal completely, allowing Plunkett to walk up and touch it. Five slugs from Papaiah's musket were embedded in its side, but all too far back to cause immediate effect. Lastly, my own thoroughly ineffective rifle shot, as the beast bounded away from Newcombe, had scored but a deep furrow across the back of the animal's neck.

I produced this skin at Court, in support of a claim for Government assistance by Kalaiah's family for the loss of their breadwinner, and the gift of a plot of land for their sustenance. I am glad to record that, in the course of time, the dead man's daring was recognized. With the advent of World War II, Jalahalli underwent a radical change. The Forest Department Plantation and the casurina trees were cut down and thousands of buildings appeared, first to house Italian Prisoners of War, then as one of the largest Hospital bases for the projected invasion of Burma and Malay, and latterly to house Air Force Personnel, being one of the main training bases in India for her rapidly expanding air arm. The skin of this panther now adorns the hall of my bungalow. I cannot help but record the deep admiration and respect in which I hold this beast. For while others killed in stealth, taking their victims unawares, this leopard fought cleanly and courageously in defense of its own life, against great odds, though it was severely wounded.

The Hermit of Devarayandurga

HE was called 'the hermit', because in many ways he resembled one, both in the choice of his abode, and in his eccentric habits. For he was an unusual tiger. Although no man-eater, and never once accredited with eating human flesh, he was of a particularly ferocious disposition and very hostile to the human race. He killed three people two men and a woman within the short space of five days, and all on the impulse of the moment and out of sheer aggressiveness. Further, his habits were unlike those of a tiger, in that he ate goats and village dogs, which tigers rarely do, especially dogs. And then again, he suddenly appeared in the scrub jungles clothing the hill of Devarayandurga, six miles from the town of Tumkur and within fifty miles of the city of Bangalore. Devarayandurga had not held a tiger for many a decade, being the home only of a few wild-pig and peafowl. The area did not boast a regular forest, but was covered with very ordinary scrub-jungle of lantana bushes and wait-a-bit thorn. Moreover, the hilltop was very rocky, and held a few small caves. In these an occasional small panther was known to take up residence, ousting the previous occupant, usually a porcupine, by the simple expedient of devouring it. But the caves hardly provided sufficient shelter, let alone a safe hiding place, for a large animal like a tiger. The whole area was but an island scrub among flat, cultivated fields, which no normal tiger would ever risk crossing either by day or by night.

But this is exactly what 'the hermit' did, for cross these fields it must have done, to reach the doubtful and scanty shelter provided by Devarayandurga hillock. At first no one knew that a tiger had appeared. The few villages that are scattered in the area began to suffer the loss of an unusual number of goats and dogs, and the loss was ascribed to a panther, till the tiger's pugmarks were picked up one morning traversing a ploughed field near one of these villages. Within the next two days a large cow was killed that had been left out to graze all-night within the hitherto safe outskirts of the village. The owner of this cow, an old woman, was very attached to the animal, and when she heard next morning that it had been killed, she proceeded to the spot, a quarter of a mile distant, where she squatted down beside her dead protégé and commenced to weep and wail aloud, calling heaven to witness the great sorrow she felt, and the loss she had suffered, with the death of her beloved cow. The other members of the small family had accompanied the old lady to the spot, and had sat around a while in silent sympathy, to listen to her weeping and wailing. But they soon grew tired of it, besides having other things to do, and one by one they returned to the village, leaving the old woman alone beside her dead cow, still weeping with unabated vigor.

It was now 11 a.m., and a bright sun shone down on the scene. No ordinary tiger would have returned to its kill at such a time, in that glare and heat, and to a place disturbed by such noisy wailing, but 'the hermit' was not an ordinary tiger. This tiger did return and saw the old woman beside the kill, rocking herself to and fro while she cried aloud. The beast concluded that this noise was intolerable and must be stopped. So out it sprang on the old woman, and with a simple blow of a paw put an abrupt end to her life.

It then dragged the cow some yards away and ate a hearty meal. The body of the old woman was untouched, and her existence apparently forgotten by the tiger. When she did not return by 4 p.m., her family, judging that she must have exhausted herself with weeping and fallen asleep, came to the spot to take her home, when great was their surprise and horror to find she had been killed, while the tiger had made a hearty meal of the dead cow and returned into the brushwood. Rushing pell-mell back to the village, they spread the sad news. Soon the headman, armed with a muzzle-loader, and accompanied by two dozen stalwarts carrying a miscellany of hand weapons, came to the spot. They then attempted to follow the tiger's trail, but not for long, for the animal had entered the dense scrub quite close at hand. Being too afraid to enter the brushwood, they commenced to shout lustily and throw stones, and the headman discharged two musket shots into the air. Nothing happened and they turned back in order to carry the body to the village, when out rushed the tiger and pounced on the last man of the party the unfortunate headman, and incidentally the only member of the group to carry a firearm. He was dead before he became aware of what had happened. The party broke and fled to the village, and only late next morning did they return in great force to recover the two corpses, both of which had been untouched during the night. The tiger, however, had made a further meal of the cow.

For the next two days consternation reigned supreme. On the third morning, a traveler approached the village from Tumkur, driving before him two donkeys laden with a variety of goods. A mile down the road from the village the tiger pounced on the leading donkey, which collapsed beneath its attacker. The second donkey stood still, while the traveler, with a scream of terror, ran down the road whence he had come. His action appeared to provoke this extraordinary tiger, for it chased and killed him, and then returned to the dead donkey, which it carried away and ate. Both in chasing the man, and on its return, it had passed the second donkey, which it did not even touch. The body of the man remained uneaten. These incidents, occurring so close to Bangalore, were headlined in the local Press; next morning I left for Devarayandurga by car, reaching the spot in just over two hours.

Questioning the frightened villagers, I was told the story as I have just recounted it. The weather being dry and the roads dusty, all pug-marks had disappeared by this time, and for a short while I was disinclined to believe that the marauder was a tiger, thinking it more likely to be a large and strangely-aggressive panther. The men who had accompanied the headman, however, and had witnessed his attack and death, assured me that it was indeed a tiger. Nevertheless, knowing how prone the villager is to exaggeration, I was still in doubt.

After a short lunch, I spent the afternoon, accompanied by an obviously nervous guide, in scouring the surrounding area, poking among the caves and tiring myself out completely in looking for 'the hermit'; but never a trace, nor a pug-mark, did I come across. At 4 p.m. I returned to the village, and with great difficulty procured a half-grown bull as bait, no buffaloes being available in this area. This bait I tied about three-quarters of a mile from the village, at a spot where the road was crossed by an extremely rocky and thorny nullah. It was now close on 6 o'clock, and as there was no time to erect a machan, I decided to spend the night at the Travelers' Bungalow at Tumkur, six miles away and return next morning, by which time I hoped the tiger would have killed the bait.

This I did, waking at 5 a.m. and reaching the spot where I had tied the bait by about 5.30. It was just growing light when I stopped the car a half-mile down the road, so as not to disturb 'the hermit', if he had made a kill. Approaching the spot cautiously, I found my bait had disappeared. Closer examination revealed the animal had been killed and the tethering rope severed, apparently by deliberate, and very vigorous tugging on the part of the slayer. Pugmarks were also visible, and these showed, first, that the killer was a tigress and not a tiger after all, and second, that this was an adult animal and large for a tigress. Remembering the stories I had been told of the peculiar nature of this animal and her disposition to attack suddenly, I followed the drag very cautiously, scanning the area ahead and on all sides most carefully at each step, looking behind me, too, every little while. Progress was thus very slow, but the drag was clearly visible nevertheless, and in 150 yards I came upon my dead bait. The tigress, apparently, had moved off. The young bull had been killed in the usual tiger fashion, its neck being broken. The tigress had then carried it to the place where it now lay, when she had sucked the blood from the jugular, as was evident by the deep fang-marks in the throat and the dried blood on the surface. She may then have left the kill and returned later in the night, or settled down to a feed right away. The tail of the bait had been bitten off where it joined the body, and left at a distance of about ten feet; this is a habit normal to most tigers, and generally to big panthers also. Finally, the stomach and entrails had been neatly removed to a distance of again about ten feet, but not near where the tail had been left. The tigress had then begun her meal in the usual tiger fashion from the hindquarters, eating about half the bait. From all these facts it was therefore apparent that the tigress was not, after all, the very strange and eccentric animal she was reported to be. She just appeared to be a particularly bad-tempered female.

Hoping that she might return, I climbed a scraggy tree that grew about twenty yards away, and was the only cover available for my purpose. Here I remained till 9.30 a.m. No tigress appeared, but on the contrary the sharp-eyed vultures, from their soaring flight above, spotted the kill, and I soon heard the rattling sound of the wind against their wing-feathers, as they plummeted to earth for the anticipated feast. To save the kill from being consumed, I was therefore compelled to descend and cover it with branches broken from the adjacent bushes, afterwards returning to the car and making for the village. Here I procured the services of four men and came back to the tree, where I instructed them to put up my portable charpoy-machan, which I had brought with me in the car. By noon all was ready. One of the men then suggested that, as 'the hermit' was particularly fond of goats, I would considerably increase my chances of bagging her if I tied a live goat in the vicinity. The bleating of the goat, he said, would surely draw her to the spot, even if she had decided to abandon the half-eaten bull. Thinking there was something in the idea, I motored back to the village and soon returned with a half-grown goat of the size that usually bleat vociferously.

After some biscuits and tea, I ascended the machan after instructing the men to tie the goat only when I had taken my place; thus the goat would feel it was alone and bleat loudly as soon as they were gone. It was about 2 p.m. before the men finally departed, and very shortly afterwards the goat began to bleat in really grand style. This it kept up intermittently till about 5.45 in the evening, when I heard the tigress approaching by the low, moaning sound she occasionally emitted. The goat heard this too, stopped its bleating, and faced the direction of the sound while its state of stark terror was pitifully visible as it trembled violently from head to foot. Most unfortunately, the tigress was approaching from behind me. Though my charpoy-machan provided ample room for me to turn around, the trunk of the tree itself and a clump of exceptionally heavy wild-plum bushes that grew nearby completely obstructed my line of vision. Moreover, the ground sloped steadily downwards from the direction in which the tigress was coming, and this probably caused her to spot my machan while she was still some distance away, being on a level with her eyes from the higher ground down which she was approaching. Or it might have been the extraordinary sixth sense, with which I have noticed some carnivora are particularly gifted, that put her on her guard. Whatever it was, that tigress sensed something suspicious in the surroundings and that danger lurked nearby, for she gave vent to a shattering, snarling roar and began to encircle the whole area repeatedly, roaring and snarling every little while. The unfortunate goat almost died with fright, and the last I could see of it as darkness fell was a huddled, trembling patch crouching close to the ground.

That extraordinary tigress made the night hideous with her roars until 9 p.m., when, with a final snarl, she walked away. Thereafter nothing happened, except for a sharp drop in temperature towards the early hours of the morning, when it became intensely, miserably cold. My teeth chattered in the tree, while those of the goat chattered below me, to a slower rhythm, but more audible or so I believed.

Dawn found us both exhausted after a sleepless night in the freezing cold. The goat was, moreover, so hoarse after its vigorous bleating of the night before, followed by the exposure, that although it opened its mouth in an effort to make some noise, no sound was forthcoming.

I spent two hours at midday looking for the tigress, with out finding a trace. I then selected another tree, this time of a leafy variety and overlooked by no rising ground, where I erected my machan, into which I ascended by 4 p.m., with another goat tethered below me. But this goat was as insensitive or as callous as the one of the night before had been sensitive and nervous; for with the departure of the villager who had tethered it, it settled placidly down on the ground to chew heaven knows what, which it continued to do until darkness hid it from view.

This time I had clad myself more warmly, and by mid night, closely wrapped in my blanket, I fell into a deep and dreamless slumber, to awaken at dawn to see that most placid of goats still chewing, again heaven knows what, as if there was not a single carnivore in the whole, wide world.

Again I searched for the tigress at noon, and again I failed; and again by 3 p.m. I was up in my machan, this time with a young bull as bait below me. It was 7 o'clock and almost dark, when unexpectedly a party of villagers, carrying a lighted lantern, came from the village to tell me that the tigress had killed another cow only half-an-hour earlier, near the bund (or embankment) of a small tank, a furlong from the village, but in the opposite direction, and was engaged at that very moment in eating it.

Considering it a waste of time to remain, I therefore descended and, instructing the men to leave the bait where it was on the off chance of the tigress passing in that direction later in the night, hastened after them towards the village and the tank.

Once we reached the village I instructed them to extinguish the lantern. I then took only one of them as guide and advanced towards the tank. My companion whispered that the cow had been killed on the left of the road, hardly fifty yards from the verge and just a furlong from the village.

It was pitch dark by now, and, with the villager close behind me, and walking down the centre of the road, I switched on the torch, which was mounted on my rifle, and began to direct it to my left. There was a snarl and a 'woof, and then two large, red white orbs shone back at me from a distance I judged to be within 200 yards and at a slightly higher level. I was puzzled by this last factor, till the villager whispered that the tigress was standing on top of the bund of the small tank.

Walking along silently in my rubber shoes, with the villager following bare-footed behind, we made no noise whatever. Meanwhile the tigress stared back at the light. In this way I advanced down the road for more than 100 yards, till I reached the place where the tank-bund joined it. We then turned left, and commenced the slight ascent to the top of the bund. The tigress was now about 100 yards away and began to growl. I stopped, and was in the act of raising my rifle to my shoulder for a shot, when her courage gave way, and she turned tail and bolted along the top of the bund in three or four leaps, after which she descended to the right on the far side of the tank and was lost to view. We then walked along the top of the embankment, shining the torchlight down into the tangle of scrub. A large, solitary banyan-tree grew there, and great was our surprise when the eyes of the tigress reappeared at a fork in the tree, quite fifteen feet or more above the ground and level with the top of the tank-bund on which I was standing. It was surprising, because tigers generally do not climb trees to such heights, especially when followed by torch light,

I could now make out her form clearly, squatting doglike in the crotch of the tree. Taking careful aim between the shining orbs, I fired. There was a loud thud as the tigress hit the earth, followed by a coughing grunt and then silence.

We walked along the tank-bund for some distance, shining the torchlight into the tangle of bushes below the bund to our right, but not another sound did we hear. Knowing that my bullet had struck 'the hermit', I decided to get some sleep and return next morning. Accordingly we retraced our steps to the village and to the spot where I had left the car, a mile away and beyond where my bait was secured. At Tumkur I ate a light dinner, washed down with some strong tea and a pipe-load of tobacco, after which I turned in for the night with the highest hopes of being able to pick up the tigress in the morning.

I was back at the village at daybreak and, collecting my assistant of the night before, we were soon on the tank bund, from which we very cautiously descended the sloping ground to the foot of the solitary banyan tree, in which the tigress had been sitting when I fired my shot. Our attention was immediately arrested by blood splashed over a wide area where the animal had hit the ground in falling off the tree. Looking about, we then found a segment of bone, about a square inch in area, in which a part of the lead of my .405 bullet was imbedded. By the sharp claw-marks on the tree-trunk we saw the way in which this extraordinary tigress had pulled her great weight up the tree to attain the fork. My companion soon climbed up nimbly to the same place, and found a few drops of blood in the fork itself. We then began very cautiously to follow the blood trail from the banyan tree, and it was soon apparent that the tigress had been hit in the head and was severely hurt. The blood-spoor zigzagged about aimlessly, going in a narrow circle and recrossing itself several times. She was obviously in a stunned condition, or perhaps blinded, and did not know what she was doing or where she was going. Frequently we came on large pools of clotted blood, and finally to a spot where the tigress had fallen, or probably lain on the ground for part of the night. The whole circle, roughly ten feet in diameter, was red with blood. When she had moved away, evidently in the early hours of the morning, bleeding had almost stopped, and only an occasional drop marked thereafter a wayward path into the dense undergrowth of lantana, grass and wait-a-bit thorn, that clothed the foot of the embankment.

First of all, we encircled this belt of undergrowth, right to the end of the long embankment some 200 yards away, and back again along its upper end, but there was no blood trail in any direction, or trace of the tigress having left this cover. She was obviously, therefore, somewhere in this belt of dense undergrowth, which, as I have just said, was about 200 yards long and varied in width from about seventy-five yards to barely ten. But was she dead or alive? That was the question, and on the answer depended the lives and limbs of my companion and myself.

Returning to the spot where the last drop of blood indicated the place at which the tigress had entered the undergrowth, we then began systematically to beat the area. My companion and I, standing close together, hurled stone after stone into the massed vegetation, but only complete silence and stillness greeted our efforts. We progressed in this fashion along the edge of the belt of undergrowth. In hopes of getting the tigress to show herself, I fired five rounds in all into the lantana, but with out response from the tigress. About three-quarters of the way along this belt, a low tree, a dozen feet in height, stood out from the surrounding bushes. My companion slipped towards this, and began to climb it with the view to obtaining a better view, when, without warning, out came the tigress with a single roar and scrambled up behind him.

The man screamed with fright, while from my position, barely twenty yards away, I fired three rounds into the tawny form before it toppled backwards into the Lantana. 'The hermit' was dead at last. The tigress, as I had judged, was an old female with blunted fangs. Her age had probably forced her to seek easier living in the proximity of man, where there would be goats, dogs and cattle for easy killing. Hunger and old age probably accounted for her quick and vicious temper, but lack of courage, and an inborn aversion to man, had prevented her from actually becoming a man-eater, although I have little doubt that she would have eventually turned into one had she been allowed to continue her career unchecked. Incidentally, my bullet of the night be fore had struck her on the bridge of the nose, but rather high up, removing the piece of bone we had found, but at the same time not entering the head of the animal deeply enough to kill it. Indeed, it had actually ricocheted off, carrying the piece of bone with it, so that it was just possible the old 'hermit' might have recovered after all, despite the vast quantity of blood she had lost, had she not disclosed herself by attacking my companion as he climbed the tree.

Byra, the Poojaree

HE wore only a lungoti when I met him, a strip of cloth some three inches wide that passed between the thighs and connected, before and behind, to a piece of filthy knotted string that encircled the waist; but he was a gentleman to his finger-tips, and he was, and is, my friend. Twenty-five long years have passed since first I met Byra, and it happened in this wise.

The false dawn was lighting the eastern sky above the hills that encircle the little forest bungalow of Muthur, nestling at the foot of the lofty hill of Muthurmalai, that caused the winding jungle stream known as the Chinar River to alter its leisurely course through the dense jungle in a sharp southerly bend to complete the last seven miles of its journey through the wilds, before it joined the Cauvery River in rocky cataracts at Hogenaikal. It was midsummer, and the Chinar was at that time bone dry.

I had come out early and was padding noiselessly down the golden sands of the Chinar in the hope of surprising a bear, large numbers of which were accustomed, at that time of the year, to visit the banks of the river and gorge their fill on the luscious, purple, but somewhat astringent fruit of the 'Jumlum' tree, which grew to profusion in the locality. If not a bear, I hoped to meet a panther on his way home after a nightlong hunt. These animals, I knew, favoured closely skirting the undergrowth along the banks of the river on their lookout for prey that might cross the stream. Deer, in the way of sambar, jungle-sheep and the beautiful chital were fairly plentiful in those by-gone days, but such graceful quarry were not my objective that morning.

I had gone about a mile from the bungalow, and the light of the false-dawn was rapidly fading into that renewed period of darkness before the real dawn was to be heralded by the cry of the jungle-cock and the raucous call of pea-fowl, when I suddenly heard a surreptitious but distinct rustle from a clump of henna bushes that grew by the stream to my left.

That day I carried no torch, so cautiously approached the henna to within about ten feet and stopped. Then immediately before me I noticed that a large hole, about three feet in diameter and equally deep, had been dug, into which about a foot of water had trickled through the dry sands by sub-soil percolation. This, I knew, was the work of a poacher, to attract parched deer to quench their thirst, when a well-delivered ball or hail of slugs from a muzzleloader would end their existence. And the noise I had heard had undoubtedly been made by the poacher himself, perhaps upon seeing me, or perhaps just stirring in his sleep after a nightlong vigil.

Calling out in Tamil for the man to come out or I would shoot, I at first received no answer. Upon advancing a few paces, a diminutive figure stood up from the undergrowth and, stepping forward on to the river sand, prostrated itself before me, touching the earth with its forehead in three distinct salutes.

Telling him to stand up, I asked who he was. 'Byra, a Poojaree', came the simple answer. 'Where is your gun?' I demanded. 'Gun, what gun? How can a poor, simple man like me own a gun? I cannot even shoot, master. I am a traveler and lost my way last night, and being very tired, fell asleep in these bushes. Your honor, by calling out just now, awoke me, and you ask for my gun ! I have never even seen such a thing.'

' Tick it up and bring it here,' I ordered. He hesitated a few seconds, then stooped down and brought forth an ancient matchlock, some yards in length, with a butt hardly three inches across at the widest point.

And that is how I met Byra, the Poojaree, and my friend for twenty-five years, who has taught me most of all I now know about the jungle and its wild, carefree, fierce, but lovable and most wonderful fauna. 'What have you shot?' I asked him. 'Nothing', he replied. 'No animal came to the water last night.'

'What did you shoot?' I demanded in a sterner tone. Bidding me to follow, he walked diagonally upstream towards the opposite bank. I saw a dark heap lying on the river sand, which, upon approach, turned out to be a sambar-doe, a great gaping hole in her neck, from which the blood had flowed to stain the fair white sands.

I looked at Byra witheringly, anger and indignation in my glance. 'Master, we are hungry', he said simply, 'and if I do not hunt we cannot eat, and if we do not eat, we shall die'.

Squatting on the sands a few yards away, I invited Byra to sit beside me, and taking out some pipe-tobacco from my pouch, handed it to him. Receiving the tobacco from me on to the palm of his hand, he sniffed it suspiciously, and then, beaming with pleasure and satisfaction, introduced the lot into his system, by the simple process of tilting back his head and pouring it down his mouth. The next few minutes were spent in silence, Byra being too busy chewing my tobacco !

'Master will not tell the forest-guard about my gun', he then ventured anxiously. 'It is my only way of living, and if the guard knows, he will come and take it away. Also I will be sent to jail, and my wife and four children will starve.'

Here was a pretty conundrum for my solution. My duty as a Forest License-holder was to hand over poachers to the authorities. Indeed the terms of the License actually authorized me to help in arresting such individuals. More over, my conscience urged me to have no sympathy for this rascal, who was ruthlessly murdering female deer by the most unsporting method of slaughtering them when they came to slake their burning thirst during the hot summer months. And yet, there was something likeable about the little fellow, and the degree of confidence he was now beginning to bestow upon me after our short acquaintance. Or perhaps my strong tobacco had induced this trust. Avoiding the question and a direct answer, I asked him where he lived. 'We have no homes, no hut, no fields,' he replied. 'All day we wander in the forest in search of bee hives. If we find one, we are lucky, for we gather the precious honey, which we take to market at the village of Pennagram, seven miles away. For a small pot of honey we may get one rupee. With this we shall buy ragi (a food grain), which may perhaps feed us for four days. If we do not find honey, we may be able to catch an "Oodumbu" (a large snake-lizard). This is even greater luck, for not only will we eat the "oodumbu", whose flesh is very good for our strength, but we shall sell its tail to the native doctor at Pennagram. He is a wonderful man, that doctor is. He cooks the tail and mixes with it some wonderful medicine. Then he mashes the whole thing into a fine powder, which he divides into paper packets and sells at eight annas a packet. These packets are sold to lovers, and are very efficacious. If a man sprinkles just a pinch of this powder on to the left shoulder of the girl he loves, she will not be able to resist him.'

Here he looked at me sideways. 'If your honor cannot capture the heart of the lady you love,' he continued confidentially, 'I will get some of this powder for you from this native doctor, free of charge, as he is a great friend of mine, and, moreover, beholden to me for the continued supply of oodumbu's tails. All you have to do is to sprinkle a little of it on the left shoulder of the mem-sahib you love, and she is yours, for ever and ever,'

Hastily telling him that I was not so much in love just then as to have to resort to oodumbu's tails, I bade him continue about himself.

'Sometimes, when we are very hungry, we dig for the roots of the jungle yam, which in these parts grows as a creeper with a three-pronged leaf. These yams, or roots, when roasted in a fire, or boiled with salt-water and curry powder, are very tasty and good to eat. At night my wife, children, and I sleep in a hole that we have dug in the banks of the Annaibiddahalla River, a small tributary of the Chinar River, as you may know, Sir. In the hot weather I go shooting, like I have done tonight. At such times my wife or one of the children, by turns, remain awake all night, to give the alarm should elephants approach, when they will then leave the hole and scramble up the bank or the big tree that grows beside our shelter. For these elephants are very dangerous and sometimes attack us. Only a year ago one of them pulled a poojaree woman out of a similar shelter, while she was asleep, and trampled her to pulp. Should we shoot anything, we eat some of the meat, and dry some by smoking. The rest we sell at Pennagram and perhaps get fifteen rupees for it. With the money we can purchase enough grain to feed the family for a whole month. Knowing this,' he concluded, coyly, 'I am sure you, the Maharaj, will not divulge the fact of my possessing the matchlock to the forest-guard. Incidentally, it belonged to my father, and his father before him, who, we are told, purchased it in those days for thirty rupees,' The rascal then looked at me winningly, a happy smile about the corners of his mouth, although there was an anxious look in his eyes. My sense of duty as a license holder vanished; I strangled my conscience then and there and replied in a voice which I tried unsuccessfully to make non-committal, but it was distinctly sheepish instead, 'No, Byra, I shall not tell, I promise you,'

He sprang to his feet and prostrated himself before me, his forehead again touching the ground three times in the only form of salutation the Poojarees know. 'I thank you from my heart, master, and on behalf of my family,' he said simply. 'Henceforward we are yours to command,' Having extracted a promise from Byra to call at the forest lodge later that day, as I wished to question him about the presence and movement of carnivora in the locality, I went my way, assiduously avoiding a second glance at the murdered sambar-doe, for fear my conscience should come to life again and cause me to regret my hasty promise to this plausible adventurer.

True to his word, Byra turned up at about ten that morning, and close questioning disclosed that just two nights earlier a tiger had passed within five feet of him when sitting up for sambar at a spot about two miles downstream, called Aremanwoddu, where another tributary joined the Chinar. He said that this animal lived in the locality, was an old tiger, and that his beat was very restricted, probably due to his age.

Then he related an unusual story, to the effect that a month earlier he had been in hiding close to this very spot, when a Chital had appeared, which he had successfully accounted for with a single shot from his matchlock. It had been a bright moonlight night, and the chital having fallen in its tracks, Byra had reloaded his musket and was preparing to spend the rest of the night in sleep, when a large tiger had walked out of the undergrowth, passed the dead Chital, stopped, sniffed at it, and finally calmly picked it up and walked off with the prize. Byra had not dared to dispute ownership with the tiger, in consideration of the act that he was armed with a muzzle-loader, which took a considerable time to re-load.

I had no live bait with me at the time, and to procure a heifer meant sending to Pennagram, and probably a delay till the next day. So I decided to sit that night with Byra on the banks of Aremanwoddu, after telling him definitely that, at least as long as he was in my company, no deer poaching of any sort would be condoned. By 6 p.m. we were seated in an excellent and very comfortable hide that Byra had set up in the rushes clothing the confluence of the two jungle streams. The nights were warm and Byra wore nothing more than his lungoti. It was a lesson in patience I learned that day, for from the time Byra had first squatted in the rushes, he never moved as much as his forearm that whole long night. Nothing came that night, and by 2 a.m. I became impatient and finally fell asleep, to awake at dawn with Byra still squatting immovably beside me.

Seeing my disappointment, he offered to accompany me on a tracking venture later in the morning. So after returning to the bungalow for a bath and breakfast, we were back again at Aremanwoddu shortly before 9 a.m. With Byra in front we walked upstream, and had gone perhaps half-a-mile when we came upon the tracks of a large male tiger that had crossed the sand during the night and was making up the rocky incline of the Panapatti Ridge, a little over a mile away. The ground was too dry for tracking, but Byra said he thought he knew some likely spots where the tiger might be lying up.

So we continued, crossing ridge after ridge, exploring the little valleys of undergrowth and dense bamboo that lay between. Once we heard the rumbling sound produced by the digestive process-taking place in the cavernous stomach of an elephant. Giving the spot where he was resting a wide berth, we continued our peregrination, climbing upwards continuously to the Panapatti Ridge.

We had now reached shrub-jungle level, and outcrops of rocky boulders appeared on all sides. Byra said that the tiger lived in one of the many caves that existed among the huge, piled rocks, as did bears too. Handicapped by the stony, sun-baked earth that did not show tracks of any kind, I was for turning back, but my companion had be come really interested by now, and advocated pushing on, over and across the ridge.

Streaming with sweat from exposure to the mercilessly blazing sun, we at last reached the summit and began to descend the opposite slope. On this face the ridge was even more boulder-strewn than was the one we had just climbed At last we came to a series of massive rocks, forming many caves. Byra advocated that I sit in the meager shade offered by an overhanging rock, while he explored the vicinity. I gladly assented and sat down to cool-off with a smoke, while my companion slipped away amidst the sea of boulders. Within ten minutes he was back, saying excitedly that he had smelt the tiger and was sure it was hiding in one of the caves close by. By this time I was distinctly disgruntled and incredulous, and told Byra, in a few terse words, to cut out the bluff. He looked at me with amazement, and then I could see condescending pity written plainly across his pudgy countenance. 'Come and see for yourself,' he said shortly, and without waiting for my reply, moved off the way he had come.

Following with my rifle, we approached a number of cavernous openings between piled boulders. Creeping with in twenty yards of the nearest, Byra halted and beckoned me to approach silently. 'Can you smell it,' he whispered. I sniffed carefully, but could smell nothing. There was certainly no odor such as one gets in a zoo or animal circus. I shook my head to indicate a negative reply. Stealing some distance closer, Byra halted again. 'Surely you can smell it now?' I exercised my olfactory organ to its utmost, and thought I could detect a peculiar odor, which for want of a better term I can only describe as 'greenish' that very indefinable smell of slightly decaying vegetable matter. Only after many years have I now learned to associate this smell as that of a passing tiger.

Byra looked upwards, scanning the five distinct openings that now showed between the huge boulders. He studied them in silence for a while, and then, indicating the fourth in line from us and almost the most unlikely in my opinion whispered, 'I think the tiger is in there,' I looked at him in evident disbelief, but ignoring my in credulity, he beckoned me to follow him, till at last, by working our way forward soundlessly, and with infinite caution, we reached a stony ledge immediately below the opening he had indicated, which was just above the tops of our heads. Standing on tiptoe to peer in, I saw nothing, and then the very next second, soundlessly and as if by magic, appeared the massive head of a tiger, mild surprise written on its countenance.

My bullet struck it fairly between the eyes at a range of perhaps eight feet. The tiger slid forward in a queer gliding motion, and came to rest level with our faces, his massive head in repose between his fore-paws, his yellow-green eyes half-closed with the approach of death, and the drip, drip, drip of a thin, dark-red blood-stream that spouted from the hole in his forehead.

That was the first of my very many experiences of Byra's knowledge of jungle-lore. To say that I was immensely pleased at having discovered him would have been to put it very mildly, and as the years rolled by and our mutual confidence in each other increased, I have never regretted that occasion in the far distant past when I lulled my conscience to sleep.

I shall now tell just two of the many adventures we have experienced together, namely that of the bears of Talvadi, in which Byra so nobly offered his life for mine, and the story of the man-eating tiger of Mundachipallam.

Talvadi is the name given to the wide valley, through the centre of which trickles the mountain stream known by the same name. It is situated some eleven miles north of the spot where I first met Byra, and is quite one of the wildest spots of the Salem North Forest Division. The Talvadi river takes its rise in the forest plateau of Aiyur, whence it dips sharply into a mountainous gorge, locally known as Toluvabetta gorge, but re-christened by me as 'Spider Valley', because of the species of enormous red and yellow spiders that weave their monstrous webs across the narrow jungle trail. These webs are somewhat oval in shape and sometimes reach a width of over twenty feet. In the centre hangs the spider itself, often nine inches from leg-tip to leg-tip. Despite its size, it is a very agile creature and extremely ferocious, and its prey the large night moths and beautiful butterflies and insects of the forest stand no chance of escape once they become entangled in the huge web. These spiders are equally cannibalistic, and will not tolerate the presence of another member of their tribe within their own web. I have some times amused myself by transporting one of these fierce creatures at the end of a stick to the web of another of its kind, when a battle-royal immediately ensues, often lasting half-an-hour, but always ending in the death of one or other creature, whose blood is then thoroughly sucked by the victor, till the loathsome insect is so gorged that it can only just crawl back to the centre of its web. The Talvadi stream passes down this gorge and then bifurcates, the lesser portion flowing southwards, bordered by the towering peak of Mount Gutherrain and the small hamlet of Kempekarai, to join the Chinar River in the stream of Annaibiddahalla. This area was once the stamping ground of the notorious rogue-elephant of Kempekarai, which killed seven humans, two or three cattle, smashed half-a-dozen bullock carts and overturned a three-ton lorry loaded with cut bamboos. However, that is another story.

The main portion of the stream flows westwards for some miles and, bordering the forest-block of Manchi, then turns southwestwards, crossing the forest-road leading from Anchetty to Muthur and Pennagram in the afore-mentioned valley of Talvadi.

As may be imagined, all this area is densely wooded, clothed on its higher reaches by miles upon miles of towering bamboo, and towards the lower levels by primeval forest, interspersed with rocky stretches, till it finally flows into the Cauvery river near the fishing village of Biligundlu. The whole area, from source to estuary, forms the home of herds of wild-elephant, a few bison, and invariably a tiger or two, which use the line of the stream as a regular beat. The Talvadi Valley itself, abounding in rocks and very long grass, is the habitat of large panthers, many bear, and wild pig, sambar, barking deer, and more peafowl than I have met anywhere else. My story begins at the time when Byra had sent word to me, in a letter written by the postmaster of Pennagram, that a panther of exceptional size had taken up its abode in the valley and was regularly killing cattle all along the Muthur-Anchetty road from the nth to the isth milestone. The letter asserted that the panther was of enormous proportions, 'much bigger than ordinary tiger,'

Having some five days to spare, I motored by the short cut road through the forest from Denkanikota to Anchetty and past Talvadi Valley to Muthur, where I met Byra. From there we returned to the 15th milestone, which was right in the valley itself. The road was really execrable, with many streams to be crossed, ruts made by cartwheels, and interspersed with boulders galore, taxing the car and its springs severely. After pitching camp, we went down to the nearest cattle-patti, some three-quarters of a mile distant, where I was able to hear for myself about the depredations of this panther. The story told was that it generally attacked the herds on their homeward journey to the pens about 5.30 p.m., and that it would select the largest cow among the stragglers for its victim. Several herdsmen had actually seen the animal and attempted to drive it from its kills, only to be met with snarls and a show of ferocity quite exceptional for a panther. The animal was not known to live in any particular spot, but as I have said, ranged for about four miles along the road.

It was difficult to persuade these herdsmen to sell me live baits, as although they realized the slaying of the panther would benefit them directly, their caste and religious obsessions were such as to oppose absolutely the practice of deliberately sacrificing a life in this way. Albeit, by various methods I finally succeeded in purchasing two three-quarter grown animals, one of which I secured on the bank of the river itself, about a mile downstream from the road, and the second not far from the 14th milestone.

There was now nothing to be done but wait, and as I did not deem it wise to disturb the countryside by shooting the peafowl and jungle fowl that abounded, I contented myself by strolling in the forest in other directions, both morning and evening, in the hope of accidentally meeting the panther or perhaps a wandering tiger from the Cauvery.

As luck would have it, I received news at about 7 p.m. on the third day that the panther had that very evening killed a cow belonging to another cattle-patti three miles away, as the herd was returning home. A runner had been sent to inform me as soon as the loss was discovered, which had accounted for the passage of time. Grabbing rifle, torch and overcoat, Byra and I hastened to the spot, and when still some furlongs away I extinguished my torch, creeping forward in the wake of the herdsman who had brought us the news, Byra following at my rear. A half-moon was just raising its silver crescent above the ragged line of jungle hills that formed the eastern horizon, when we turned a sharp bend in the cattle-track and came upon a panther, crouched behind the dead bullock that lay across the track. I had armed myself with my .12 shotgun for work at close-quarters, while Byra, behind me, carried the Winchester, but before I could raise the gun, the panther bounded off the carcass and into the undergrowth beyond.

Hastily whispering to Byra and the herdsman to return slowly the way we had come, talking to each other in a normal tone to give the panther the impression we had departed, I dived behind a wild-plum bush that grew some twenty paces away, hoping the animal would return. The panther did not take long to advertise its presence, for within a few minutes I heard its sawing call from the forest before me. The sound gradually receded in the direction Byra and the herdsman had taken, by which I interpreted that it was following them at a distance, probably to ensure that they had really departed. Afterwards there was tense silence, unbroken by any sound for perhaps the best part of an hour. And then, as if from nowhere, and unheralded by even the faintest rustle of dried leaves or crackle of broken twig, appeared an enormous panther, standing over its kill, but still looking suspiciously down the track we had just traversed. Aiming behind the shoulder as best I could in the half-light, the roar of the gun was followed by the panther leaping almost a yard into the air. Without touching earth again it convulsed itself into a spring and was gone before I could fire the second barrel. Its departure was heralded by the unmistakably low, rasping grunts of a wounded panther. Waiting for a few minutes, till the sound died away, and realizing that nothing further could be accomplished that night, I retraced my steps to the cattle-patti and to camp.

By dawn next morning, Byra and I were at the place of my encounter. Casting about where the animal had disappeared, it did not take long for Byra to detect a blood trail on the leaves of the undergrowth through which the animal had dashed away. Heartened by the fact that at least some of my L.G. pellets had found their mark, I took the lead, this time armed with the rifle, Byra following close behind and guiding me on the trail. In this formation, it was my business to keep a sharp lookout for the animal, and deal with it should it charge, while Byra, in the slightly safer position behind me, could concentrate on his tracking. Within the first 100 yards we came to a spot where the animal had lain down, as revealed by the crimson stain that covered the grass and the unmistakable outline of the body. From here the animal had slithered down the banks of a narrow nullah, densely overgrown with bushes on both sides, where following up became trebly difficult and hazardous.

As we tiptoed forward, with many a halt to listen, I scanned each bush before me, striving to penetrate its recesses for a glimmer of the spotted hide, alive or dead now, we did not know. I strove to pierce with my eyes the rank undergrowth of jungle-grass that grew between the bushes, and to look behind the boles of trees and rocks that fortunately were few in number just there. We had advanced a comparatively few paces in this way when suddenly, from out of a hole in the ground before me, rose a shaggy black shape, a smaller similar shape tumbling off beside it. We had stumbled upon a mother-bear with her young, asleep in the hole she had dug overnight in the bed of the nullah, in her assiduous search for roots !

I could see the white V mark on her chest distinctly as she half-rose to her feet, surprise and then fury showing in her beady, black eyes. Down she went on all fours again, to come straight at us. Thrusting the muzzle of the Winchester almost into her mouth, I pressed the trigger. Then occurred that all-important moment, which balances the life or ignominious death of the hunter : a misfire !

The she-bear closed her jaws on the muzzle, and with one sweep of her long-toed forepaw wrested the weapon from my grasp, so that it hung ludicrously from her mouth for a moment before she dropped it to the ground. In voluntarily I had stumbled backwards, and as the bear rose to her feet to attack my face, which is the part of a human anatomy always, first bitten by these animals. Byra attempted the supreme sacrifice. Nimbly throwing himself between me and the infuriated beast, he shouted at the top of his lungs in a last-minute attempt to divert its further onslaught. He was successful only to the extent that it turned its attention upon him, seemingly to forget my existence for the moment.

As he ducked his head in the very nick of time, the bear buried its fangs in Byra's right shoulder, while the long talons of its forefeet tore at his chest, sides and back. Byra went down with the bear on top of him. I sprang for the fallen rifle. Working the under-lever to eject the misfired cartridge, I found to my horror that, with the force of its fall, the action of the rifle had jammed. All this took only a few seconds. Byra screamed in agony, while the bear growled savagely. Stumbling forward and using the rifle as a cudgel, I smote with the butt-end with all my might at the back of the animal's head. Fortunately my aim was true, for the bear released Byra and like lightning grabbed the rifle in its mouth, this time by the butt, again tearing the weapon from my grasp. It then started to bite the stock savagely. By an act of Providence the cub, which during all this time had remained in the background, a surprised and obviously terrified witness, at this juncture let out a series of frightened whimpers and yelps. As if by magic the attention of the irascible mother became focused on her baby, for she dropped the rifle and ran to its side. There she sniffed it over to assure herself that all was well, and as suddenly as this unwelcome pair had appeared on the scene, they disappeared, a few last whimpering from the now reassured youngster forming the last notes to that unforgettable scene of horror, from which it took me days to recover.

Byra ,was on his hands and knees, streaming with blood and evidently in great pain. Going across to him, I removed my coat and shirt, tearing the latter into strips and attempting to bind up the more serious of his wounds and to stem the bleeding. Then, hoisting him on my back and carrying my damaged rifle, I staggered back to the cattlepatti, where I placed him on a charpoy. Four herdsmen carried him to my camp, where I poured raw iodine into the wounds. Camp was struck and in a few moments my car was jolting the fifteen miles to the village of Pennagram, where at the dispensary rough first aid was rendered.

By this time the poor man was faint with the loss of blood and almost unconscious. Replacing him in the car, I covered the sixty-one miles to the town of Salem, where there was a first-class hospital, in almost record time.

Penicillin was unknown in those far-off days, and the first week that Byra spent in hospital, hovering between life and death, with me at his side, was an anxious time. But his sturdy constitution won through and after the first few days the doctors definitely pronounced him out of danger.

I returned to Pennagram, where Byra's wife and children had come and were anxiously awaiting news. Giving them some financial help, I also received a surprise when I was presented with the worm-eaten skin of the panther, which I had quite forgotten in the excitement and pressure of subsequent events. It appeared that the sight of vultures on a carcass had attracted some of the herdsmen of the cattlepatti at Talvadi, who had found the body of the animal within 200 yards of where the adventure with the bear had occurred. It was stated to have been an outsize specimen, but as I have said, the skin was worm-eaten and beyond preserving.

Returning to Salem, I left sufficient money to cover Byra's treatment, expenses and final return to his native haunts at Muthur, but it was over two months before he could go back to his family with a slight permanent limp in his right leg due to the shortening of a damaged muscle, and with many permanent scars on his body as reminder of the incident.

My rifle needed a new stock, and to this day, six inches from the muzzle, it bears the marks of the she-bear's teeth. Thus ended the adventure which formed the blood-brother hood, so to speak, between Byra and myself, founded on his attempted cheerful sacrifice and almost literal fulfillment of the words 'greater love than this hath no man, than that he should lay down his life for another,'

Many years passed after this occurrence to the occasion of my next story, that of the man-eating tiger of Mundachipallam. Mundachipallam or to give it its literal Tamil translation, the hollow, or stream, of Mundachi is nothing more than a rivulet skirting the base of the Ghat section, half way between the 2,000 foot high plateau occupied by the village of Pennagram and the bed of the Cauvery River, only some 700 feet above sea-level. This stream crosses the Ghat Road, which drops steeply from Pennagram to the Cauvery River at a point just about four miles from the destination of the road where stands the fishing hamlet of Ootaimalai above the famed water-falls of Hogenaikal. The Forest Department has constructed a well on the banks of Mundachipallam, beside the road, to facilitate the watering of cattle, especially buffaloes and bullocks, drawing heavily laden cans of timber and bamboo, before they begin the remaining six miles of steep ascent to Pennagram. This little well, surrounded as it is by dense jungle, except for the narrow ribbon of road and the small width of Mundachipallam, which cross at right angles, is the spot where my story begins and, strangely enough, ends, though only after many deaths, and the narrow escape of Ranga, my shikari.

It was early morning, about 7.30 am., and droplets of dew twinkled on the grass like myriads of diamonds cast far and wide, as they met, scintillated, and reflected the rays of the newly-risen sun, filtering through the leafy branches of the giant 'muthee' trees and the tall straight stems of the wild-cotton trees that bordered the shallow banks of Mundachipallam. One man and two women, carrying round bamboo baskets, laden with river fish netted during the night on the Cauvery River, approached the well and laid down their heavy burdens on the low parapet wall that encircles it. The man unwound a thin fiber rope, coiled around his waist, and slipping one end of it over the narrow neck of a rounded brass lotah, carried by one of the women, let the receptacle down the well, from which he presently withdrew a supply of cold, fresh water. In accordance with the normal village custom, where a man comes before a woman, he began to pour the contents down his throat in a steady silvery stream, not allowing his lips to touch the mouth of the vessel, for to do so was considered unhygienic. The fish were being taken to market at Pennagram, and this was the last water available before tackling the stiff climb to their destination. After drinking his fill, the man returned the lotah to the well and twice refilled it, for the benefit of the two maidens who accompanied him. They were in their twenties and wore nothing above their waists beyond the last fold of their graceful sarees, which passed diagonally across one shoulder. Their smooth dark skins glistened with sweat despite the coolness of early morning, due to the heavy load of fish they had carried for four miles from the big river.

After drinking, the party sat down for a few minutes, each member producing a small cloth bag, from which were taken some 'betel' leaves, broken sections of areca-nut and semi-liquid 'chunam' or lime of paste-like consistency. Some sections of nut were placed in an open leaf, which was liberally smeared with the chunam, and then chewed with evident relish. In a few minutes the mouths of all the members exuded blood-red saliva, which was freely expectorated thereafter in all directions. Just then, rustling and crackling was heard from the undergrowth bordering the well. These sounds ceased and began again at intervals. There was no other sound. The trio conjectured among themselves as to the cause of these sounds, and reached the conclusion that it was some member of the deer family, probably injured by gun shot wounds or wild-dogs or some other animal, and struggling to get to its feet. Urged on by the hope of obtaining easy meat, and undoubtedly in order to impress the females of the party, the man got up and, with a stone in his hand, walked into the jungle. The noise had momentarily ceased, and he penetrated further to try to find the cause of the disturbance. Rounding a Babul tree that grew in the midst of a clump of bushes, he was petrified when he almost walked into a pair of tigers, probably engaged in the act of mating. Now a normal tiger is a beast with which very wide liberties may be taken. When once out fishing, I was surprised by a tiger that broke cover hardly fifteen paces away; it was difficult to tell which of us was more alarmed by the presence of the other at the time. Anyhow, that tiger simply sheered off the way he had come, and although unarmed at the time, curiosity and natural excitement urged me to follow it, to ascertain if possible the presence of a kill. But it just kept running before me like any village cur, till I eventually lost it among the many bushes that grew around. But there are with tigers certain moments when even they demand privacy. Or it may have been the urge to show off to the female of the species, an urge which I have known affect otherwise quiet men in a very surprising manner. Anyhow, this tiger definitely resented the intrusion and with a short roar he was upon the unfortunate fish-seller, burying his fangs through the back of his neck and almost severing the spinal column. Not a sound escaped the man as he fell to earth, the tiger still growling over him. The two women had heard the short roar and, recognizing the sound as that of a tiger, fled the way they had come to Ootaimalai. The victim was not eaten on this occasion, the effort having been but a gesture of annoyance at being disturbed at the wrong moment, but it had taught that particular tiger the obvious helplessness of a human being.

Some weeks later, a woodcutter, carrying his burden from the forest, encountered the same tiger on turning a bend in the path. Again that short roar, followed by the deadly spring, and another man lay dead, killed for no reason at all. Again the tiger did not eat. Two months passed, and a party of women had gone into the forest to gather the fruit of wild tamarind trees that grew in profusion throughout the valley. One of them had strayed a little away from the rest. She had stooped down to lift the basket to her head, when, looking up, she met the glaring eyes of the great cat. A single shrill scream escaped her before that short roar sounded for the third time and the cruel fangs buried themselves in her throat.

This time the jugular was severed and the salty blood spouted into the tiger's mouth; thus was born the man-eating tiger of Mundachipallam. The woman was dragged away to some bushes and there devoured, except for her skull, the palms of her hands, and the soles of her feet. Three more deliberate kills followed in quick succession, one at the 7th milestone of the road itself, the other by the banks of the Chinar River near to its confluence with the Cauvery, and the third but a mile from the village of Ootaimalai itself. In all three cases the victims were eaten, or partly eaten.

It was this last kill that caused the greatest consternation, leading the villagers of Ootaimalai to come in deputation to Pennagram to beg the authorities to take some action to rid them of the menace that now threatened their very village. Ranga, my shikari, was there at the time and promised them that he would persuade me to help, and having made the promise, travelled the hundred odd miles to Bangalore by bus, arriving late in the evening to present his report. Now a few words about Ranga will not be amiss at this stage. Strangely enough, I had also met him at Muthur, where I had met Byra some years earlier. Ranga was the hired driver of a buffalo-cart, used to haul cut bamboo from the forest to Pennagram. He had initiative how ever and in his spare time, was given to poaching, like Byra, with a matchlock that he hired for the occasion. He was a very different man from Byra, however, in both physical and personal attributes. For he was tall and powerful compared with Byra's somewhat puny build, and showed a forceful and distinctly positive character in all his undertakings. He had spent a year in jail for the attempted murder of his first wife, whom he had stabbed in the neck in a jealous quarrel. After returning from jail he had married again, and at the time I first met him had three children. Not being content, he later took one more wife and now had a dozen children in all, and was a grand father besides. He had better organizing capacity than Byra and got things done when required. I have known him to thrash a recalcitrant native thoroughly for not obeying instructions. He has also a lucrative side to his character trade in liquor illicitly distilled in the forest from Babul bark and other ingredients. I have sampled some of his produce and can tell you it is the nearest approach to liquid fire that I have known. Lastly, he is a far more dishonest man than Byra and given to petty pilfering, especially of .12 bore cartridges. He despises Byra, whom he looks down upon as a semi-savage. Secretly, I think he is jealous of my affection for the little Poojaree. But Ranga is a brave man, staunch and reliable in the face of danger, who certainly fears no jungle animal or forest-spook, as do the vast majority of other native shikaris. Unfortunately, Ranga came at a time when I was very busy and could not possibly leave the station for another fortnight. So I sent him back to Pennagram with a number of addressed envelopes and instructions to write to me every second day, regardless of events.

My inability to answer Ranga's first summons was perhaps indirectly responsible for two fresh tragedies that occurred before I was able at last to pick Ranga up in my car at Pennagram, motor down to Muthur for Byra, and arrive at Ootaimalai, where I was joined by a third Hench man, an old associate named Sowree. This Sowree, like Ranga, was quite a versatile fellow, and had himself spent three months in jail for shooting and killing a wild elephant with his muzzle-loader while on a poaching trip.

The elephant was a half-grown cow and had approached the hide in which Sowree lay concealed. Fearing that it might really tread upon him, Sowree had aimed his musket behind its left ear. The solid ball had only too effectively done its work, and the elephant dropped in its tracks. Unfortunately for him, he was caught red-handed. I had been shooting on the Coimbatore bank at the time,' and had seen and photographed the elephant, which incidentally was how I met Sowree.

I was extremely fortunate in being able to obtain the services of these three men, as in their varied spheres and capabilities, they presented a vast store of jungle experience and ability. Byra at once volunteered to scout around the neighboring forest, and along the Coimbatore bank, in an effort to ascertain the immediate whereabouts of the tiger. This I emphatically forbade him to do, as being suicidal. We finally compromised by agreeing that he should be accompanied by Sowree, armed with my .12 bore gun, and another man who, very surprisingly, bore the name of Lucas and was a 'Watcher' in the employ of the Government Fisheries Department. Ranga was given the job of obtaining three baits and tying them out in likely spots. The usual difficulty in obtaining animals was met, but the resourceful Ranga quickly overcame it by threats and other expedients, of which I was not supposed to know.

The first of the three baits was tied a mile up the Chinar River from where it joined the Cauvery and the second some three miles further on, where Mundachipallam met the Chinar. The third was tethered within 100 yards of the well where the first tragedy had occurred. On alternative days, Byra and his party would scour the forests on one bank of the Cauvery, while I, with a local guide, combed the opposite bank. Ranga, as I have said, attended to the feeding and watering of the baits.

In this way we spent four days, while nothing happened. Tiger pugs were discovered at several localities, but they were not fresh, and nobody could tell with certainty whether they belonged to the man-eater or some other animal.

There was no possibility of driving the man-killer to cattle killing to avoid starvation, by prohibiting the villagers from entering the forests or using the road to Pennagram. To begin with, considerable traffic existed along this road, as it formed a main artery to the many hamlets lying on the opposite bank of the Cauvery. In addition, the forests, particularly on the Coimbatore side, were plentifully stocked with game, to which the tiger could always turn in necessity.

In the meantime I endeavored by every possible means to spread the news of my presence and purpose to all surrounding hamlets, in order that I might hear of any fresh kill with the least possible delay. There was then some hope, with Byra's expert help, of being able to track the animal to where it was lying up, or perhaps even to its lair. Beating was out of the question, even if there had been volunteers for the task, of which there were none, as we were dealing with a very bold and clever animal, who would as likely as not add one more victim to his list from among the beaters themselves.

Early in the morning of the fifth day, I received news that a man had been killed at Panapatti cattle-pen, some four miles away, late that previous evening. He had gone out of his hut for 100 yards to call his dog, which was missing, and had not been heard of again. We hurried to the spot and Byra was successful in discovering the spot at which the man had been attacked : the great splayed-out pugs of the tiger were soon clearly visible across the sandy bed of the Chinar River as he had dragged his victim across and through the intervening reeds to the borders of the sloping bamboo forest beyond. Here we discovered the remains, almost totally devoured.

No trees were available, except for a mighty clump of bamboo that grew some thirty feet from the remains. In side this I instructed Byra to make me a suitable hide by the simple expedient of removing some eight or nine of the stout bamboo stems, cutting through them about four feet from the ground and again at the ground level, and then taking out the intervening four-foot lengths. The upper parts of the bamboo stems being in the centre of the clump, would not fall to earth, so entangled were the tops with the fronds of neighboring stems and those of other clumps.

After completing his work, Byra had succeeded in making a sort of hollow cave for me in the midst of the clump. Seated in the middle of this I knew I would be quite safe from attack by the tiger, either from behind or from either side, as he could not get at me owing to the numerous intervening stems. The only way he could reach me was from in front, and this I felt quite capable of countering provided I kept myself awake throughout the night.

The faithful Poojaree persisted in his wish to sit with me, till I was compelled to order him peremptorily to go. I would, indeed, have been glad of his company, but the space we had cleared in the midst of the bamboo-clump offered only restricted accommodation to one individual. To cut more steins to increase this space meant that we were reaching the outskirts of the clump and the unsupported bamboo stems would then fall to earth, not only causing much disturbance by the crash, but littering the surroundings with debris, which might quite possibly frighten the tiger away.

The night would be dark, with no moon, so I took the precaution of clamping my spare shooting light to my shotgun, which I carried into the hide with me, in addition to the Winchester, with its own lighting arrangement. Being in the midst of the bamboo, I knew I was almost completely sheltered from the dew and the cold jungle air, and fairly safe from snakes or so I thought. I was in position by 1 p.m., and sent my followers away Byra still protesting with instructions to call to me from the bed of the Chinar next morning before approaching. With their departure I was left to my own devices for the next seventeen hours.

You will appreciate that from my position in the midst of the bamboo-clump my view was entirely restricted on all sides except for the narrow lane of jungle right in front of me, with the human cadaver in the foreground. Much as I would have preferred a wider range of vision, I knew I would be thankful once the hours of darkness fell, as the more I could see by day the more I would be exposed to the man-eater after dark, when the tables would be turned and he could see while I could not. The human remains, being hidden from the sky by the canopy of overhanging bamboos, were not troubled by vultures. Flies, however, covered it in hordes and the stench soon began to get painfully noticeable. I will not burden you with descriptions of the sounds of a jungle evening and the close of a jungle day, beyond mentioning that they were practically all present on that occasion and offered sweet accord to my jungle-loving ears. Nothing happened before darkness set in, which it did both earnestly and rapidly, till I was left in Stygian blackness, intensified by the additional shadows cast by the towering bamboo stems above me. It was so dark that I could not see my own hands as they rested on my lap; I would have to feel for the trigger and the torch switch, and indeed, everything. All that was visible was the luminous dial of my wristwatch showing that it was a quarter to eight. Ten long hours before daylight came.

I knew that during this time I would have to strain myself to the utmost in pitting my poor, human, and town-bred skill against that of the king of the jungles, at which he was a past-master, with decades of skilful ancestors behind him; namely, at listening and hearing. For I could not see an inch before me, while he could see clearly. Nor could I smell him at all, but neither could he smell me. For success I would have to depend entirely on my hearing the sound of his soft approach, and I well knew from long experience how soundless the approach of a cautious tiger can be. I would have to remain absolutely silent myself; worse, the slightest movement or sound from me would betray my presence to those ever-acute ears, and once he knew I was there, only one of two possible things could happen. Either his courage would fail him and he would desert the kill, or he would attack me by a sudden pounce through the opening in front of me, before I was aware of his coming. I certainly had no wish to become the next item on his menu.

Mosquitoes found their way even inside that clump, and tortured me acutely. Once some cold creeping thing passed across my lap. It had length but no legs and was undoubtedly a snake. Movement at that time meant a bite and, if it was a poisonous snake, possibly death. With extreme difficulty I controlled my twitching nerves, and the snake glided away. I could just sense its rustle as it slipped between the intervening bamboo stems and was gone.

By and by my throat began to tickle and I had an over powering desire to cough. I counted sheep to divert my thoughts from this urge till it eventually died away. At 10.25 p.m. I heard a distinct sound in the jungle behind me. A faint rustle, then all was still. The minutes dragged by. Then it came again, on my right and in line with the very clump where I was sitting. Heavy breathing was clearly audible. A very faint grunt, silence, another grunt, and then the quick rush of a heavy soft body before me. Was it on the kill, or was it staring me in the face from the inky darkness, perhaps even at that instant drawing the powerful hind-legs below the supple belly to catapult itself upon me? And I could not see even the end of my own nose.

I had already cocked my rifle, and had slowly raised the muzzle, finger on trigger, to meet the coming onslaught at point-blank range. The perspiration poured down my face in sheer terror, and my whole body trembled with nervous suppression.

I depressed the torch switch and the brilliant beam blazed out upon a large hyena, standing above the kill, growling to find out it was a dead man that lay there. He stared blankly at the light for seconds and was gone. I could have laughed aloud with relief and the thought that I was safe once more at least for the present.

Anyhow, my position had been temporarily revealed and I could only hope the man-eater was not in the vicinity to become aware of it. Hastily I took advantage of the disturbance to swallow a mouthful of hot, refreshing tea from the flask I had brought, and quickly move my cramped limbs before resettling myself for the remainder of my vigil I was in Stygian darkness again, but considerably refreshed and relieved of the morbid nervous tension that had threatened to overcome me a few minutes before. At ten minutes to twelve I heard the moan of a tiger in the distance. This was repeated again at intervals of five to ten minutes, the last being at twelve-twenty, and from a spot I judged to be a quarter of a mile away. It was difficult to gauge the exact distance of sound in this densely wooded locality, but I thanked Providence and my lucky stars that the tiger had decided on making a noisy approach rather than the silent one I had dreaded.

A quarter of an hour slipped by without further sign. In ;he meantime the usual mid-nightly jungle-breeze had sprung up, to cause the bamboo stems to groan and creek against each other weirdly. This aroused a fresh and ominous thought in my mind. Supposing one of the several cut bamboo stems, balancing upright above my head was to become dislodged and slip downwards under its own weight. The cut end would impale me to the ground, like some rare beetle in a collector's box. The thought was not very pleasant and for a moment it eclipsed even the thought of the man-eater and its proximity.

And then I heard the crack of a bone on the cadaver lying in the darkness before me. Slowly I lifted the rifle to shoulder-level, steadied it and depressed the torch-switch for the second time that night. But nothing happened. I depressed the switch again and again, but still nothing happened. Undoubtedly the bulb had burnt out or some connection had come loose. I had now the choice of sitting very still till the tiger fed and departed, or changing my rifle for the smooth bore and attempting a shot. I quickly decided to use the gun. Ever so gently I lowered the rifle to ground level and then groped silently in the dark for the .12 bore. Finding it, I drew it towards me and then began maneuvering the weapon to shoulder-level. I could only hope that the tiger was looking away from me, or was too engrossed in his meal to notice all the movement that was going on in the midst of the bamboo-clump. And then misfortune befell me. Slightly, but quite distinctly, the muzzle of the gun came into contact with a bamboo stem and there was an audible knock.

The sounds of feeding stopped abruptly, followed by a deep-chested and rumbling growl. Hastily I got the gun into position and pressed the switch of the new torch. Luckily it did not fail, and the beam burst forth to show clearly a huge striped form as it sprang off the cadaver and behind the bamboo clump next to mine. From there a succession of earth-shaking roars rent the silence, as the man-eater demonstrated in no uncertain manner his displeasure at being disturbed, and his discovery of a human being in the near vicinity.

Keeping the torch alight, and a sharp lookout for his sudden attack, with one hand I groped for the spare bulb I always carried in my pocket. I extracted it and kept it on my lap. Still working with one hand, I unscrewed the cover of the torch on my rifle, extracted the faulty bulb and substituted the new one. Fortunately, the torch was one of those focused by adjustment from the rear and not the front end, and as the rifle torch was now functioning again, I extinguished that on the smooth bore, though I kept the gun ready across my knees for any further eventuality.

The tiger was still demonstrating, but had moved to a position in my rear. I knew I was safe enough, except from a frontal attack. To guard against this I would have to keep the torch alight continuously, but as over five hours still remained till daylight, there was the certainty the batteries would run low, even on both torches, if burned incessantly. So I switched off the light and relied on my hearing. When things became too silent for a long stretch, I would switch on the beam, expecting to see the creeping form of the tiger approaching me. But this did not happen and he kept his distance, demonstrating frequently till past 2.30 a.m., when I heard his growls receding in the distance. No doubt he was disgusted, but by this time I welcomed his disgust.

You may be certain I kept a sharp look-out for the rest of the night against the tiger's return, for the habits of a man-eater are often unpredictable; but the chill hours of early morning crept past without event, till at last the cheery cry of the silver-hackled jungle-cock made me grateful for the dawn and the light of another day, which on more than one occasion during the terrible hours that had just dragged by I had not thought of seeing. Scion the halloa of my followers from the bed of the Chinar River fell like music on my tired ears, and I shouted back for them to advance, as the coast was clear. With their arrival I staggered forth from my nightlong cramped position, to finish the tea that remained in my flask and to smoke a long-overdue pipe, while relating the events of the night.

All three of the men knew me most intimately, but although they did not say as much, it was clearly evident they were surprised to see me alive, for the roars and demonstrations of the frustrated man-eater had been clearly audible to them, where they had spent the night with the shivering herdsmen of Panapatti.

Byra now said that he would like to take a quick walk up the Chinar to Muthur, just four miles away, and fetch his hunting dog, which he felt would be of considerable help in following the trail of the tiger. This dog was a very non-descript white and brown village cur, answering to the most unusual name of Kush-Kush-Kariya. How it happened to possess this strange name I had never been able to fathom. In calling the animal, Byra used the first two syllables in a normal tone, but would accentuate the third into a weird rising cry resembling that of a night heron. I had never been able to emulate him in this, and had contented myself in the past with Kush-Kush alone, which the dog would obey without hesitation. Insisting that he at least took Sowree as company, I returned with Ranga to Ootaimalai and had a hot breakfast, and a bath in the Cauvery, followed by a long-overdue sleep. I awoke at 2 p.m. with the return of Byra, Sowree and the much-prized Kush-Kush-

Kariya, who wagged his tail at me in joyful recognition and nuzzled his cold snout against my shoulder.

Swallowing a hasty lunch and plenty of hot tea, we returned to the spot of my night's adventure, accompanied by the relatives of the dead man, who yearned to bring away his remains but were far too afraid to visit the spot unprotected. As may be imagined, the corpse was by this time smelling to high heaven, so they decided to carry it only as far as the Chinar River and bury the remains on the bank.

With their departure, poor Kush-Kush made a brave attempt to follow the cold trail of the tiger but was not very successful in going even 100 yards. Probably the stench that still pervaded the atmosphere and lingered on the quiet evening air had overpowered all faint smell that might have remained in the tiger's tracks over the hard ground. We returned to camp just before nightfall, a very disappointed group.

The following day nothing happened, but on the morning of the day after, Ranga nearly met his end. Each day, as I have already said, Byra, Sowree and I scoured the forest in opposite directions in the hope of locating the tiger, while it was Ranga's duty to feed and water our three baits, none of which had been killed up to that time. He had made an early start that morning, with another villager for company, and had already visited the bait at the well on Mundachipallam, which was found untouched, as expected. After depositing some of the straw carried by his companion, Ranga watered the animal and then the two men moved down Mundachipallam itself, to look to the second bait tied at its confluence with the Chinar River. The villager was leading, Ranga bringing up the rear. They had come about a mile from the road when, standing fifty yards from them in the middle of the dry stream, was the tiger.

The villager dropped his bundle of straw and shinned up the only tree at hand. For the few seconds it took him to climb a reasonable height, he blocked Ranga's progress, and within those few seconds the man-eater had reached the base of the tree, reared up on its hind legs, and with a raking sweep of its forepaw removed the loin-cloth around Ranga's waist, the end of which had hung downwards, while he climbed. The tiger halted momentarily to worry the cloth, while Ranga, minus his loin-cloth, climbed energetically, overhauling and almost knocking his companion off the tree, in his efforts to reach the higher terraces and safety. The disappointed tiger remained below, looking up wards and growling savagely, while Ranga and his companion shouted loudly for help, telling the world at large that they were being killed and eaten. Fortunately, a party of people, travelling in large numbers for

from where they heard the shouts and recognized its message. At the double the whole group, men, women and children of all ages, covered the remaining four miles to reach me at Ootamalai with the news. Not knowing it was Ranga who had been attacked, and Byra and Sowree not having yet returned, I jog-trotted the distance alone, arriving at the well in record time. From here I could plainly hear the shouting myself. By this time the tiger had left the foot of the tree and vanished into the forest, but the two men were afraid to descend, for fear it might be in hiding and rush forth on them. Hoping to surprise the man-eater, I refrained from answering them while hastening forward as swiftly as caution permitted. When I reached the tree, however, it was only Ranga and his companion who were surprised at seeing me, till I explained the circumstances. We then attempted to follow the tiger, but no signs of him were evident on the hard ground; so we desisted and turned back to visit the remaining baits. I accompanied the men, and we found both animals unscathed. It was past mid-day when we returned to Ootaimalai with the despairing knowledge that the leery tiger we were after apparently was not going to kill any of our baits. Nor, with the experience I had had with him, was he ever likely to return to a kill again. To say I was exceedingly crest-fallen and despondent would be putting it too mildly. The wily man-eater of Mundachipallam looked like being one of those tigers that would stay put for a long time to come, if it did not go away of its own accord to continue its depredations elsewhere. And then, about 7 a.m. two days later, came the event that brings this story to an end. As I have mentioned, in coincidence it remarkably resembled the events with which the tale started.

Again a group of persons, except that they were ten in numbers for the sake of safety, had placed their baskets, laden with fish for Pennagram, on the ground, to water at the well beside Mundachipallam and to rest awhile. Women being in the party, one of the men stepped behind the nearest tree to ease himself. There was a short roar, an elongated golden body with black stripes hurled itself as if from nowhere, and the squatter had disappeared. By good fortune, Byra, Ranga, Sowree and myself had set forth in company to visit our baits and were hardly a mile behind the party of ten. Soon we met the nine who were returning with the sad news of the one who was not. Running forward as fast as we could, we reached the well, where I whispered to Ranga and Sowree to climb up adjacent trees and await my further need. Byra and I crept forward and, behind the tree chosen by the unfortunate man to answer the call of nature, we picked up the trail of his blood as it had ebbed away in the jaws of the tiger.

With Byra tracking, and closely in his wake with rifle to shoulder, and scanning every bush, we had penetrated only a short hundred yards when we heard the sharp snap of a bone in the mouth of the feeding tiger. The sound had come from a half-left direction ahead of us. Laying a restraining hand on Byra, I motioned him to remain where he was, while I crept cautiously forward knowing well that under such circumstances a companion becomes an additional life to care for.

The forest was still and breathless, and the sound of gnawing and crunching could now be heard more clearly. Very carefully and silently edging closer, with downcast eyes watching each footstep, for fear I should rustle a leaf, snap a twig, or overturn a loose stone, it took me a considerable time to advance a mere fifteen yards. From there I thought I could see the slayer, crouched on the ground. A few paces nearer, and suddenly he arose and faced me, a dripping human arm, torn off at the shoulder, held across his mouth. The wicked eyes gazed at me with blank surprise, then a snarl began to contort the giant face, rendered more awful by the gruesome remains it carried.

The 300 grains of cordite, behind the soft-nosed Winchester bullet, propelled the missile with upwards of thirty-five tons to the square inch, correctly into the base of the massive neck. The human arm dropped into the grass with a plop. The animal lurched forward with a gurgling grunt. Quick working of the under lever of the old, trusted rifle, and a second missile buried itself in that wicked heart. It beat no more. The man-eating tiger of Mundachipallam lurched forward to his end in almost the same spot where he had begun his wicked career months before. A large male, he was without blemish.

Undoubtedly a wicked tiger by nature, he had evidently turned man-eater through an unlucky chance. On such trivial circumstances often hang the threads of fate. Anxious about my welfare, my wife surprised me by arriving that same afternoon in her car from Bangalore to ask me whether I ever remembered I had a home and family, and if it was not about time I thought of returning to it.

We motored Byra, via Pennagram, back to his dugout near Muthur, where we were just in time to be present at the happy arrival of his fifth progeny. And the arrival was in this fashion. A shallow hole, hammock-shaped and about of the same dimension, had been scooped in the sands of the Chinar River, the hollow then being liberally filled with soft green leaves, freshly separated from their stalks. In this hammock the mother, about to give birth, lay when the pains of childbirth began. The husband acted as midwife. No medicines, no ergot, no hot water, no cotton wool ! Only tender green leaves, and the sharp edge of a flint, to saw through the navel cord, the bleeding stump of which is staunched with ashes from an ordinary wood-fire. A couple of hours after giving birth the mother got up with her baby and went to the hole on the banks of Annaibiddahalla where they lived. The husband filled in the hammock-like hollow; leaves, placenta and all, with the loose sands of the Chinar River. In such simple and hardy fashion are the Byras of the forest born. So do they live and so do they die, true children of nature and of the jungle.

Long may they continue to exist, untrammeled and untarnished by civilization, happy and free to roam as they will over mountain, fen and forest glen, till death claims them and they return unostentatiously to mother earth, from which they have so unostentatiously sprung. On the morning of that day I had shot a peacock, and this we had for dinner, prepared in the jungle fashion. All feathers are removed, with the entrails, head and neck. Incisions with a knife are made in the flesh of the bird, into which are inserted salt, spices, cloves and 'curry-powder' to taste. The whole is then plastered over with fresh, clean mud from the riverbank to a thickness of well over an inch, so that it finally resembles a ball of wet muck. A fire of embers is built, the ball laced on It, and surrounded on all sides and above with still more embers. The fire is kept continuously alive by the addition of more wood, but the aim is to have glowing embers, rather than a blazing fire. After some time the mud begins to crack, and finally falls away in sections. Then is the time to remove the bird before it is burnt. With a little practice in the art of mud roasting, a truly superb roasted peacock or jungle fowl can be prepared for dinner, the finished product putting many a housewife to shame.

The Tigers of Tagarthy

Sham Rao Bapat and the tiger he shot in his own garden

IF you travel to the western limits of the District of Shimoga in the State of Mysore, you will at once be struck by the difference of scenery from that prevailing around Bangalore and the eastern parts of the State.

For here you are within the belt of evergreen forests, fed by torrential monsoon rains, averaging above 120 inches a year west of Shimoga town itself and reaching over 250 inches at the village of Agumbe, the extreme limit of Mysore State on the Western Ghats. Giant trees, their leafy tops reaching to high heaven, and colossal tree ferns, grow along the numerous streams that gush from forest and glen and border the roadside with a perennial supply of fresh water.

Vegetation of the rankest description, among which the thorny varieties of the jungles of central and eastern South India are conspicuous by their absence, is to be seen everywhere. But little wandering in these jungles is possible, for trails do not exist, since the undergrowth densely covers every open space and struggles ever upward to reach a ray of sunshine. Beneath the towering trees everything is damp and dark; the chirp of the wood cricket and croak of the bullfrog are the only sound you will hear. Leeches, their bodies attached to the undersides of leaves, stretch out elastically to fasten a grip on any living creature that may brush by. They will penetrate your clothing, worm their way between the interstices of your boots, putties or stockings, and suck your blood without your being aware of their presence, for they give you no pain, until, looking downwards, you will find some part of yourself oozing blood. Attempt to pull them off, and they will leave a nasty wound that generally festers into a sore. Apply a little of the common salt you should always carry on your person in these parts, or a little tobacco juice, and they will curl up and fall off of their own accord. The wound will then heal without any attention.

This is the home of the Hamadryad or King Cobra, 'Naia Hannah', as he is known, that giant snake of the Cobra family that reaches a length of fifteen feet and more. Dark olive green in color, with faint yellowish white circles around his body, he boasts of no visible mark on his dark, oval hood. Of amazing speed despite his great length, he feeds on other snakes, is aggressive and is said to attack on sight, a female guarding her young being reputed to be particularly bad tempered. I have twice met the King Cobra on his own grounds, once when collecting specimens for an aquarium of the beautiful red and green fish, spotted along their sides, which inhabit the forest streams outside Agumbe; and on another occasion, when out collecting orchids. But at neither time did they behave aggressively. Both specimens stopped upon seeing me, raised their heads about four feet above ground and partly extended their oval hoods while gazing at me attentively and inquisitively with their beady black eyes. Then they harmlessly glided on their way.

The higher treetops are the homes of beautiful orchids, the stick-shaped branches of the Dendrobium family being particularly represented. In summer their clusters of pink, yellow, white or mauve blooms festoon the higher terraces in colorful array.

This district embraces the Shiravati River, whose waters fall gracefully and grandiosely in four distinct streams, a sheer 950 feet at the falls of Gersoppa or Jog. Here, on a moonlight night, can be seen that rare phenomenon against the steaming spray of the waters a rainbow by moon light.

The village of Tagarthy, eleven miles southeast of the little town of Sagar, is situated on the eastern limits of the evergreen forests, where they have been felled and cultivation has been undertaken. Because of the heavy rainfall and fertile earth, agricultural ventures in this area are extremely profitable. The grass also grows lusciously on the more open glades, and vast herds of cattle are kept in the bordering villages and hamlets, due to the abundant grazing.

Relatively few wild animals, beyond bison, inhabit the evergreen forests, owing to the denseness of the under growth and the presence of leeches and ticks, which annoy them. For the same reason, and due to the scarcity of game, carnivora are seldom encountered in those dark places. But as the area opens out, and the vast herds of cattle appear, carnivora collect in large numbers to feed on them and grow fat. Tagarthy was such an area, and at no one time in all my many visits were there less than four separate tigers in permanent residence. In February, 1939, the peak figure of my experience was reached, with eight cattle killed in one day at various points of the compass around Tagarthy. This indicated eight separate tigers operating, since the kills were reported from widely distant places.

Due to the number of tigers in the locality, panthers are rarely met with, the one or two eking out their existence doing so in the immediate vicinity of the villages, and living on dogs, goats and sometimes domestic fowls. For the tiger does not tolerate his smaller cousin and will with out compunction kill and occasionally eat him, if the panther gets within striking distance. Except for spotted deer, game is comparatively scarce around Tagarthy, and the tigers in that area are mainly cattle-lifters. Most of them are heavily built animals and fat, lacking the sleek, trim appearance of the true game killer.

Let me tell you the story of Sham Rao Bapat of Tagarthy. and of the tiger that he shot in his garden, quite close to his house. Sham Rao was but a lad at the time, about twenty-two years; but as the sole male heir, he managed the estate that surrounded his home with efficiency and with the true love of an agriculturist. Rice grew in the lower, muddy areas, while the dry crop of ragi was cultivated on higher levels. He also had a grove of areca and cocoanut palms, up the stems of which clambered the betel-leaf vine. Moreover, Sham Rao had cattle and other livestock, and indeed was a prosperous landlord. One day a fat tiger decided to share in this prosperity and commenced killing Sham Rao's herd, one by one. Sham Rao possessed a smoothbore gun and nothing else, and loaded with ball, sat over the kills for the tiger's return. But for one reason or other, this never happened till it came to be surmised that this particular tiger was an old hand who had probably been shot at before and therefore would not return to his kill a second time.

And then the tiger grew bolder. One dark night it leapt the fence surrounding Sham Rao's garden and attempted to dislodge the stout bamboo screen that had been closely drawn across the entrance to the cattle shed. Sham Rao had wakened at hearing the restless snorting and stamping of his cattle. He had then detected a scratching sound and going outside met the tiger as it leapt away after having tried to force an entrance.

The next night Sham Rao placed small cut branches on the roof of his cattle shed, where he lay prone on his stomach, six feet above the ground at the entrance to his shed. This entrance had been closed. At ten o'clock the tiger presented itself and began scratching the door. Sham Rao fired both barrels of his smooth bore at point blank range, and the marauder sank almost noiselessly to earth. He was a fine example of the heavy type of cattle-killing tiger.

The scene changes. It was 11.30 a.m. and the sun shone brilliantly down on the little forest bungalow, situated some two and a half miles from Tagarthy itself. Early lunch was nearly ready, and my wife was busy with the few finishing touches. Just then a kakar voiced his grating call from the forest that bordered the bungalow fencing. Again and again the call was repeated, the excited note of the small deer betraying his intense alarm. Slipping on a pair of rubber boots and carrying the rifle, I crossed the forest fire line and penetrated the leafy depths of the jungle. The kakar was still calling and I went forward as fast as was possible, making the minimum of noise. I came upon a clearing, in the midst of which stood the little kakar facing away from me and voicing his intermittent bark. Slipping back into the jungle, I tiptoed around the clearing, careful not to place myself within the direct vision of the alarmed deer. Some teak trees had been planted here and their huge leaves, dry and brittle at this season, lay where they had fallen, carpeting the forest floor. I knew that to attempt to cross them would be to give myself away. So I hid behind the trunk of a stout fig tree, growing on the edge of the teak and strove to penetrate the shadows under them. Stare as I could, for a while I saw nothing. Then a little distance away something stirred, and in doing so gave itself away. I focused my eyes on the spot and there I saw a tiger, lying unconcernedly on his back, all four feet in the air and apparently fast asleep. Periodically the tip of his tail would twitch, and it was this movement that had caught my eye and betrayed his presence.

It would have been unsportsmanlike to shoot the animal in his sleep. Besides he was doing no harm beyond killing his lawful food, and so I was not disposed to cause him any hurt. I leant my rifle against the tree and myself also, and for quite twenty minutes I watched that tiger sound asleep on his back. And then from the forest-lodge floated my wife's voice, calling me for lunch. The tiger heard it and sat up, turning his head towards the sound, his eyes still half closed with sleep.

Silently I stepped from concealment, the rifle ready for all eventualities. The tiger heard me, leapt to his feet and whisked around to gaze in blank surprise at this human, who had come so close to him undiscovered. Then with a lazy snarl he began to walk casually away. I let him go peacefully and soon he was lost to sight. On another occasion my wife and I. had hired a bullock cart, and had gone out at night shining torches, to see what we could see. We had travelled a mile and were halfway down a deep declivity, where the cart track crossed a stream, when she picked up a pair of eyes reflecting her torch-beam, deep in the jungle to our right. Halting our cart, we dismounted, she leading the way with the torch, with me behind with the rifle. The eyes had disappeared, so we followed a narrow footpath that led at an angle in the general direction of the spot where the eyes had been. Shortly we picked them up again, large reddish-white orbs, glowing distinctly against the background of night. Fortunately the undergrowth was thin just there and we were able to advance directly towards the eyes. A few steps further and out stepped a tiger, who looked at us and then back at the place from which it had just emerged. The mystery of this strange behavior was soon unraveled, for two cubs, the size of retrievers, broke cover and gamboled up to their mother.

She now gazed at us fixedly a few moments and then crossed into the jungle, uttering a low mewing sound, a call to the cubs to follow. They did so, and the trio were lost in the forest except for the rustle of the undergrowth that occasionally marked their progress through the bushes.

My wife kept her torch beam in the general direction where we could hear them moving, for fear that the tigress, resenting our intrusion, should change her mind and launch a flank attack. Then we both heard a distinct growl before us. Turning the beam towards this new sound, we were shaken at seeing another tiger, this time a large male, at almost the spot where the tigress had stood a few seconds before. Quite evidently we had come upon a family party returning from quenching their thirst at the stream. I might observe that it is quite unusual, however, for a male tiger to accompany a tigress with cubs of the size we had just seen. Generally she will not trust her offspring near her lord till they are fairly well grown.

The situation was now decidedly tense, as there was every possibility of one or other adult animal attacking us. My wife kept her head with commendable calmness, how ever, and the tiger, growling in a low tone, followed his family into the undergrowth.

At that time occurred an amusing sequel to the story, which might have had an unpleasant ending but happily did not. The unfortunate cart-driver, left alone in the dark, had heard the mewing of the tigress followed by the growl of her mate. Perhaps his bullocks then scented them, or even saw them, for suddenly they bolted with the cart, to rush pell-mell down into the bed of the stream, where the wheels stuck fast in the soft sand and water. Hearing the shouts of the cart man, and thinking he or his bulls had been attacked, we ran to the spot, to discover all was well except for the severe fright he had received. We were both glad that circumstances had not forced us to harm any of the members of that happy family party.

For some time my friend, Dr. Stanley of the Mysore Medical Service, was stationed by his department at Tagarthy, principally to attempt to stem the tide of malaria, which was rife and affecting practically every one of the inhabitants. The doctor was an enterprising man keen on shooting, and has shot quite a few tigers during his service.

Late one night he received a maternity call from a hamlet called Bellundur, about six miles away. True to his profession, he set forth by bullock-cart, armed with his bag of medicines, injections and bandages; his 'Geco' smooth bore and a five-cell torch added a touch of shikar to his duty.

They were traversing an intervening valley when a tiger leapt across the track, and sitting on its haunches by the wayside, turned to watch the passing cart. Stanley fired ball at the animal, which received the lead with a loud roar and disappeared.

Calmly he went on to his destination, relieved the mother of her baby and spent the rest of the night with the patient, returning next morning with a small boy of his acquaintance to help him and the cart man to follow up the tiger he had wounded the night before. Coming to the spot, they soon picked up a blood-trail, which they began to follow, the cart man turning back to his cart on the plea he could not leave his bullocks alone.

Stanley and the boy had gone some distance and entered a hollow, when they unexpectedly came upon the tiger lying on its side before them. Thinking it was dead, but to make certain, Stanley fired an L.G. into its rear, when the tiger came to life, turned round and charged them. As it leapt, Stanley fired his remaining barrel, this time ball, into the mouth of the tiger. Then it was on him, knocking him down and laying bare a portion of the back of his skull. At this moment the boy fled screaming, thus undoubtedly saving Stanley's life, for the tiger left him and chased the boy, whom in turn it sprang upon, biting into his side.

Dazed from the wound in his head, Stanley scrambled to his feet and fumbled to reload his gun, when, unexpectedly, the tiger left the boy and jumped into the jungle.

The youngster had been badly wounded in the back and side, and blood was bubbling out of the gaping holes made by two of the great fangs. In addition, three ribs were broken. Using his torn shirt for bandages, Stanley patched him up as well as possible and carried him to the bullock cart and the long journey of seventeen miles was begun to the town of Sagar, the doctor himself being in a bad way all the while. From there they entrained for Shimoga, about thirty-five miles away, where was a district hospital. It is sufficient to record that both of them recovered from their adventure, Stanley to receive a severe wigging from his medical superior, who reminded him he had been stationed at Tagarthy as a doctor and not to shoot tigers. Their fortunate escapes were undoubtedly due to the fact that the tiger had been severely wounded. Stanley's last shot into its mouth had very probably smashed the lower jaw, for it was noticeable that in both attacks there after it had used only its upper canines. Had the lower jaw been serviceable, there is no doubt whatever that both Stanley and the boy would not have lived to see another sunrise.

As it was, many villagers heard the wounded animal for a week thereafter, roaring night and day in agony. Then there was silence, and there is every likelihood that it crawled away into the depths of the forest to die, for the carcass was never found.

Stanley also told me of two other experiences at Tagarthy. Once while sitting on a machan over a kill, nearing sunset, a hamadryad climbed the tree in which he was stationed. He frightened it away; but as darkness descended, thinking the great snake might come back and feeling very uneasy, he returned to the village. On another occasion, while sitting imperfectly concealed over a kill, the tiger had seen him and had demonstrated all night until the early hours of morning, circling the tree and roaring continuously. This had become a nuisance, as a drizzle set in, but the good doctor, very wisely, had not risked returning alone in the dark when he had such an aggressive tiger to deal with.

When wandering in the few areas around Tagarthy where the forest is at all penetrable, I have myself come upon a three-quarter grown tigress lying dead in a clearing, with twenty-three porcupine quills embedded in her face and chest. One of them had completely penetrated and extinguished the right eye. The tigress was in an extremely emaciated condition. A few feet away was the half-devoured carcass of a panther. The tragedy was not difficult to piece together. Evidently the tigress had attempted to make a meal of a porcupine, which had charged backwards into her face, as these animals do, embedding its quills in her head and chest and putting out one eye. Blinded, starving and still carrying the quills from the last encounter, the tigress had wandered desperately in search of food. Then she had come upon the panther, whom she had attacked, fought, killed and begun to eat, when death had overtaken her, for some unaccountable reason, perhaps through stomach or other injuries caused by the panther itself, not clearly evident to me from her decomposed carcass.

In the hamlet of Bellundur lived a mysterious individual named Buddhia, accredited by local inhabitants with great powers of witchcraft and black magic. He was reputed to have bewitched people and brought about their deaths. He was a great friend of mine and, after one of our many intimate talks late one night he presented me with a circle of plaited creeper stems, four inches in diameter, made from mysterious plants that grow, he said, deep inside the forest. He asked me to keep this with me always, on my hunting trips, and said that if any time I was in an area where game did not show up, I was to wait till the sun had set, and then pass the circle three times up and down the barrel of my gun. Within twenty-four hours, he guaranteed, I would kill something with that weapon. I still have that circle, and am ashamed to confess have used it, more than once, where game has been scarce, in accordance with the directions of its giver. Call it coincidence or luck, as you wish, but it has never failed to produce results. Alas, old Buddhia is now no more, having succumbed to the dread scourge of malaria, from which even his powers of magic could not protect him.

Now, let me tell you about the Tiger of Gowja. Gowja is another tiny hamlet, over six miles from Tagarthy, and half-way to the forest Chowki of Amligola, situated on the borders of the great tiger preserve of Karadibetta, care fully protected by His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore for his own shooting. Tigers are not so clever as to know that they should remain within the limits of certain boundaries. Most important of all, no cattle are permitted into the Karadibetta Preserve and tigers like eating cattle immensely. Just outside the hallowed precincts are cattle by the hundred, so what more natural than that there should be more tigers outside of the preserve than within it.

About 1938 a particularly enterprising tiger walked out of the preserve and started killing cattle around Amligola, returning afterwards to the preserve where he was safe and sound from molestation. In this manner he waxed fat, while his fame as a devourer of sleek cows spread through out the area.

Then, as happens with humans, continued success induced greater daring, disregard for consequences, and finally that rank carelessness and over confidence that brings undoing to both tigers and men. Our tiger had not yet reached this last stage, though he was well on the way, for he wandered farther and farther from the protecting fastnesses of Karadibetta and disdained to return there during the day-time, as had been his custom hitherto. In this way he came to Gowja, where he took up his temporary abode on the banks of a deep nullah that scored the countryside about a mile and a half from the hamlet. From this shelter he raided the cattle herds, harrying them morning and evening, never failing to kill at least two fat cattle each week.

Letters had been written to me about this slayer, but I had never bothered unduly about his activities, for after all tigers must eat to live and this old fellow was doing no harm to humans. A few less cattle mattered little to those vast herds.

With the passage of time, however, his daring increased still more, and the last reports showed that he was loath to leave his kills, demonstrating loudly by roaring and making short rushes at the herdsmen when they attempted to drive him off. True it was that hitherto he had not hurt anyone, but I knew from the preliminary indications that this would happen almost any day now. Sooner or later another man-eater would appear.

At 9.30 a.m. one morning, therefore, I alighted from the mail train from Bangalore at the wayside railway shed of Aderi. From here a walk of three and a half miles brought me to Tagarthy. I was greeted by old friends and hospitably treated to coffee while a hot meal was being prepared. I occupied the time by gleaning all the news I could, but this did not amount to much beyond the usual account of the presence of tiger in all directions the daring old tiger of Gowja having earned particular notoriety. After the meal I set forth by can to cover the six odd miles to Gowja, which, because the track was in a very bad way, we did not reach till 6 p.m. While talking with the inhabitants, my tent was erected about three furlongs away, on the banks of a smaller nullah that fed the main stream. The tiger lived a mile or so beyond.

I was told that the tiger had killed two days before. Nothing had happened since, but the next kill was undoubtedly due within the coming forty-eight hours. Sure enough, word was brought at 1 p.m. next day that the tiger had just claimed another victim. Hurrying to the spot, I found the tiger had attacked a cow in the middle of an open field, quite 300 yards from the nearest cover, killed it and carried it away to its hiding place, which proved to be the very same nullah as that in which my tent was pitched. The soft sand of the nullah revealed tracks where the tiger had crept along the bed and then dashed over the bank towards the cow. The cow had run a short distance in an effort to escape, but had been over taken and slain. The tiger had then lifted the cow across its back and returned to the ravine, as was evident by the absence of any drag mark, though the tiger's pugs were firmer and had sunk deeper into the rough clods of the ploughed field, due to the weight he was carrying. I cautiously followed the tracks in the hope of encountering the animal or his kill. This I eventually did, but he did not demonstrate and show himself, as I expected he would. That indefinable sixth sense, which warns the jungle folk in the nick of time, evidently impressed this tiger that here was a human being to whom he should not show himself. While still some yards away in the undergrowth and in visible to me, he became aware of my presence, growled in a low tone and slunk away.

There was a suitable tree nearby and I arranged the erection of my charpoy machan. I was in position by 4 p.m. The tiger came at eight, but stood directly under my machan and beside the tree on which I sat. I knew of his approach by the subtle sound of his tread. No dry leaves crackled to betray his coming, but in the stillness of the silent night there was no mistaking that soft heavy footfall. He began to lick himself, his rough tongue running over his glossy coat, making the faintest of rasping sounds. Then he arose on his hind legs and began to clean and sharpen the claws of his forefeet against the bole of the tree. In so doing, he saw the machan above. A low growl and he was gone, nor did he return that night.

The following day nothing happened, so in the afternoon I tethered a heifer in the bed of the main nullah where he was reputed to have his abode and sat up on a machan in a tree overhanging the nullah at an angle of 60 degrees. I was in position at 3 p.m. At 5.30 p.m. I heard a dragging sound and there was the tiger hauling down the bank another cow he had taken from one of the herds. He was quite eighty yards away. Aiming at his neck, I fired, but as I did so the tiger moved forward, receiving the bullet much further back than was necessary for a fatal shot. He responded to the impact with a coughing grunt, catapulted to the bottom of the nullah, and was gone. I descended the tree, released my bait and returned to Gowja in the opposite direction, feeling confident I would locate and bag him next morning without undue trouble. But I was very much mistaken, as events were to show.

At dawn I was back at the scene of action, accompanied by two reliable locals from the hamlet. We picked up the tiger's blood-trail at the foot of the nullah, which traversed its bed for some considerable distance before climbing the opposite bank. We followed with every caution, but soon found that the animal had kept going, for there was no evidence that he had sat down to rest from his wound. It was almost two miles before he had eventually halted for the first time, feeling the effects of the bullet. He had then got up and continued, and I guessed that he was making for Amligola and the Tiger Preserve beyond. Once he reached this, I knew he was lost, since to carry firearms into the preserve, even in pursuit of a wounded tiger, was strictly prohibited. He had had a full night's start of us, and despite his wound it looked as if he might gain the sanctuary of the preserve after all.

Pressing forward, we came upon two more places where he had rested. At the first of these there was considerable blood, and the grass was flattened where he had been lying. At the second there was much less blood, and thereafter the trail became more difficult to follow. Evidently the flow of blood was stopping; perhaps the layer of fat beneath the outer skin had worked itself into the bullet-hole and had stopped the profuse bleeding. We soon found ourselves in the precincts of Amligola and I knew the tiger had now but a mile to go before reaching the forest fire-line that marked the western boundary of the preserve. Here fortune favoured us, for we encountered a stream, at that time holding pools of water. The pugs of the tiger on the soft sand showed that he had now changed his mind about heading for the preserve and had gone upstream instead in search of water. We followed and came upon the first pool, at which he had drunk and had lain up for quite a considerable time thereafter, for the tracks leaving this place were comparatively fresh and had been made within the hour. This fact renewed our flagging hopes and we continued for a furlong before coming upon a second pool, where the tiger had also halted. Water still seeped through the indentations of the pugs, and it was now clear he was but a little distance ahead. He might even have heard us coming and had just moved forward. I determined to try strategy rather than follow in his wake, for I greatly feared that he might turn tail and bolt for the sanctuary which lay so close to this spot. Motioning to my two companions to climb into a tree, I ascended the bank of the nullah soundlessly, and doubled forward in a detour as hard as I could go, parallel to the line of the nullah. I rejoined the nullah half a mile down its course and tiptoed backwards in the hope of surprising the tiger.

But I was doomed to disappointment, for he heard or saw me and scampered up the bank and towards the preserve, as I had feared. I followed his blood-trail to where he had entered a patch of dense scrub, which I circled, halting behind the trunk of a tree at the far end. Here I waited, but nothing emerged. If I attempted to summon my men I would alarm the tiger, and I was in a quandary as to what to do next. Very obligingly he provided the solution by moving, as I noticed the grass before me wave to his forward motion, although not a glimpse of his body was visible. The grass continued to wave as he crept away at an angle, so I left my protecting tree and stole forward myself. The grass began to thin then, and at last I saw him, just as he saw me.

I fired at his flank and with a roar he charged. But within five paces his courage failed and he turned to receive a third shot, which took him pell-mell into the thicket from which he had just emerged. I whistled to the men, who had heard the shots and were themselves bravely coming forward. When they had joined me I explained the situation and told them to climb to the tops of the neighboring trees in an effort to locate the tiger. This they did, but signaled that they could see nothing. I then posted them up two separate trees about fifty yards apart, after telling them to whistle if they saw our quarry, and returned to the nullah myself, in case the tiger should have gone back.

It was a nasty business negotiating that narrow ravine, not knowing at what moment the tiger might spring upon me from the bank above or from behind one of the boulders, which strewed its course. One of the fundamental principles in following a wounded tiger is never to negotiate the bed of a stream alone, when the wounded animal might be lurking above. But I was desperate, having spent the whole day in following this wounded beast, and feared that yet, at the last moment, it might escape me by dragging itself away to die in Karadibetta.

So with bated breath and rifle cocked, and with my finger closed around trigger, I negotiated that stream, to find the tiger had not recrossed it and was still inside the thicket into which it had jumped. How to dislodge him was now the problem.

Returning and summoning the men, we held a council of war. To follow the tiger into the midst of the thicket without knowing at least its approximate location would be suicidal. And then came inspiration. Returning to the stream, I removed my shirt, knotted the sleeves together and tied up the neck. Using it as a bag, we filled it with pebbles to breaking point. Then one of the men carried it back to where I had last fired at the tiger. With this store of ammunition, we began stoning the thicket in all directions, till at last we were answered by a warning growl from the bushes to the right of the point where we stood and about thirty yards away.

Evidently the tiger was severely wounded and could not move, for he did not rush out at us but continued to answer each stone that fell near him with a series of growls. Whispering to the men to stone intermittently to hold his attention, I made a detour of the thicket and began to enter it from the direction of the nullah. I could hear the tiger growling before me, and the occasional fall of the river stones that were hurled by my henchmen. As long as I could hear the tiger I made progress, although the thicket was dense, for I knew his attention was otherwise held. But then, as I drew nearer, he heard me, for his growling stopped. My followers also noticed this and guessed that he had heard or sensed my approach from the rear. In an effort to distract him they threw the stones higher, further and faster, but without result, for the tiger would not give himself away.

I knew I would have to be extremely careful, as he might now attack me at any moment. I halted, every sense alert, straining my ears to hear the faintest rustle preliminary to the last great bound that would bring him upon me. Nothing happened, and as the seconds rolled by in silence, broken only by the sound of the dropping stones, my nervous tension mounted and I became oppressed by an overpowering sense of impending danger. I glanced in all directions, but could detect no movement. I strained my ears, but could hear nothing. Still that sense of approaching peril grew stronger and stronger, till I could have shouted aloud to break the unnatural silence, or have turned tail and run.

And then I glanced behind me. There between two bushes was the wounded tiger, reddened with its own blood as it crawled on its belly to surprise me with its last great spring. Our eyes met it roared and launched itself into the air, while the Winchester cracked twice, hurling its powerful bullets right into the face of the oncoming fury. I sidestepped as the heavy body crashed before me, kicked wildly in the air and then lay still, as I sped yet another bullet into its heart at point-blank range. The troublesome old tiger of Gowja had failed to reach the sanctuary of Karadibetta and was now no more.

About the Author

Kenneth Anderson (1910-1974) was an Indian writer and hunter who wrote many books about his adventures in the jungles of South India.

Kenneth Anderson hailed from a Scottish family settled in India for six generations. His father was superintendent of the F.C.M.A. in Poona and dealt with the salaries paid to military personnel, having an honorary rank of captain. His father also had a rifle and often hunted for waterfowl. Even though his father was not a hunter of man-eating carnivores, he was the person who had the most influence on Anderson's decision to become a professional hunter.

Kenneth Anderson did his schooling in Bishop Cotton School, Bangalore and then at St Joseph's College. He worked for many years at the post office and during the war at the Hindustan Aircraft Factory as a superintendent in the blueprint and planning department. He lived in a bungalow not far from Queen Victoria's statue at the head of the South Promenade (called Mahatma Gandhi Road today) and also owned some land near Bannerghatta, today a suburb of Bangalore.

His love for the inhabitants of the Indian jungle led him to big game hunting and eventually to writing real-life adventure stories. He would often go into the jungle alone and unarmed to meditate and enjoy the beauty of untouched nature. As a professional hunter, he searched out man-eating big game to eliminate the threat they posed to villages. Some of his most notable kills include the Sloth bear of Mysore, the Leopard of Gummalapur, the Leopard of the Yellagiri Hills, the Tigress of Jowlagiri, the Tiger of Segur and the Tiger of Mundachipallam.

His books are hailed as classics of jungle lore. His style of writing is unassuming, descriptive and engaging as he talks about his adventures with many wild animals. While most stories are about hunting tigers and panthers (or leopards) - particularly those that were man-eaters - he also includes chapters on his first-hand encounters with dangerous elephants, bison, and bears. There are also stories about the less 'popular' creatures like Indian wild dogs, hyenas, and snakes. He takes pains to explain the habits and personalities of these animals.

Anderson also gives valuable insights into the people of the Indian jungles of his time, with their lush green woods teeming with wildlife and local inhabitants having to contend with poor quality roads, communication and health facilities. His books delve into the habits of the jungle tribes, their survival tactics, and their day-to-day lives.

Besides focusing on Indian wildlife, he also explores the subject of the occult and writes about his live experiences with unusual phenomena (for which he has no explanation). He helped to save the dwelling jungle tribes from the horrors of man-eaters in many villages in the south Indian states. He also was well versed in speaking Kannada, the language of his hometown Bangalore, and also spoke Tamil, the language spoken in the neighboring states to some extent. He had a Studebaker car and usually used a .405 Winchester rifle for hunting. Despite his reputation as a hunter, he was a pioneer of wildlife conservation in southern India, and spent his later years "shooting" with a camera.

Books

Anderson's books are fairly popular, and recently two omnibuses of his work have been published. The following is a list of the books written by him:

- Nine Man-eaters And One Rogue (1954)
- The Black Panther of Sivanipalli and Other Adventures of the Indian Jungle (1959)
- Jungles Long Ago
- Man Eaters and Jungle Killers
- Tiger Roars
- Tales from the Indian Jungle
- This is the Jungle
- The Call of the Man Eater

In addition to the themes of adventure and survival, Anderson also expounds on his love for India, its people, and its jungles. He was a firm believer in the power of alternative medicine and always carried a box containing various kinds of natural herbs from the jungle with him. Anderson died of cancer at the age of 64. He is buried in St Patricks' cemetery in Bangalore.

Tales from Indian Jungles

Introduction

The man sits with his back to a tree and the light from the campfire waxes and wanes, throwing him into sharp relief along with the tree-trunk against which he rests, to fade the next instant into obscurity and gloom. Leaning against the tree beside him is a .405 Winchester rifle of ancient vintage.

Someone throws a fresh log on the flames and myriad sparks soar upwards, lighting the heavy boughs of the great tree that overshadows the camp. For an instant the man's countenance, too, is lit brightly and we see that he has a beard and moustache, and that firmly held in the corner of the mouth is an old briar that has long gone out. A battered 'Gurkha' hat, its brim curled up at the left side, slopes rakishly to the right upon his head.

The man is speaking. He appears to be telling a tale and it is clear that he is so intent upon it, so absorbed, that he has forgotten his pipe and all else around him.

The flames die down, then flare up again, their momentary gleam revealing the absent look in the man's eyes, as he lives again the incidents he describes. The past has become so real that he is oblivious of his audience, squatting around him on the ground beside the fire, listening to his words.

The sparks fly upwards to merge, fade and disappear in a thick spiral of smoke that curls yet higher until it is lost in the gloom of the heavy foliage of trees that encircle the camp and accentuate the jungle night.

Except for the crackle of the flames and the drone of the man's voice, the forest is lost in silence, and a heavy, oppressive, uncanny quiet that we feel cannot last much longer. And we are right. The roar of a tiger breaks suddenly through the blackness, to be answered by the scream of an excited elephant. Aungh-ha! Ooongh! Aungh-ooongh!' comes that awful sound as the tiger stalks boldly down the jungle aisles, while the distant trumpeting of the elephant 'Tri-aa-a-ank! Tri-aa-a-ank!' announces that the challenge has been met.

But the man seems not to hear these sounds, so engrossed has he become in the story he is telling. He appears to be of the jungle himself, and we get the impression that he belongs there. This is home for him and here is the place he would want to die; the jungle is his brithplace, his haven and his resting place when the end comes.

Let us give heed, then, to what he tells. Stories of the denizens of the forest; tales of incidents, macabre and ghostly sketches of himself. The man seems happy as we listen and he warms to his theme.

For he loves to speak about the jungle and its people, and who should know that better than I.

For I am that man!

One

Ghooming at Dawn

The poojaree awakens us with his persistent soft calls of 'Dorai, Dorai; yeancheko, knarl munni agadho!;' meaning, 'Master, master; wake up, it's four o'clock!'

He whispers the words into our ears, first mine and then yours; for to touch either of us with his hands would be considered disrespectful. Have not the poojarees, for as long as man can remember, been regarded as outcasts, whose very proximity to any ordinary person—let alone their touch—is abhorrent in the extreme?

We sit up abruptly, for in the jungle a tardy awakening may spell the difference between life and death, to view the glowing embers of the fire whose light barely extends to the trunks of the giant trees of the forest that hem us in on three sides. On the fourth we see a whole stretch of water, lit by the stars, which is the Cauvery river, and we hear the dull rumble as the flood swirls past us, appearing out of the darkness of the jungle night and vanishing just as swiftly.

We are camped in the open upon the river bank, a few yards from the fringe of the forest and only a short distance from the water's edge. The poojaree has remained awake all night, to stoke the fire that protected us while we slept from an unwelcome visit by some wandering elephant that might have come for a drink, or perhaps an unusually daring crocodile. The sands of the river bank on which we have been sleeping have been a deterrent to our smaller but equally unpleasant foes such as snakes and scorpions, who do not like crawling on such a surface.

We throw off our light coverings, for it is comparatively warm. The heat from the embers has helped to protect us from the dew. I place a small kettle of water on the fire to brew some tea, that ever-refreshing drink that is always welcomed by persons who sojourn in wild places, and while the water boils accompany you the few paces to the water's edge for a quick wash of teeth, face and hands.

By the time we return, the kettle is boiling, and soon we sit with a steaming mug in hand, while cold buttered chapatties and some ripe bananas—called plantains in India—a complete breakfast, unfit for kings perhaps, but of which there is no equal for good health.

This brief meal is soon over, and now we attend to the rifles that we are going to carry on this early-morning 'ghoom' of the foothills that start less than a quarter-mile away and rise steadily and culminate in a peak called Ponachimalai, over 5,000 feet high and about six miles distant as the crow flies.

My silent, but trusted friend and companion over many years and through many adventures, a somewhat battered .405 Winchester of which everybody makes fun, needs little or no attention. Like me, it is an old-timer that seems to look after itself. In any case, it appears very inferior to that 10-shot U.S. 3006 Springfield rifle of yours, which you rightly treat with such care.

It is still dark when we leave camp. Our poojaree companion is eager to accompany us, but as we are embarking upon a prowl during which I would like to try to show you a few interesting things, I decide to leave him behind on the pretext of looking after the few possessions we have brought. A hunter, pure and simple, Byra, our poojaree friend, would greatly disapprove of my pointing out to you some grand old sambar stag instead of shooting it; while if I draw your attention to the mother-love of a spotted doe, offering herself as a target in an attempt to shield her fawn, he would be positively annoyed with me for not pulling the trigger and bagging both mother and fawn.

The air becomes chill within a hundred yards, and seems to grow even colder as we start to climb the sloping ground to the summit of the first foothill.

It is still dark and we progress slowly. Stumbling over stones and brushing through the undergrowth will certainly betray our movements and turn the first phase of our little walk into a failure. For it is the season when the jumlum- tree casts its purple fruit so prolifically over the ground, and this astringent delicacy is an article of diet absolutely irresistible to sloth bears, who will cover miles in a night to visit such a tree. Only yesterday I noticed a grove of these jumlums close to the riverside and barely two furlongs from camps, with the tracks and droppings of many sloth bears that have been visiting them each night to feed upon the fallen purple fruit.

The hillock we are now ascending is adjacent to the grove and will form the direct line of retreat for the sloth bears that will be still gorging there. As is their custom, they will begin to make for rising ground as soon as the false dawn breaks. That time is close upon us now, and a momentary lightening of the sky heralds this curious phenomenon.

But within a few minutes a pall of darkness once again envelopes the land, till a wider spreading glow in the eastern sky, perhaps twenty minutes later, announces the true dawn and the beginning of another day.

This false dawn deceives not only the hunter new to the forests, but the inmates of the jungle as well. Junglecocks begin to crow, peafowl awaken to voice their brassy calls, carnivores on the prowl turn back to the lairs, and the hyenas and jackals that have been sneaking after them in the hope of a meal from what is left of their kills, turn back to their burrows in the ground and under the rock, where they shelter during the day.

The grumpy and greedy sloth bears that have been concentrating their energies on gormandizing the fallen jumlums will also be deceived by the false dawn. Reluctantly they will abandon the few fruits they have been unable to force down their throats and will make for the haven of the hillsides where they will be left in peace, there to spend the hot hours of noontide sound asleep in some cave or grassy hollow in the ground, or perhaps beneath the shade of a gnarled old tree.

But we ourselves are not misled and hasten to take up our positions before the short-lived glow lapses into pre-dawn darkness. We should be in hiding if we are to hear the sloth bears' approach and perhaps glimpse one of them in the light of the true dawn when it breaks. It would never do to be surprised in the murk of that short-lived twenty-minute interval.

The sloth bear shares with its relatives of all lands the evil reputation of being irascible, excitable, resentful and aggressive should one stumble upon him unexpectedly. Scores of jungle dwellers in India carry horrible scars because they happened to encounter a sloth bear coming round a corner or floundered upon one sound asleep. Many have lost eyes and noses under their raking talons.

This rock, which we have come upon, will suit our purpose admirably. It is about four feet high by perhaps six long. Both of us can crouch behind it and await the coming of a bear. It is, of course, just a chance that may or may not come off, for after all the bears have the whole jungle to roam in and there must be many other paths and byways by which they could climb the hillock without passing in this particular direction.

We chance our luck and wait in silence for a few minutes, hearing only our own breathing. Then the faint thud of a stone, somewhere at the base of the hillock, raises our hopes. Only an animal, generally clumsy in its habits or in search of the grubs that hide under such stones, would have betrayed its presence by making such a noise. Decidedly not a deer, for it would be afraid; and certainly no tiger or panther would advertise its passing. The other possibility might be an elephant. This we will know in a few moments.

Now we can hear the sound of laboured breathing, as if some old man is climbing the hillock with great difficulty. This removes any doubt that a sloth bear is indeed approaching sniffing at holes under the rocks and at the roots of bushes in search of grubs and other succulent morsels.

The eastern sky is beginning to brighten with the approach of the real dawn, but it is still dark behind the rock where we crouch, when the bear reaches us. You are to my right, and the bear is to the right of you, maybe ten feet away. I press your arm tightly and you understand my unspoken signal to remain motionless. It might not see us, for it is notoriously short-sighted. It is also very deaf. It might attack should we betray our presence, and we do not want to shoot it, for normally a bear does us no harm.

The snorting and the grumbling, the huffing and snuffing pass. All we can glimpse is a black blur against the bushes; then the bear has disappeared as it ascends the hill and the sounds of its progress grow fainter.

The dawn breaks apace and the sky to the east across the river displays a pattern of ever-changing colour, starting from dark grey and deep purple and trailing off into violet, green, blue, orange and vermillion, till at length the sun's rim rises above the jagged heights of distant mountain peaks. Its diffused rays are not yet bright enough to keep us from staring with unshielded eyes at that glorious fiery ball.

In salute, birds large and small, far and near, burst into song. The twittering of a hundred bulbuls, the call of the black-and-red crow-pheasant, the cry of a brain-fever bird rising to crescendo, fall upon our ears from the hillside, while from the heavy cover by the river we hear the challenge of junglecocks, 'Wheew! Kuck-kya-kya-k'huckm,' and the metallic notes of a far off peacock 'Miaoo! Miaoo!'. We can imagine it with the glorious plumes of its tail spread like a large fan, strutting and dancing before a bevy of admiring hens.

Crack-a-a-ack! We hear the sound but once, rather faint but quite unmistakable. Something heavy is coming up the hill, perhaps another sloth bear, but I think not. Bears are continuously noisy, while this animal, except for that initial accidental sound, is otherwise, silent.

We crouch quietly behind the rock with just the tops of our heads and eyes showing. To remain absolutely still is the first secret of successful concealment in the jungle. Even if an animal sees you, it will not be able to make you out provided you remain absolutely motionless. The second factor, of course, is the direction in which the wind is blowing. The sense of smell rather than of sight is far more developed in most wild creatures, particularly members of the deer family. Provided the wind is not blowing directly from you to the quarry, and provided you remain absolutely still, you have a good chance of ambushing practically any animal successfully.

We put this to the test a moment later when the bushes before us part with a faint rustle to reveal the head and shoulders of an enormous sambar stag. His giant antlers are spread in perfect symmetry, and he is near enough for us to see their gnarled thickness, equal to your forearm, at the base.

The stag is closer to us than the sloth bear was a moment earlier, and directly in front, yet he does not see us. He hesitates cautiously before advancing into the clear space on the other side of the rock behind which we are hiding. Then he steps forth and we see his massive body in all its grandeur.

He is an old animal, as revealed by his dark brown colour, the shagginess of the mane around his neck, and the long coarse hair on his flanks, which is not quite thick enough to cover completely the skin on his sides. These factors and the massiveness of his antlers indicate the stag's advanced age.

Now I will show you how inquisitive a sambar can be. Plucking a thick stem of grass at my side, I allow the plumed end to protrude above the rock, while holding the stem between finger and thumb. Then I begin to twirl it around and the effect on the stag is instantaneous. Soundless and slight as is this movement, it registers on those ever-watchful eyes. He stops abruptly, his two large ears flicking forwards and backwards, and then forwards again. Impatiently he raises his right leg bent at the knee-point, and stamps it hard upon the ground. His hoof makes a metallic click against a stone.

The stag repeats this action while staring harder than ever at the stem of grass which I continue to revolve. All his suspicions are aroused now as his instinct warns him that something strange is going on. He has seen stems of grass many a time swaying in the breeze. But never has he seen one twirling round and round!

We can read the stag's thoughts behind those staring eyes. Instinct alerts him and urges him to flee. But curiosity impels him to find out more about the stem of grass that twirls around in such a peculiar fashion. The sambar takes a step forward, hesitates for a full minute, and then comes forward again. Every muscle in his frame is taut, attuned to flee at a moment's notice; but he just cannot overcome his inquisitive urge.

This natural inquisitiveness among the deer and antelope families is the reason why thousands of them are slaughtered each year by experienced poachers, who do just what I am doing at the moment, or adopt some other trick to entice them to their doom. The stag is so close now that he could be transfixed by a spear-throw; and he is coming even closer! Clearly this foolish animal must be taught a salutary lesson and I decide to give him the fright of his life.

Springing up from behind the rock, I yell' Wroff! Wrooff! Wrooff!' at the top of my voice. To say that the stag is taken aback by this sudden apparition of a human with a tiger's voice describes the situation mildly. He rears up on hind legs, slips on a stone, falls to his knees, struggles erect and lets out a strident cry of danger.

'Oo-onk!' he screams.

Then he lays his antlers back along his sides so as not to get them caught in the branches of trees, and crashes down the hillside. So precipitate is his flight that we can follow his movements by the rattle of displaced stones till he reaches the shelter of the heavy forest beside the river. There the stag evidently halts to see if he is being pursued, and resumes his warning to all the jungle that danger and death lurk upon the hillside.

'Oo-onk! Dha-ank!' he bellows, again and again.

The general excitement is taken up by the watchman of the band of langur monkeys that have been feeding contentedly in the jumlum - grove. We can just glimpse him from where we hide, standing erect on two legs on a tree-top as he strives hard to catch sight of the danger that the sambar has announced. Try as he may, he cannot see us. Obviously he is puzzled and wants to identify the nature of the foe. Then the big male langur decides he must do his duty to his band and the other wild creatures at large by joining in the alarm and passing on the warning.

'Harr!' he screams gutturally; and then a moment later, 'Harr! Harr-harr!' in quick succession. The forest is disturbed in right earnest now, and from the far side of the river a jungle-sheep, about to quench his thirst, takes fright, scampers away and voices his dog-like bark as he goes, 'Kharr! Kharr! Kharr!'

A herd of spotted deer, grazing somewhere on the other side of the hillock on whose slopes we are hiding, hears the commotion and passes on the warning. 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' call the hinds to each other in quick succession. In the distance an elephant trumpets shrilly.

The excitement dies down at length and we decide to resume our early-morning prowl, for there is nothing to be gained by continuing to hide. The sambar has made too great a commotion for anything further to come our way.

Do you see that shrub with the tapering leaves resembling the tea-plant that thrives only in higher altitudes? Many such bushes grow all around. It is known as the 'vellari' plant. The leaves, in a compress or poultice form are very useful in relieving rheumatic pains and swellings of any sort. The five-pointed leaves of this large tree, green above and silver-white below, produce excellent effects when applied to raw wounds or a contusion; the silver-white side is placed in contact with the troubled area. That little plant that grows on the hard ground, barely a foot high, with the silver-grey, almost spiked leaves, is said to be a remedy for poisonous snakebites, and that other tiny plant with white, daisy-like flower and the serrated leaves, is renowned for stopping bleeding where the juice from the leaves is squeezed into a wound. It also lowers high blood pressure in a patient as rapidly as can any medicine prescribed by a doctor.

Truly the jungle is filled with all manner of herbs and plants whose leaves, stems, seeds, flowers and even roots are remedies for most of the maladies from which the human race suffers. They grow in the forests and also in civilized areas, even along the railway track.

You must often have noticed the myriads of pink and white flowers peeing out from among the green leaves of the common Indian periwinkle shrub that thrives practically everywhere, particularly on railway embankments. Forty leaves of this plant, brewed like tea and drunk in a large cupful of water or milk every day, stimulates the pancreas by helping the secretion of insulin, thus controlling diabetes. But there are other roots and leaves that are even more effective in treating this malady, one of them a little creeper common in every jungle. It is known as the 'sugar killer' because, after chewing only one leaf, sugar loses its sweetness and tastes like sand in the mouth, this effect lasting for about three hours.

But we are digressing and in the meanwhile have arrived at the top of the hillock and begun our descent on the other side. We must move cautiously now, for in places the going is steep, and should one of us dislodge a stone or make some noise, the family of spotted deer that has now stopped calling and that we hope to see soon, will surely take alarm. Luckily the breeze is blowing up the hill, so they will not scent us.

We reach the base of the hillock and tread our way around bushes of thorn and lantana on tiptoe till we arrive at a grassy glade. There, feeding placidly, is a herd of at least forty of the deer we had hoped to find. Fortunately, none of the hinds on sentinel duty have observed our approach and we stop just in time behind a crop of young redwood trees.

The sight before us is magnificent. The stags are in the centre of the group, antlers spread and tapering, as they toss their proud heads and sniff the air before stooping to graze again. Around them on all sides are the does and fawns, the former ever alert, with ears cocked forwards and twitching to catch the faintest sound. Now and then a head and neck dips quickly to earth to grab a mouthful of grass or leaves, but is raised again quickly, ever observant, always vigilant.

The fawns have no such responsibilities and death will strike many of them down cruelly and suddenly, before the survivors learn that the great secret of continued existence in the jungle is to be 'ever watchful at every moment; for death lurks everywhere.'

They gambol and play among themselves, one chasing the other round and round. A few of the very young members nuzzle up against their mothers, slyly dipping their tiny heads under udders hanging temptingly close, to sneak a drink of milk. The mothers in turn stop their feeding now and again to lick their little offspring affectionately, but never for a moment do they halt their close scrutiny of the surrounding jungle for a possible foe. Their eyes seem to stare in every direction, with ears strained forwards to catch the slightest sound, and nostrils dilated to detect the faintest scent of danger.

On a tree directly above the grazing deer is a small family of langurs. Two of these jump to earth and playfully chase a spotted fawn. Then one leaps back to a low branch where, hanging by its legs, it grabs the fawn by the tail and half lifts if off the ground. The fawn enjoys the game but its mother does not seem to approve.

A scene apparently of utter peace, beauty and tranquillity. But out of the corners of our eyes we notice the faintest of movements beneath a large bush, well away to our left. We look harder at the bush, but the movement has now ceased.

A hind with her young fawn, grazing close to that bush, has seen it too. She raises her head abruptly to stare hard, both ears cocked forwards and muzzle aquiver. The she raises her right foot to stamp the ground and voice the first syllable of her warning cry, Aiow!'

But it is already too late. An elongated form, golden and spotted in the rays of the early morning sun, springs from under that bush and in two bounds reaches the little fawn. In the next second it is dead, while the panther glowers and growls over the small quivering body.

Then we witness a scene that is as touching as it is magnificent. The fawn's mother, forgetful of her own safety, rushes forward to defend it. The panther leaves the little carcass and springs upon the hind, seizing her throat and bearing her to the ground. Her hoofs drum out their death-agony on the green grass, already stained a deep red by the blood that flows from her torn throat.

I watch you as you raise your 10-shot Springfield to cover the still growling panther, in order to exact what you feel is just retribution for the murder that has just been done. But I stretch out a hand to hold the muzzle and deflect your aim.

'Don't shoot, John! It's the law of the jungle. The panther has killed for food, not wantonly.'

The panther hears my voice, then sees us. In the next instant it has vanished. But it will come back.

Two

The Bellundur Ogre

Bellundur is a hamlet situated on the shoulder of a hill and about three miles from the village of Tagarthy, in the district of Shimoga, in Mysore state.

For centuries this part of Mysore has been the home of tigers, which had become so numerous as to have almost eliminated, simply by devouring them, their lesser cousins, the more subtle but far less powerful panthers that also, not long ago, roamed in large numbers through the area. These lesser cats, as a matter of fact, had created havoc in their time. Far bolder and more clever, and more difficult to circumvent, they could hide themselves better, being smaller than tigers; they haunted the precincts of villages which they raided systematically each night after sundown, carrying away fowls, dogs, goats, sheep and calves with equal disdain and impartiality.

Humans they seldom harmed unless they were wounded, but on those rare occasions when they were guilty of this crime, to exact retribution against them was difficult because of the cover afforded by the dense jungles of the area, well watered as they were by heavy monsoon rains.

When my story opens, however, tigers were the ruling factor, while in Bellundur lived a necromancer who was reputed for his ability to provide charms and talismans of all sorts for all purposes. These last were said to be particularly efficacious in procuring a loved one, or contrarily, in ridding yourself of one whom you did not love quite so well. They were also rumoured to be very effective in securing a job that had been applied for or the success of petition.

Among his other abilities, this magician was far famed as possessing the power, by charms and incantations, to 'tie up' the jungle, so that any hunter operating in that area would meet with total failure. The game would either not appear before his rifle; or if they did, the rifle would not go off; or if it did go off, the bullet would not strike the quarry even at a few yards' range. I had met this character some years ago, and have written about him in one of my earlier stories. [1] Like most members of his calling, he enjoyed a little flattery. Otherwise, I had found him quite friendly and had found nothing wrong in his weakness. After all, we all like to be flattered.

But the 'Ogre of Bellundur,' about which I am going to tell you, began its career in more or less the usual way, as a very ordinary and inoffensive tiger. Nothing was heard of it in its younger days.

Evidently it had confined its attentions to killing and eating spotted deer, sambar and pig, which swarmed everywhere in those times. Then the government began encouraging programmes of cattle-rearing, and as rich pasturage abounded, herds of cattle were introduced which multiplied into many thousands within a short period, to the detriment of the wild deer and pig that previously had grazed undisturbed.

'The Ogre,' as it came to be known later, now made its presence felt by varying its taste for wild game with a liking for prime beef, and this inclination grew rapidly to the exclusion of any other kind of meat. It killed and it ate, and it ate and it killed, till it had accounted for many herds of cattle and the villagers at last began to feel that something should be done.

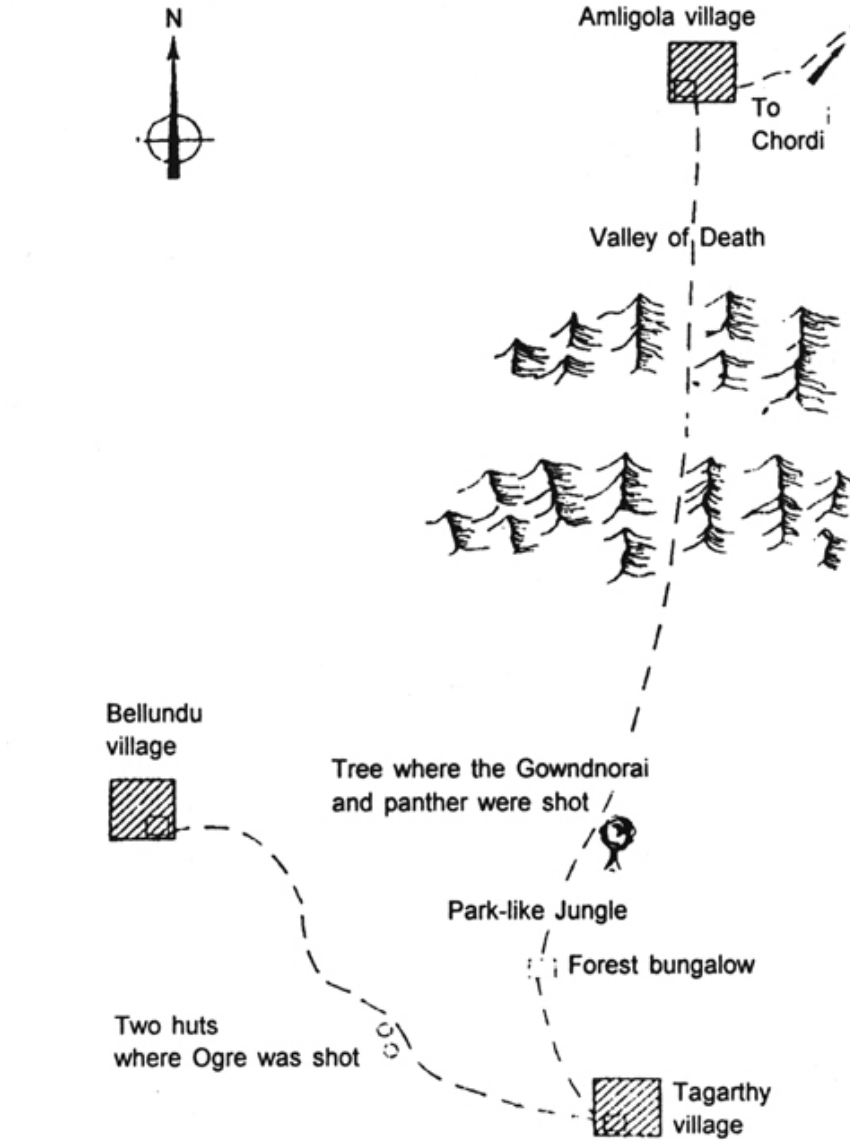
The Indian villager is a man of unbounded patience, an attribute easier to understand if one observes his complete apathy, his capacity for resignation and for accepting whatever misfortune it may be the will of God to bestow upon him. So, when I tell you that at last the villagers had had enough of this tiger and were determined to put a stop to its depredations you will realize that the Ogre had really gone too far. They decided to set a trap, catch it and then kill it.

A deep rectangular hole was dug in the centre of a game trail; the mouth was carefully concealed by thin interlaced bamboos covered with leaves and twigs, and the bait, in the form of the least valuable calf in the village, was tied to a stake at the farther end of the rectangular pit. A direct approach to the bait from any other direction except across the rectangular pit was made impracticable for the tiger by a vast mass of thorns packed tightly around it on both sides and beyond, leaving only the one approach open.

Everything went according to plan and on the third night the tiger fell into the pit.

The following morning all the inhabitants of Bellundur village turned out, including the necromancer, to gloat over their erstwhile enemy and throw firebrands at it, before putting it to death by the simple but rather slow process of spearing it from above. Evidently nobody had a gun, and the question of cruelty, of course, did not occur to anybody. For was not this animal the tiger which had killed and devoured so many of their cattle?

SKETCH MAP: OGRE AND GOWNDNORAI TIGERS
(Chapters 2 and 3)



Not only did the inhabitants of Bellundur have no guns, but they did not appear to be very rich in spears either. I discovered afterwards that just two people had spears, or articles that might pass as such. One was a short affair, less than four feet long and entirely blunt at the end. The description fitted more a crowbar than a spear. The second was a true spear and belonged to the local temple. It was reputed to have been used in a war two and a half centuries ago, but was now as blunt as the aforementioned crowbar, having been employed many times for digging yams out of the earth. In any case, the shafts of both weapons were too short to reach the tiger from the surface of the pit, but this mattered little, as each of their owners was confident that, with a single throw of his particular weapon, he could transfix and kill the imprisoned beast.

Much argument is said to have arisen as to who should cast his weapon first. Finally, but I do not know on what grounds, the owner of the crowbar won the dispute. Taking careful aim, he hurled his weapon; no sooner had it left his hand than its blunt point was deflected and the side of the weapon rather than its blunt point, struck the flank of the tiger with a dull thud.

As might have been expected, the tiger did not take lightly to this form of treatment. It roared its defiance and glared up at its tormentors. There was widespread tittering amongst the assembled crowd as the second spear-man, after glancing contemptuously at the crestfallen owner of the crowbar, prepared to make his cast. The 250-year-old spear flew downwards to its target, the blunt point embedding itself fairly in the tiger's hindquarters.

Now Bellundur was totally unarmed! And the Ogre lost its temper. With a burst of unexpected energy, it sprang upwards to the rim of the pit, groping with the talons of its forefeet. They reached it, held and embedded themselves in the soft soil. The hind feet, kicking the air madly, found purchase against the sides of the pit and levered the beast upwards. And the next moment the tiger was free, leaping out of the mouth of the pit like a demon from hell, and far more dangerous.

Just one of the crowd stood in its path to freedom; all the rest had fled. The tiger leaped over the man before it, kicking backwards with all four feet extended, and the claws of one of those dreadful feet met the back of the man's skull before he, in turn, could gather his wits to run. It was only a glancing blow, comparatively light considering the force that the tiger had put into it, for if the paw had struck the head fully the skull would have been smashed like an eggshell. As it was, the tips of the claws caught in the skin at the back of the man's neck, and the weight of the tiger, as it leaped over the man's head, did the rest.

Then the tiger had gone. The man fell where he had been standing but he was quite alive. The whole of his scalp, removed neatly from the bone, now hung over his face, the long hair streaming down before him instead of behind. It took three days for this man to die, for to the very last moment he lived in the hope that his scalp could be put back. He was the Ogre's first victim although admittedly unintentionally so.

Naturally, with the healing of his wound, the tiger grew cunning. Other baits were tied out for it with various forms of traps, but they were studiously ignored. All its killings of cattle thereafter were done in broad daylight, generally in the afternoons while the herds were placidly resting after having grazed all morning and their attendants were huddled asleep in the shade of the bushes. Those who were awake or had been awakened by the short cry of the stricken victim, at first attempted to drive the Ogre off by shouting and throwing stones. But the Ogre soon put a stop to such tactics by leaping upon one of the graziers and mauling him severely. Strangely enough this man made a complete recovery, though the lesson that had been given was salutary enough. Thereafter, at sight or sound of the tiger all herdsmen fled, leaving their charges to its mercy.

The situation at Bellundur went from bad to worse. Cattle owners could no longer trust their animals to the forest for grazing, but endeavoured to feed them at home, and this of course cost a lot of money. Correspondingly, the tiger's hunger grew as the supply of Bellundur beef was cut down, so it extended the range of its operations to include Tagarthy and some of the smaller neighbouring hamlets. Its fame for daring as a cattle-lifter began to spread far and wide.

That was how a gentleman, whom we shall call Mr Johnson, came to hear about the tiger.

Johnson was an officer in railway service who had lately been transferred to the area from some other part of India where tigers did not exit. This made him very keen to attempt to bag the beast that was the talk of the neighbourhood, and as he had a rifle he made his way to Bellundur, which was only about seven miles from the railway track, on the few days' leave during which he hoped to succeed. And this is where old Buddiah, the necromancer, comes into my story.

Hearing that a white man had arrived and was making inquiries about the tiger, Buddiah donned his ceremonial saffron robe, plaited the long roll of filthy false hair that he kept for such occasions in a coil around the crown of his head, smeared ashes liberally across his forehead, which he further decorated with vermilion marks of a religious significance, hung his chain of large amber wooden beads around his neck, and holding his gnarled walking-stick, blackened by being soaked in oil, in his hand, presented himself before Johnson, offering his services, claiming that they were absolutely indispensable if the white man wished to succeed in shooting the tiger.

Now the situation was really very simple. To anyone of moderate experience, it was obvious that old Buddiah was endeavouring to earn a few rupees but more than that he was taking the opportunity to impress his fellow villagers with his greatness as a magician. He wanted them to feel that even a white man had to come to him for help. If Johnson had used a little psychology and common sense, he would have recognized these things and given the old man a boost with a few rupees to humour him. Instead, Johnson lost his temper, told the magician to get out of his presence, and when Buddiah began to remonstrate indignantly, made matters worse by threatening to break his neck!

So, the necromancer stalked away in fury: his prestige with the villagers, which he had been endeavouring to enhance, had been severely lessened by the white man's words. He felt his companions would laugh at him secretly, although he was still confident that they feared him too much to do so openly.

The villagers, on the other hand, felt abashed. Although none of them had any liking for Buddiah who had exploited them systematically since childhood, he was, nevertheless, their own magician. One of themselves. To be spoken to in such a fashion by the white man, and to be threatened with a beating, reflected scant respect for their magician and incidentally for themselves and the village as a whole. Thus by his hasty words, Johnson had made enemies all around instead of friends. The villagers left him where he stood and refused to have anything more do with him. Nor would anyone sell or hire him a bait to tie out for the tiger.

Being of a determined nature, Johnson made up his mind to succeed in spite of the local noncooperation. He made his way back to Tagarthy where, by exercising the tact he should have displayed at Bellundur, he was able to buy two ancient bulls. Engaging herdsmen, he had these two animals driven back to the outskirts of Bellundur, where he tied each up in a nullah said to be frequented by the tiger, or so he was told by the herdsmen he had engaged; but as these men were from Tagarthy and not from Bellundur, they did not know very much about the tiger's movements.

The following morning Johnson and his herdsmen visited the baits. One had disappeared. It certainly had not been taken by the tiger, for there were no pug-marks to be seen in the sandy bed of the nullah, which bore a number of human footprints instead. Had these been made by his own men the previous day, or by others? The other bait had not been touched.

Johnson rightly came to the conclusion that the villagers of Bellundur had stolen his first bait. He stalked into the village with a loaded rifle, demanded the return of the bull, and then threatened to inform the police. To all of which the villagers assumed an air of injured innocence. They maintained that the human footprints he had seen in the sandy ravine were those of his own men when they had tied the bait and asked him to prove otherwise. To Johnson's dire threats to shoot the thieves, the yokels turned a deaf ear and smiled.

Fearing the second bait would also disappear, Johnson ordered his two men to construct a machan over it, in which he sat that same afternoon, perhaps more to protect his bait from being robbed than in the serious hope of bagging the tiger. But the unexpected happened. I am told the tiger turned up while it was still daylight. Johnson fired, succeeding only in wounding the animal, which got away.

Throughout the next week, Johnson, with commendable determination, scoured the jungles in search of the tiger. No one came forward to assist him; even his two henchmen refused to accompany him on the plea that it was too dangerous. Unaided, the white man lost his way on one occasion and was compelled to spend the night in the forest. In the end, bitterly disappointed, Johnson had to return to duty without bagging his tiger.

Everything was quiet for some time after that. The Ogre did not show up and the villagers of Bellundur had to admit that, in spite of their best efforts at noncooperation, the sahib had rid them of the pest that had been exacting such a heavy toll of their cattle. Buddiah, the magician, was more aggrieved than ever. He saw his pride and reputation at a still lower ebb, for he had announced boastfully that the sahib would not or could not shoot the tiger; he had done so nevertheless and had rid Bellundur of the hated cattle-lifter.

So the cattle were driven out to the jungles once again each day for grazing. That is, until the inevitable happened!

Early one afternoon a herd rushed pell-mell back to the village minus one of its members—and minus the nineteen-year-old youth who had gone out with the animals that morning to graze them. Nobody worried about the matter till nightfall. Then the relatives of the boy grew a little anxious about him, while the owner of the missing cow grew far more anxious about his valuable animal. A search the next morning revealed the cow lying dead: her neck had been neatly broken by a large tiger whose pug-marks were clearly to be seen in the field where she had been struck down. A hundred yards away, hidden under a bush, was the body of the missing youth.

There was, however, this difference between the two carcases: the cow had not been eaten, while rather more than half of the youth's body had been devoured by the tiger. The familiar pattern had appeared once more: an innocent tiger had been turned into a man-eater through being wounded and left to fend for itself.

Tragedy succeeded tragedy after that and the pattern of events was repeated. The people of Bellundur locked themselves in their huts at sundown while the cattle were kept starving in their pens. Old Buddiah's prestige was at its lowest ebb.

Lack of human prey drove the tiger into extending his operations towards Tagarthy and more distant villages, and that was when the beast began to be referred to as 'The Ogre,' a name that was whispered with bated breath behind locked doors and only during daylight hours. Otherwise it would surely hear and bring dreadful vengeance upon the man who dared refer to the creature as a tiger.

After darkness the Ogre was about! It roamed everywhere and a man was not safe even in a locked room. The Ogre, or one of its spies, an evil spirit of the air in the form of a bat or an owl, or one of the many devils that lived in the jungle, might hear what was being said and carry words to the dreaded man-eater.

Then the man who had spoken against it was indeed undone! It would be only a matter of time before the Ogre exacted a terrible revenge. His fate was sealed and there was no means of escape. That was the universal opinion.

At this stage my old friend, Doctor Stanley, the medical officer of Tagarthy village, wrote a long letter to me and related this story, inviting me to join him in an attempt to end the Ogre's career. This doctor, who owned only a .12 bore shotgun and no rifle, had shot many tigers himself in his younger days, parelleling Dick Bird, the Postmaster of Santaveri, whom I have mentioned in another story. Now that he had grown older, he felt that his rather antiquated gun, although still a trusty weapon, might not be quite up to the mark for a man-eater.

I met him three days later in the front room of his dispensary-cum-hospital, after motoring to Tagarthy in my Studebaker. The first thing he insisted upon was a tremendous meal, with gallons of tea, after which, over clouds of pipe-smoke, we discussed 'old times' for about three hours. Generally long-suffering by nature, at times I become impatient; finally I reminded the good doctor that there was a job of work to be done. Obviously the first step was to visit Bellundur and pick up the trail from there.

The Studebaker had a hard time to reach this village. The track, which was always bad, had become really terrible after the last rains. The doctor, who sat next to me, said we should have walked. Having reached Bellundur at last, I set about undoing, as far as possible, some of the mischief that had been done by the tactless Johnson. I called upon Buddiah, who was sulking in his hut, asked him to don his ceremonial robes and make pooja for me and repeat all the mantras he knew, to enable me to succeed in shooting the man-eater, presenting him with ten rupees to cover incidental expenses.

He brightened up at once. In no time at all he stalked out into the marketplace, all dressed up for the occasion, where the first thing he did was to demand another five rupees from me to cover the cost of a black fowl and a bottle of the local spirit called 'arrack.' The fowl was to be killed, cooked and eaten by him, presumably to placate the spirits of the jungle, and the arrack was to be drunk, also by Buddiah, presumably for the same purpose. The old man declared that only thereafter would he be in a proper condition to utter the mantras that would lead to the downfall of the man-eater. Dr Stanley and I, knowing what state that would be, pretended hearty agreement.

I handed over the money and resigned myself to a further delay of another hour at least, which would be the shortest possible time for the cock to be half-cooked while Buddiah had conditioned himself with arrack for saying his mantras. But the old man, and the villagers of Bellundur especially, had to be humoured if the damage done by Johnson was to be repaired.

The doctor and I chatted while the unfortunate black cock was procured, slaughtered before our eyes, parboiled into a curry and then devoured by the greedy old necromancer. With scarcely an interval he proceeded to empty the bottle of arrack by the simple process of applying the neck to his mouth and pouring the contents down his throat. Why he did not choke in the process amazed me.

This done, the magician staggered to his feet. He was dead drunk and could hardly stand erect. With bloodshot eyes and an inane smile, he produced what looked like a bracelet of twisted and dried jungle vines from a filthy cloth-bag that he brought out from somewhere on his person. Asking for my rifle, he proceeded to pass this bracelet over the end of the muzzle and down the length of the barrel three or four times. He was so drunk that he missed his aim once or twice, but I was able to rectify the error unostentatiously by quickly guiding the end of the barrel so as to allow it to be encircled by the bracelet.

That was the end of the mantra. The tiger's doom was sealed! It would fall to my rifle! The spirits of the jungle, in the person of old Buddiah, had eaten and drunk well. The crowd of villagers, who had been watching every detail while they stood around us in a circle, breathed this assurance loudly. In any case the mantra, together with their assurances, ended just in time, for the next moment old Buddiah fell to earth as if pole-axed.

The important thing was that good feeling had been restored. Buddiah's prestige was up again, as was that of the villagers and of Bellundur village itself. Dr Stanley and I were smiled upon as 'good fellows,' while the activities of the Ogre were momentarily eclipsed. Just then it was no more than an ordinary tiger, waiting to be shot.

It was now dark, and the trip back to Tagarthy in the Studebaker was a nightmare. We made it, however, without any broken axles or springs, but resolved that henceforth we would walk there and back rather than risk a breakdown, which would be inevitable if we tempted fate too much.

Stanley procured two baits at Tagarthy, which we duly tied out the next day at suitable points near the track to Bellundur, for you will remember that I told you that the tiger was by this time, operating throughout the area. After lunch we walked the seven miles to that village, and we were able there, without any difficulty, to procure another three animals as additional baits. Obviously the little show we had organized with Buddiah the previous evening had had its good effects. These baits were tied out at points which the villagers informed us were often visited by the Ogre.

Time was against us, however, and we were in too much of a hurry to be able to set up a machan above any one of the five baits we had laid that day. This is against my usual practice of constructing a machati first and tying the bait in full view of it afterwards, which has two advantages. Firstly a 'kill,' if it occurs, is in proper view of the machan and does not have to be shifted. Secondly, no noise is made in building the machan, which would be inevitable if the 'kill' occurs first. Such sounds may arouse the suspicion of the tiger if it is lying up or otherwise lurking within hearing.

It was again pitch-dark when we walked back to Tagarthy, keeping a sharp lookout with our torches against a surprise attack by the man-eater, but the only animal we encountered was a pangolin foraging amongst the dead leaves, out much earlier than usual for these creatures.

None of the five baits we had tied out was touched that night, but late in the morning of the third day, a man came running to the doctor's dispensary to announce that his cousin had been taken by the tiger. The victim and his wife, together with our informant and his wife, lived in two huts constructed side by side and only a short mile away along the track to Bellundur. The sun was at meridian when this cousin, who was returning from a visit to Tagarthy for provisions, came into full view of the other three members of the little community, gathered before their huts and were chatting together. They had been about to call out to him when he had screamed loudly and then vanished into thin air.

Our informant stated he had then grabbed his axe and set out to see what was the matter, accompanied by his cousin's wife, wringing her hands and lamenting aloud. The thought of the man-eater had never occurred to them. Rather they suspected that an evil spirit from the forest had done away with their companion.

Reaching the spot where the man had disappeared, they were terrified to find the pug-marks of a tiger in the soft sand of the trail. Prevented by fear from going farther, they were about to turn back when the wails of the woman, which had now increased in volume, annoyed the man-eater who had just begun to taste his victim not far away. The tiger growled fiercely, whereupon both the man and the victim's wife fled. Stopping long enough to enable the two women to lock themselves into one of the huts, the man had come running to Tagarthy by a round-about route to inform the doctor and me of what had happened. The Ogre would be there still, he affirmed, feasting upon his cousin, if only we had the courage to come at once and shoot it.

Grabbing rifle, torch and warm coat, I set out at a jog trot with our informant, Stanley bringing with him the .12 bore gun and another torch. I was younger in those days than I am now, and the doctor younger still, so that we reached the two huts in fairly good shape, if a bit breathless. Minutes later, with the man in the middle, Stanley to the left of him and me to the right, we approached the place where the tragedy had taken place, determined to flush the man-eater on its kill.

The tiger sensed we were coming long before we knew where it was, for we heard no sounds of eating or the breaking of bones. As likely as not it had seen our arrival at the two huts, which were, as I have said, in full view of the spot where the Ogre had seized its victim.

When we were quite close, the man-eater began to growl, and its protests grew to hideous volume. Clearly, it was bent upon driving us away. If we beat a retreat now, while the going was good, all would be well. But if we continued to advance, it would either rush at us, or its courage might fail at the last moment, it would then run away.

We hesitated only a second before Stanley and I nodded to each other. With my left arm I thrust back the man who had called us, motioning to him with my hand to go away. Then we advanced, shoulder to shoulder. We could not see the tiger yet. Roar followed upon roar, and the bushes in front of us shook violently. We stopped, gun and rifle to respective shoulders, awaiting the onslaught that was inevitable.

It never came! At the last moment the man-eater shirked the encounter! It was accustomed to chasing and killing men. Never before had human beings deliberately followed and approached it. With a final shattering roar, the tiger sprang away from the spot and I was just able to catch a fleeting glimpse of a reddish-brown form hurtling into a bush; then it disappeared. I could have fired. Why I did not do so I just cannot say, but I was to regret my mistake.

The tiger must have been really hungry, for we discovered it had made the most of its opportunity by devouring over half its victim, leaving only the head, arms, legs and a few ribs uneaten. Stanley and I did not speak to each other. We were both experienced enough to know that the human voice carries a long way. Instead, I looked about to see if there were any possible places to conceal myself and await the man-eater's return should it decide to come back to finish what scraps were left.

But the Ogre put an end to my reflections by its next action, as unexpected as it was sudden. It might have been hunger or natural ill nature, or maybe the fact that as it fled it saw only two humans and not a crowd, had dared to follow. Anyway, this extraordinary animal stopped in its tracks, turned about and started to come for us, roaring louder as it approached. The ground literally shook with the intensity of the sound, while its ever-increasing volume indicated that the tiger was getting dangerously close. You must bear in mind that all this time we could not see the beast for it was hidden by the bushes. What we could see was the bushes shaking violently as it came closer and closer.

What was happening just goes to indicate the axiom I have so often repeated in my earlier stories. There are no fixed rules in the jungle and no two animals are alike. Like us they are individuals; they react differently under different circumstances and the unexpected often occurs.

Standing shoulder to shoulder once more, the doctor and I turned to face the man-eater, which was making things easy for us and solving the problem by attacking. In another minute the tiger would have to show itself and then all would be over.

But the minute never came! For the Ogre was wily beyond expectation. At the last moment it changed its mind once more and began to circle us and the remains of its meal without showing itself, still snarling and roaring for all it was worth. The animal's tactics were now clear. Again its courage failed when it had been about to press home its attack. Now its intention was to drive us away with the noise it was making.

Then I had an idea. Its success depended on just how observant the tiger had been, how persistent was its memory, and how alert its instinct. It had seen the two of us approaching. That much was evident. Now if one of us went away and the other hid in the grass somewhere near the remains of the victim, would the tiger be aware of the fact? Would it think the coast was clear and return to its meal? Would it be tempted to follow and attack the one who was retreating? Would it see through the trick we were trying to play by stalking whichever one of us had remained behind and leaping upon that one from the rear?

There were too many imponderables in the situation and I confess I did not like them at all. Moreover, the doctor was armed only with a shotgun. If I suggested that he should go back and leave me behind, it was possible the tiger might decide to stalk him, when Stanley would be at a decided disadvantage. Alternatively, if I left the doctor behind and walked away myself and the man-eater decided to attack him instead of me, the same disadvantage would be there. As a last resource, I could offer the doctor my rifle and take his gun.

Frankly, I did not relish that last solution. I was accustomed to my .405 in emergencies. No doubt Stanley had the same feelings for his shotgun. If we exchanged weapons we would both be unfamiliar with the firearm each of us was handling, and a shotgun, moreover, was hardly suitable for a meeting with a man-eater.

Evidently these very thoughts were passing through Stanley's mind and he solved the problem for me by whispering to me to hide while he would go away. Without speaking, I thrust my rifle towards him and reached for his shotgun, but Stanley turned it way from me, motioning impatiently towards the bushes for me to hide.

The tiger was creeping about now, circling our position and continuing to snarl and roar alternately. A single bush, not more than four feet high, grew about thirty feet or so away, its base hidden by the usual carpet of grass and greenery. There was no other large tree or rock that offered shelter. I tiptoed to the bush and took up my position behind it, crouching on the ground with my weapon ready. We waited till the tiger had reached a point that was opposite the direction in which the doctor would have to go to regain the track leading towards the two huts. Then I motioned to him to get away quickly.

With the purpose of letting the man-eater know that he was departing and that the coast would be clear to return to the meal, Stanley coughed slightly and began to talk to himself as he began to back slowly towards the track. I watched him looking intently in the direction where the man-eater was still demonstrating, his .12 bore gun ready for instant action should the animal charge.

But Stanley had made a mistake by talking. Instead of returning to its kill now that the coast was clear, as the doctor had hoped, this most unusual animal did the unexpected thing once again. Circling the scant clearing in which the remains of its victim reposed, and incidentally myself, the tiger began to follow the departing doctor. Worse still, it stopped roaring and snarling. Clearly, the man-eater now meant business. Whatever the Ogre was doing at that moment, or intended to do at the next, was to be done in silence. Stanley, already handicapped with only a shotgun, was going to be still further handicapped by not knowing from which direction the man-eater would attack him.

This thought worried me. It was hard to sit idly behind a bush while my friend's life might at that moment be in great danger. Without weighing the consequences I decided to creep after the tiger.

No greater folly could have been committed than by my action at that moment, and I will tell you why.

Try to imagine the doctor stepping backward, a foot at a time with his shotgun loaded in both barrels ready for instant use pointed towards where he thinks the tiger is, creeping upon him unseen and in silence. He does not know that I have left my shelter in the bush and am following him and the tiger. Then put yourself in the tiger's place, your composure now regained after any exhibition of bad temper. You move softly and silently, bent upon putting an end to this interfering human being who has dared to follow you. At the same time, you are aware that you are close enough for a final spring, but instinct warns you that to do so will court disaster. And you do not know that a second human being is following you. Behind them both am I, creeping forward with equally great caution, my Winchester cocked and ready for use at the first glimpse of the tiger. But I cannot see it, nor Stanley. All I can hear is the faint rustle of a bush here and there before me, as either Stanley or the tiger brushes against it despite their caution. Finally, do not forget that the distance between the doctor and myself cannot be more than forty or fifty yards now, with the tiger somewhere in between.

If only that tiger had had a little reasoning power, what fun it could have had that day! All it had to do was to conceal itself and then mimic the sound of a charging tiger by roaring 'Wroof! Wroof! Wroof!' Stanley and I would have opened fire. One or the other would have shot his companion. Perhaps with a spot of luck—or bad luck—we might have shot each other. I would have made more tender eating in those days than now! So would the doctor, even if he smelled faintly of iodoform! And what headlines for the newspapers! ' Shikaries after man-eater shoot each other! Man-eater eats both!'

So intent was I on following the tiger that all this did not dawn upon me at the time. The man-eater, unaware of being followed, kept steadfastly after Stanley; while the doctor, naturally worried by the silence that had succeeded the tiger's threatening roars, except for a faint and furtive rustling now and again as the tiger came after him, was wondering if he would reach the track to the huts before the attack came.

Then things happened! The doctor! The doctor reached the track. The tiger broke the silence with a shattering roar! Seeing nothing but hearing everything, I did not know right away whether the man-eater was launching its attack upon the doctor or myself. The doctor fired, and slugs from his gun spattered through the undergrowth uncomfortably close to me. The tiger, frightened by the sound, lost its nerve, turned, and dashed past me at full gallop. I saw the tiger coming, threw the rifle to my shoulder, and pressed the trigger at almost point-black range.

Stanley told me a few minutes later that my bullet whizzed past his head within inches. The only thing that kept it from parting his hair, he affirmed, was that he was bald! Inadvertently the Ogre had almost succeeded in accomplishing what it had been unable to do by the power of reasoning. The doctor and I had narrowly escaped shooting each other.

We still had hopes, however. We both had considerable hunting experience. Both had been ready to fire when we had actually pressed our triggers. Both had fired at point-blank range. The tiger must be lying mortally wounded close by, perhaps it was even dead. One of us must have wounded it at least. In the excitement, we overlooked the fact that I had heard the slugs from Stanley's gun, while he had heard my bullet.

So we searched far and wide, but not a speck of blood did we come across. Of dead or wounded tiger there was neither sight nor sound! Then it dawned upon us. Hard though it was to admit, the truth stuck out a mile. We had both missed, although the Ogre had met us almost face to face. Stanley looked woebegone. I do not know what I looked like; but I know what I felt like!

We made our way in silence back to the huts, where to the man and the two women still hiding there we confided all that had happened. We were half a furlong from Tagarthy before my mind, numbed with disappointment, started to function again.

Normally a tiger, after being fired upon, avoids the place where that had happened for a long time. This tiger, it should be remembered, had been fired upon not once, but twice! Therefore, by all the rules, it should leave the neighbourhood and not appear there again. But was there just a small chance to the contrary? The Ogre had already shown itself to be of a most unusual disposition on two occasions. It fled and then turned and crept back again. And it had deliberately followed Stanley when the way was clear to return to its kill. Would it once again display its singular nature by returning to a place where, at least instinct must tell it, it had suffered two narrow escapes? The chances were 99 per cent against. That left a one per cent chance that the tiger might return!

I halted in my tracks as the thought came to me. The doctor stopped also, wondering what was the matter. I told him. Stanley frowned and puckered his forehead in thought. Then he shook his head. But he was too much of a hunter himself not to realize the chance was one that could not, must not, be missed. So we retraced our steps to the huts.

The man and the two women, now all locked together in one of the huts for mutual safety, were surprised at our early return. When we told them why we had come, they were really pleased. But they were honest enough to say they did not think we had any chance of success. It was the man's opinion that the tiger would be many miles away by now.

Stanley and I retraced our steps to the place where the remains of the man-eater's victim lay strewn about, exercising extreme caution while negotiating the patch of jungle through which the doctor, the tiger and I had played our strange game of hide-and-seek. There was neither sight nor sound of our quarry.

A strange mixture of relief and disappointment filled us, relief that the Ogre had not launched another attack and disappointment at the feeling that it might never return.

My earlier survey of the possibilities of concealment, although made in such a hurry, had about summed up the chances accurately. Apart from the four-foot-high bush where I had stood while the doctor retreated there was no other place in which to conceal myself. Hiding behind that bush in daylight for a man-eater, as I had done already, was one thing; but remaining there after darkness was quite another. The tiger, with its ability to see at night, would spot me immediately as it approached what was left of its victim from any angle other than directly opposite the bush behind which I would be hiding, while for me to see it would be impossible. Further, should it indeed return in spite of being shot at twice only a few hours earlier, the man-eater would undoubtedly make an extremely cautious approach and I would not be able to hear it. Lastly, there was no possibility of erecting any sort of shelter behind that scanty bush that would not immediately betray my presence.

What could I do? I was reluctant to forgo that tiny possibility of the man-eater's return. To commit suicide, and that too in a most painful manner in the jaws of the tiger, I was still more reluctant.

There seemed no solution as we thought about the matter without speaking, till suddenly the doctor had a brainwave. Would it not be possible, with the help of the man and the two women in the near-by huts, to dig a narrow hole just where the human remains were scattered? He would hide in the hole which would be wide and deep enough to conceal him, wait until the tiger returned, and shoot it at point-black range.

Several obstacles to the execution of this plan presented themselves. Firstly, the tiger might discover the hole and shy away; worse still, the tiger might decide to investigate it. Secondly, admitting that the man-in-the-hole was hidden from the tiger, the tiger was equally hidden from the man-in-the-hole, who would necessarily have to stand erect to be able to shoot the beast, during which process the latter would surely spot him when he appeared, as it would seem, out of the very ground. When that happened, the tiger would be frightened, yes; but it would also be decidedly annoyed. What transpired after that would depend upon which of the aforementioned reflexes gained the upper hand.

Well, there was no use thinking further about it. The chance, and the risk would have to be taken or the whole plan dropped. Time was passing and it was now after 3 p.m. We would have to work fast. We hurried back to the huts, where the inmates gladly volunteered to help us, but stated they had no implements of any sort to dig with. The doctor, who in his capacity of village medico wielded much influence, solved this by returning to Tagarthy at the double, from whence he came back in an incredibly short time with six helpers, two with pickaxes, two with crowbars, and two with large baskets in which to remove all traces of the earth we dug out. With the three earlier helpers and ourselves, the eleven of us set to work, with the result that astonishingly soon the hole had been dug and all traces of loose earth removed and thrown far away.

I knew that as the father of the plan, Stanley had prepared the hole to sit in it himself. I also knew that no amount of persuasion would dissuade him. If I tried to tell him that his shotgun was not an effective weapon against so dangerous a quarry, he would reply that it was just the right thing at such close range. Nor would I be able to gainsay the truth of his assertions as, in reality, at point-blank range a .12 bore gun has its merits. So I resigned myself to inactivity for once by spending the night at Tagarthy.

Our helpers were just gathering their tools together, prior to departing with me, when Dame Fortune once again took a hand in this strange adventure. Two men burst upon us, having run all the way from Tagarthy in search of the doctor. One was the village patel, quite a young man for such a responsible post; the other was his servant. The patel annouced that his wife, who was heavily pregnant, had slipped and fallen while carrying her pot of water from the well. She had aborted and was bleeding profusely. The doctor must come at once.

While he was still speaking, the young man summed up , the position and realized that Stanley was preparing to sit up for the tiger. So to make his summons more forceful, he started lamenting aloud that the doctor, as his best friend, must come to his aid at once to save his wife's life, while in the same breath he denounced the woman as a stubborn wench. How often had he told her not to carry weights, particularly the water pot from the well. Was he not the village patel ? Did he not have servants enough for this task? Yet in her wilfulness she would never listen to him. Now this was the result. And never mind the tiger; was his wife's life not far more important?

Stanley looked at me, chagrin written large upon his face. Then he gripped my arm tightly, affectionately.

'Good luck, Andy,' he muttered, 'and be careful, please. Would you like to use my gun?'

'Thanks, doc,' I replied, 'you know how it is. Old Winny will do the trick.'

In another minute Stanley and the other members of the group, which had grown to twelve, were lost to sight. I was alone with the remains of the dead man.

Dusk was fast approaching and there was not a moment to be lost as I slipped into the hole we had prepared, to squat at the bottom and look upwards at a circle of sky above my head. By canting my Winchester, loaded and cocked, at an angle with the butt against my right thigh and the foresight-guard leaning against the wall of the hold opposite me, we had made sure, by means of measuring Stanley's .12 bore gun in just a position, that the end of the muzzle would not be visible above ground level.

In the excitement and hurry of forming and executing what I now began to realize was a rather insane plan, we had overlooked the fact that it would be terribly hot inside the hole. The earth around had been exposed to the sun's rays all day, no air could enter, and with my body in close proximity to the sides of the cavity, air could not circulate anywhere. I soon began to perspire profusely.

Fortunately in those days there were no wild elephants around Tagarthy or, for that matter, in any of the districts to the northwest of Mysore state. Those were the times when tigers roamed in hundreds, but things have now changed and carnivora are scarce, but 'jumbo' in his wild state has extended his wanderings into those jungles and herds of elephants have now made their home there, where once there were none.

I remember that it was almost deathly silent inside the hole and I could scarcely hear the roosting calls of peafowl, junglecocks and other birds as they settled down for the night. To hope to hear the man-eater's arrival by any faint sound that it might make was out of the question. I would only be able to hear it if it roared or snarled nearby, and the Ogre was hardly likely to do that—or so at least I thought till I recollected that the tiger had in fact done just that only a few hours earlier. How I hoped it would repeat its performance rather than decide upon a silent approach!

It was almost dark when the circle of sky above my head was crossed by an elongated black form that passed silently by. A nightjar, with wings outstretched, had flown low over the spot, evidently to investigate the possibility of devouring the insects that were already assembling to feed upon the exposed flesh that hung in shreds from the human bones and devoured portions of the carcase of the tiger's unfortunate victim. I could hear the bluebottles as they buzzed across the opening above my head to settle on the mess, while the stench of decaying flesh, increased by the sun's rays in which it had been baking all day, seemed to cling to the ground and flow into the hole as an invisible, nauseating liquid.

Would the tiger come? Would it start eating right away? Or would it know that something unusual was afoot? It might have been watching us from the cover of some distant bush. It might even know, at that very moment, that one of its hated foes, a man, had gone into hiding somewhere in the ground. Now would be an excellent opportunity for the tiger to unearth and devour that enemy. The thought was not a very bracing one!

Where there had been an oval of sky above, two stars now twinkled down upon me and I knew that night had fallen. They seemed so serene and peaceful up there, oblivious to my predicament down in the hole. My thoughts focused upon them and I wondered at what other tragedies, taking place at that moment in other remote corners of the earth, they also twinkled upon so impartially.

The next moment the two stars seemed to become endowed with a baleful significance. They turned into two cruel eyes that glowered down upon me in hostile anticipation. Of what?

I forced myself to cast off this depressing idea and to think of something else. It is amazing what strange and often irrelevant thoughts come to one when in danger, as I was then. Perhaps this is nature's way of providing protection from panic. I wondered if Stanley would be able to save the life of the patel's wife.

That was when I first heard the sound: faint but distinctly heavy breathing.

It must be the tiger! It had located me and was creeping upon its stomach to get close enough to pull me out of my hiding place. Involuntarily, my hand reached towards the rifle. The touch of metal and wood, warm like everything else in that wretched pit, was very comforting to my nerves.

The sound ceased for a while. Then I heard a sudden, loud hiss, followed by silence again. Could this be a passing panther?

I have already mentioned that panthers were scarce in this area as the tigers had driven them out simply by devouring them. Nevertheless, there were one or two to be found here and there, and it was possible that an odd member had happened to be passing and had stumbled upon the exposed kill, creeping forward to snatch a mouthful. The heavy breathing and the hissing sound could certainly have been made by a panther, bent upon stealing from the tiger's kill.

I did not hear anything more for quite a long time. Then came a dull, scraping sound, as of something gliding over the ground above my head. Could a large snake be the cause? A hamadryad? There were quite a number of them to be found in these forests, where the vegetation and jungles were of the 'wet' variety, unlike the forests farther south.

Silence followed, while I strained my ears to pick up the faintest of sounds, and my eyes stared upwards at the faint light of the hole above me till they ached. The two stars still twinkled down upon me, but whether in disdain or mockery I did not know. I saw that they had shifted farther towards the edge of the circle above me and would soon disappear from view, indicating that time had passed since I had first observed them. I would miss their company and then would really be alone. Would their place be taken by other stars, I wondered?

This thought was still in my mind when at last the heavy silence was broken. There was a loud crack and the man-eater began to gnaw the bone it had just broken.

The noise made by a feeding tiger indicates its mood. Generally it is one of great contentment, and the sounds of mastication, gnawing, chewing and the tearing and rending of flesh follow one another as the feast progresses. Should there be a second tiger present, or the killer be a tigress with cubs, there is a lot of growling and wrangling, accompanied by threatening snarls when the other tiger, or a cub, approaches too closely. For despite the ties of mother love, which are considerable—and instances have been known where a tigress has sacrificed her life for her cubs—when it comes to eating, instinct seems to tell a feasting tigress that food is something not to be shared too soon, and to urge her to eat her fill before allowing her companion, mate or even her cubs to approach and eat what may be left.

The tiger above me began to growl. I knew then that it could not be alone. Perhaps there were cubs, perhaps another tiger, accompanying the man-eater. The situation was decidedly complicated and more than what I had bargained for. None of us had considered this possibility earlier in the evening, when this sitting-in-the-hole idea had occurred to Stanley.

I thought hard what to do next. Obviously, in order to take a shot at the tiger, I would have to locate it first by peeping over the edge of the hole and then by drawing the rifle right out of the hole and placing it on the ground outside so as to take aim. All this would entail considerable movement; I might even make a sound of some sort; the rifle might knock against the ground. The feeding animal would hear me and attack before I could free my weapon. There might be a slight hope of escaping the tiger's attention should he, or she, happen luckily to be facing the other way.

But there was a second tiger present. Even cubs could give the game away if they saw my head and shoulders, followed by my rifle, emerging from the ground. It was certainly straining imagination and luck too far to hope that all the animals above me would have their backs to me and be looking in the wrong direction. And if there should be two tigers above me, which of them was the man-eater? A silly question, that: obviously the one that was eating. But had both developed the man-eating habit, or only one? I must not kill the wrong tiger. Therefore, I must shoot both to take no chances.

The alternative course of action was to sit in silence in the hole, allow the animals to finish their meal and afterwards go about their business, then call it a day. But I had come here to shoot the man-eater; not to hide from it. I thought of the man it had killed and was now eating. What would Stanley and the villagers say of me when they came in the morning to find the ground covered with tiger pug-marks, the scraps of the man otherwise completely devoured, and me hiding in the hole?

Well, here goes, I said to myself, and a millimetre at a time, if such slow movement can in truth be possible, I began to position my feet so as to support me. Then slowly, very, very slowly, I started to raise myself, to bring my head to ground level. This in itself, took a long time, for I had to avoid making the slightest sound, and my thighs and legs were cramped from squatting so long on my haunches. The tiger continued feeding, growling and snarling now and again to keep the other tiger, or perhaps the cubs, away.

At last I was on my knees and toes and I stretched my two hands downwards to help support my weight on my outstretched fingers. Then very slowly, I began to raise myself.

Time had passed, and the strain on my hands and legs began to tell. But I must not hurry. Even now, as my ears came closer to the surface above, the tiger's growls grew stronger. I began to be frightened.

My hands were beginning to tremble with the sustained strain of supporting my weight, when I sensed that the top of my head must have reached about ground level. I could not delay longer, for the tiger or tigers would be able to see me should they be looking in my direction, whilst I would not be able to see them. I therefore quickly raised my head, until my eyes were level with the earth.

A terrifying sight confronted me. Luckily, through sitting in the darkness of the hole for so long, my eyes had grown accustomed to the gloom, so that I could see, only a few feet away, and lying broadside on, the enormous form of a tiger extended on its belly, chewing some part of the victim which it was holding between its front paws. Worse still, there was another form, also at full stretch, slightly farther away from me and a few feet from the feasting tiger, but facing it, and watching anxiously as the latter swallowed mouthful after mouthful. This second tiger, facing the first, was also facing me, and could not fail to see the top of my head popping out of the earth.

It let a snarl of surprise and scrambled to its feet. I ducked into my hole like a jack-in-the-box, grabbed my rifle, and looked upwards, expecting to find one or both tigers attacking the opening. I was wondering whether to sit tight, or to raise myself and the rifle quickly to ground level and risk a shot, but I remembered there were two tigers, not one outside. So I funked it and decided to sit tight.

All this occupied only a few seconds, but in that time the feasting tiger had not been idle. Hearing its companion snarl, and seeing it spring to its feet, this animal, not knowing that the sight of me was the cause of the excitement, concluded that its companion had decided to fight for a share of the kill. There was a second loud roar, followed by a fearful din, as the feaster, who was obviously the man-eater, attacked the tiger that had spotted me.

Now is my chance, I said to myself, for their attention was so distracted that they would not notice me.

I quickly raised myself. First the rifle, then head and shoulders, reached ground level. For a moment I could see nothing and do nothing because of the dust that was raised by the fighting animals. But neither tiger was anyway in sight, nor was there any growling or snarling to be heard.

I could not understand it. Perhaps the second tiger had fled with the first in pursuit. But if that was so, I should have heard some sounds at least, snarls and growls as one animal chased the other away. Perhaps they saw the rifle, or even the top of my head emerging from the hole, and fled at such an unexpected apparition. Then, too, there should have been growling and snarling; at least some sounds of departure.

As it was, the jungle was silent. I could not fathom it; it was eerie. The thought then occured to me that, if the man-eater had chased its companion away, it would undoubtedly return to finish what was left of the kill. So I ducked back into the hole to await its return and the renewed sounds of eating.

I waited in vain. Maybe half an hour had passed when I heard a loud, sustained human scream. It shattered the silence, rose to a crescendo, and then faded into choking sobs and was still. Then I heard other yells and shouts, and could make out a deeper voice and a more shrill one. These were the voices of the man and one of the two women from the two huts not far away. They were screaming for help.

That was when I grasped what had happened. The second woman had been taken by the man-eater! In chasing its companion away from the feast, or perhaps in its headlong flight after seeing my rifle and myself appear out of the ground, the man-eater must have passed the two huts where the man and his wife, and the widow of the late victim, were sheltering. But how did the Ogre get its second victim? Perhaps it was in such a towering rage that it just dragged her out of the hut in which she was sleeping. This tiger certainly was not hungry enough to justify such an action as it had been feasting all this while.

I wondered what to do. Should I remain where I was, or hasten to the huts? In either event, there was not much that I could do. There was little chance that the man-eater would return to the bones of its first victim when it had a fresh one at its disposal. And I would not be able to follow it up with the second kill, because of the darkness. That could be done only after daybreak.

I decided to remain where I was. It was just possible that the second tiger—the one that had been chased away—might return to the scant remains lying above me. If it did so, I would shoot; even if it were not the Ogre itself, this second tiger would undoubtedly become a man-eater in time. I remembered how, a short while ago, it lay anxiously waiting for a chance to eat the human remains, though held at bay by the feasting man-eater.

I spent a sleepless night after that, uncomfortably hot and stung by tiny ants and other insects that had decided to share my shelter. Nothing came, and no sound disturbed the silence till about four o'clock. Then a hyena discovered the bones above me and a great commotion began. The hyena smelt the tigers and knew it was about to commit the unpardonable crime of robbery. It also knew that to be caught by the owner or owners would mean death. It was undecided, therefore, between satisfying its hunger and its fear of being killed, and in this state of indecision made a great noise, letting the whole jungle know that it was faced with a tremendous dilemma. I could hear the creature running rapidly round and round, uttering weird sounds of every conceivable dilemma. 'Chee-ah! Chee-ay! Chee-ay!' it chattered, then growled like faraway thunder. 'Goodoo-Goodoo-Grooo!' Then it decided to be mournful about the whole business: 'Mee-ay! Mee-ay! Mee-ay!' it pleaded piteously, like a cat begging for food.

But the problem remained unsolved: the tiger did not show itself, but might come at any moment, and that would be the hyena's last if it lingered. All this amused me and served to distract my thoughts from the fearful tragedy that must have been enacted so close to me while I was powerless to intervene.

The opening above me grew a little brighter with the coming of the false dawn before the hyena, who had remained noisily persistent all this time, finally summoned up enough courage to start eating. I heard the crunch of a few bones for a short while, then fear must have returned to its craven heart, for I heard the pattering sound of its departure. I could picture the poor beast slinking quickly away, a human bone between its jaws, for gnawing later in the safety of its shelter among the rocks, or in a hole in the ground, far from this place of danger and lurking death.

I awaited the advent of the true dawn before raising the Winchester and myself very cautiously above ground level. The coast was clear and I dragged my cramped legs out of that awful hole, stamped about for a few minutes to restore the circulation, and set off for the huts to see what had happened. There I came upon a dreadful sight.

The terrified man and his wife, still hiding in a corner of one of the huts, told me a very harrowing tale. Along with the widow of the man-eater's victim, they had decided to sleep in one of the huts, the one they felt was the more secure of the two. The man had taken good care to sleep in the centre of the floor, equidistant from all the walls while his wife had slept to the left of him. The second woman had been forced to sleep somewhere by herself. So she had laid down a little distance away. Naturally she must have felt a little nervous, but as modesty forbade her to lie down to the right of the man, she had been compelled to sleep as far away as possible from the couple. So she lay down near the wall of the hut and opposite their feet.

The hut was comparatively small. It was roughly a square, about twelve feet by twelve. Allowing six feet for the man and his wife who were sleeping in the centre of the hut, and another three feet in order to be clear of their legs, the second woman was, therefore, lying at the most not more that a yard from the wall. The foot of the walls of such huts, in the damper parts of India, are kept a few inches from the ground so that termites cannot climb them overnight and destroy a large part of the structure by daylight. This practice leaves a slight opening around all four sides at ground level.

The man-eater who had passed very close to the hut, either in pursuit of its companion or in flight from me, was probably in great rage. It must have caught a glimpse of the sleeping woman, or sensed her presence, through this small opening, and had decided to drag her out. It had inserted one of its paws under the opening, grabbed the woman and had begun to pull her out.

Her screams and wails, which I had heard, had awakened her two companions, who in turn had started to yell and call for help. Meanwhile the man-eater had succeeded in dragging the woman's head and neck outside the hut, and had killed her by tearing out her gullet. But the rest of her body was stuck inside, for in dying, the woman clung to two of the bamboos supporting the wall of the hut. These had broken, and the end of one of them, piercing her saree and jacket, had gone right into the flesh of her side, thus wedging her body against the bamboo wall.

The pandemonium caused by her wails, and the shouts of her companions, seemed to have acted as a deterrent; the tiger changed its mind and abandoned the victim. The carcase of the woman as it lay before me was a dreadful sight. The tiger's claws had pierced the chest and torn one breast to ribbons. Then the Ogre had bitten right through her gullet and had wrenched out her windpipe, leaving the bones of her neck and the skin behind to keep her head from being totally severed. She lay in a pool of her own blood most of which had soaked into the dry earth, except for some that coagulated here and there.

The two survivors, man and wife, crouched wide-eyed and paralysed with fear in a far corner of the hut, expecting the man-eater to return at any moment. In fact, they were so terrified as to be oblivious of the fact that it was already daylight outside. Hearing my approaching footsteps, and thinking they heard the tiger returning they started to gibber in fear.

I called aloud to reassure them. The man and the woman then hurled themselves at the door of the hut, opened it, and rushed outside, to fall on the ground trembling and crying in terror and relief at the same time. They were quite hysterical and took a long while to calm down enough to tell their story.

I had entered the hut and was reviewing the dreadful sight inside when Stanley and some of the men who had helped us the previous evening arrived upon the scene. Stanley had been awake all night but had not heard any report from my rifle, the sound of which would have carried to Tagarthy village. He therefore concluded that the tiger had not returned—or that I had been killed—and was hurrying to find out what had happened.

I fear my first question took the good doctor aback: 'How is the Patel's wife?'

He looked rather pained at my irrelevance, then muttered, 'She's safe. But what has happened?' I told the story. Our plans were soon laid.

We bundled the two survivors and their belongings out of the hut, an action that did not require much persuasion, and advised them to return, with the rest of our party, to the village. Stanley would hide in the other hut, while I would conceal myself in the one with the corpse of the slain woman. Ordinarily, the man-eater might be expected to return to its kill, but as there was a second tiger which was potentially a man-eater, if not already one, the doctor would be available to deal with it.

We laid our plans carefully. To begin with, neither of us would fire in the direction where the other was hiding. Secondly, should Stanley see one of the tigers, or both of them first, he was to hold his fire till the actual man-eater approached the carcase of its victim in order to give me the chance of a shot at the real culprit. As soon as I had fired, the doctor was to shoot the second tiger if it was still within sight. These precautions were necessary to avoid a mistake at the last moment for should the doctor fire first, he might shoot the wrong tiger and the man-eater would escape. We had to account for the Ogre primarily, although for reasons I have already given the second tiger had to be shot too. But the man-eater must die first and we could not risk its escape.

As I was tired after a sleepless night, while Stanley was less so, even though he had spent a good part of the night attending to the patel's wife, it was agreed that I should go back to Tagarthy for a meal and some sleep, returning by three o'clock, bringing the doctor's lunch and some food for both of us to eat later on besides drinking water, tea and the torch that Stanley fitted to the barrels of his shotgun. It was wise that one of us should remain on guard, just in case either of the tigers took the unusual step of returning to the kill by day.

Another idea then occurred to me. I told Stanley and he agreed to it. We took a gunny sack from one of the huts and walked down to the remains of the earlier kill. My plan was to remove all that was left of it, so that should either of the tigers, or both of them, think of revisiting the old spot, they would find nothing. That would urge them to come to the huts, where we would be in hiding.

A slight hitch arose when we asked our men to do this job. Being of high caste, they recoiled with horror and flatly refused. There was nothing but for Stanley and myself to do the job ourselves. Stanley did not mind, for he was a doctor, but it was an unpleasant undertaking for me. What little remained of the meat was two days old and stank abominably. Further, bluebottles had laid their eggs in the remains, and in the hot sun maggots had already hatched in myriads. The flesh was covered with a seething mass of them.

We gathered all the bits and pieces and put them into the sack. Since none of our followers would touch it, I had the unhappy task of conveying this nasty burden on my shoulder all the way to the village. It was surprising how heavy those bits and pieces turned out to be, although they represented so very little of their owner.

I smelled dreadfully and was in a bath of perspiration; some sticky fluid had oozed through the sacking from the putrefying flesh and bones within. It was on my hands, shoulders and neck when I dumped my grisly burden at the entrance to the local police chowki. The constable on sentry gazed at me goggle-eyed. For once in his life he was too taken aback to ask for a statement. I remembered about the statement well enough, but did not care to remind him. Why should I? There was going to be a hell of a row in any case, when the sub-inspector and other busybodies from headquarters arrived at Tagarthy. Whey had we removed the remains from the scene of the tragedy? How were the police to know the man had been killed by a tiger? He might have been murdered? Perhaps he had committed suicide? Time enough to answer these questions later. What I wanted was a bath, tea and plenty of it, a hot meal and some sleep.

I hastened to the little quarters occupied by the doctor, which he had invited me to share with him, and yelled to his servant-boy to prepare a gallon of tea. Then I divested myself of my stinking clothes and washed my shirt. Next I had a bath, and what a bath!

Emerging at least two pounds lighter in weight, I set about the tea and had consumed maybe two quarts when the doctor's servant seriously suggested I leave some room for lunch. But there was no lunch left when I stood up from the table. I observed the servant had conceived a new respect for me as a glutton of great capacity.

I told the boy to put the doctor's lunch aside and to make dinner for both of us, saying that I would take the three meals with me to the two huts at three o'clock. In sadness, the youngster shook his head and replied aggrievedly that there was no lunch left. I had eaten it all. So I gave him money to make some lunch; also the two dinners. And I told him to awaken me at 2.30 sharp.

When he awakened me it was nearly three o'clock, but as the meals were ready and packed, together with two flasks of tea and two canteens of water, I had only to pick up the doctor's torch and place it in a large bag with the food and flasks, sling the canteens and my rifle over my shoulders, and set out for the huts.

Walking fast, I soon arrived to find a very hungry doctor who had no news of the tigers. He swallowed his lunch while we reviewed our plans in whispers and drank some water. The flasks of tea we decided to keep for the night.

At four o'clock we separated; I went to the neighbouring hut where the woman's body lay, taking my rifle, torch, dinner and a flask of tea with half a canteen of water, leaving Stanley in the other hut with his share of the tea, water and food. Taking up my position at the farther end, as far away as possible from the spot where the corpse was lying half in and half out of the little structure, I made myself comfortable in preparation for the long vigil of fourteen hours till dawn.

I have cultivated the habit of sitting cross-legged for hours on end, practically motionless and without sound, a habit essential if ever you have to sit up for game. The slightest movement, or the faintest sound, will betray your presence to any wild creature, animal or bird. If your quarry is an animal possessed of a keen sense of smell, the direction in which the prevailing breeze happens to be blowing has also to be taken into account, and the stronger the breeze, the farther your scent is carried. For this reason, poachers of deer in India seldom go out on a windy night. Falling rain prevents scent being carried far, but equally so all animals, except tigers, take shelter from the elements, and if the rain is really bad, even tigers and elephants restrict their movements.

Now, as tigers have only a very poor sense of smell, that factor did not trouble me. What I had to be careful about was that the man-eater should not discover my presence by sight or sound. After the adventure of the previous night, and the scare it had received, we could expect both tigers to be very cautious. It is remarkable how instinct enables a man-eater to differentiate between a possible victim, helpless and defenceless, and a would-be hunter capable of taking its life.

Having been sheltered from the sun, the corpse was not smelling yet, and it was otherwise pleasant inside the hut, offering a great relief from the conditions of the previous night, in the hot and tight-fitting hole. Everything about me was quiet, for, in fear of the man-eater, the herdsmen of Tagarthy and the neighbouring villages for miles around had abandoned their usual habit of driving their herds out to the jungles to graze.

The afternoon passed in silence except for the buzzing of flies that had discovered the dead body and were busy laying their eggs in the raw flesh. The darkness of evening was accentuated within the hut and it soon became difficult to see, although I could perceive the lingering daylight outside, visible right around me through the few inches of space between the base of the walls of the hut and the floor.

Because of the scarcity of panthers and the larger species of wild cats, jungle fowl, which are the normal prey of these animals, swarmed in this area and their calls, together with those of spur-fowl and peafowl, told me the sun was about to set. Silently, I munched the food I had brought with me for dinner, and drank some tea.

In due course the cries of the birds died away, to be replaced by the calls of a nearby herd of spotted deer and the belling of a more distant sambar stag. This told me the sun had set, although by now it was already quite dark inside the hut where I was sitting.

Soon the nightjars began their teasing cries and a night-heron wailed in the little stream at the bottom of the valley. Then I knew that night had fallen indeed, and I could now see nothing in the interior of that hut. If the man-eater came and started to remove the cadaver of the woman, I would be compelled to use my torch.

This raised a problem. When I used the torch, its beam would necessarily strike against the inside of the wall of the hut and be reflected back into my eyes. I would not be able to see beyond, or to look through the gap between the wall and the floor. In other words, the man-eater would not be visible to me. The thought began to trouble me and I decided to change my position. I would lie prone on the floor, as close as possible to that part of the woman's body which remained inside. This would give me a great advantage. By keeping my rifle extended on the ground before me, all I would need to do, when the tiger came, would be to point the barrel in the animal's direction and press the trigger. The man-eater could not avoid making some noise when it began to pull the woman's carcase out of the hut, for, as you will remember, in the struggle of the previous night the end of one of the bamboos of the hut-wall had become embedded in her flesh. The tiger would have to tear the body free from this obstruction.

Gathering the flask of tea and my weapon, I crept quietly across the floor till I reached the woman's body, and then lay down beside it, the rifle on the ground before me with the butt under my armpit and the end of the barrel only a few inches from the opening. Accidentally my shoulder touched something that was cold and hard and very stiff. It was the corpse's leg and I drew a few inches away.

Three hours passed with no sign of any tiger. It was well after ten o'clock. Tigers generally return to their kills around eight; panthers very much earlier, and I was beginning to think our quarries had decided to keep clear of the huts when the leg which had touched my shoulder three hours ago touched it again.

What was far worse, that cold stiff leg was now moving very distincly. It was not only rubbing against my shoulder now, but moving gently forwards.

Not a sound could I hear. But the leg moved again! The hair at the back of my neck stood on end. Panic seized me. I was on the verge of scrambling to my hands and knees and getting as far away as possible from that awful, mangled human thing that had come to life. Then reason returned. I could feel myself trembling and the perspiration was pouring down my face as I discovered the solution. The leg and its owner had not come back to life, nor did it move of its own volition. The man-eater was moving it!

I could see nothing. There was no sense in sticking the barrel of my rifle forward and firing blindly; that would only scare the tiger away, to continue its depredations elsewhere. At the most I might wound it. I had first to make certain what I was firing at.

Then it was that I heard a faint scratching sound, coming from somewhere very close to me and a little to my right. I could still see nothing. I was tempted to switch on my torch, but remembered in time that to do so might result in dazzling myself. Yet it was imperative that I should find out where the scratching sound came from and what was causing it.

I did an extremely stupid thing. Not being able to see, I thought I might be able to feel what was going on, and with this in mind, I stretched my right arm very slowly forwards in the direction of the scratching.

I did not have far to reach. My questing fingertips contacted something hairy, something sinewy, and the next instant all hell was let loose. The man-eater, perhaps remembering its difficulty of the night before to free the body of its victim, or maybe in an endeavour to secure a better grip on the corpse, had extended its paw into the gap below the wall and was groping for a hold on something solid. That movement of its paw was the cause of the scratching sound I had heard a moment before. When my fingertips touched its skin, not having heard of ghosts, the tiger knew there was something alive inside the hut.

An ordinary tiger would have bolted. But the Ogre who was no ordinary tiger and had always done the unexpected, lost its temper. It let out a terrific roar, then grasped the wall of the hut in its jaws and began to tear it apart.

My task after that was easy. A great hole appeared before me and the beam of my torch revealed a horrifying tiger with the matting of the wall still stuffed in its mouth. With only a few inches to find its target, the bullet of my .405 entered high into the throat; then I rolled over and over with my rifle to get out of range of what I knew would follow. I was near the far end of the hut when the Ogre hurled itself through the gap. But I had time to put two more shots straight into its head. With the dying animal threshing about the floor, I rushed to the door of the hut, flung it open and leaped out, only to be confronted by yet another terrifying spectacle.

Another tiger was there, about twenty feet away and to one end of the farther hut! But it was lying on the ground, stretched on its side and still twitching. Stanley had killed the second tiger, almost at point-blank range, with lethal balls fired simultaneously from both barrels of his shotgun. Because of the noise made by my own rifle, and because of my own excitement, I had entirely failed to hear Stanley's shots.

The doctor related afterwards that he heard the man-eater's roar, followed by the report of my first shot. Then the sounds of the hut-wall being demolished. Disregarding our agreement, he had dashed out to my aid, to be confronted by the sight of the second tiger, standing broadside on to him , a few yards away, watching its mate and obviously undecided what to do. He had fired both barrels of his shotgun, loaded with lethal balls, into the animal's heart, killing it instantly.

As we suspected, the man-eater turned out to be a tigress, the other animal her mate.

There was much tom-tomming and rejoicing at Tagarthy until dawn, and when the news reached Bellundur next day old Buddiah strutted about, filled with pride. Was he not the greatest of all magicians? Had not his mantras brought about the doom of the man-eater and also of her mate? Buddiah was happy indeed. With his fame as a necromancer soaring once again, he could look forward to many feasts of cock curry and many more bottles of that fire arrack for which the villagers of Bellundur were famed. He was dead drunk by midday, when I called to thank him.

The Aristocrat of Amligola

The title of this story will lead you to expect that the creature I am going to tell you about had nobility and fearfulness, and that he came from a place named Amligola, but you might not guess that the story really concerns a very large tiger that had other characteristics which I am sure you will agree were far from noble. Very few of you will have heard of Amligola, for it is situated in the remoter jungles of the district of Shimoga in Mysore state, and was only a hamlet at the time of my story.

People called him 'Gowndnorai' in the Kanarese tongue, being a term approximately equivalent to 'aristocrat,' and he earned his title by his unexpected behaviour at the time he first appeared in the thick forests surrounding the hamlet. It was rumoured that he came from the jungles of Tagarthy, a place renowned for tigers and only eight miles away; while others said he had strayed from the Karadibetta Tiger Sanctuary, which he had deserted in disgust because his kindred in the sanctuary were numerous and the quest for food had become more competitive.

The 'Gowndnorai,' apparently, did not like this sort of thing. It was bad enough to have to hobnob with the proletariat of the tiger species, but when it came to having one's quarry snatched from under one's nose, as frequently happened, by younger and fleeter tigers, or the whole hunt thwarted and the prey driven away by a fledgeling tigress, he felt it was time to shift to more select jungles, where there were fewer of its species and more game for him to hunt.

There is a small hillock in the forest about two miles from Amligola which borders the track leading from this village to Tagarthy, and it came about that around five o'clock one evening, woodcutters returning home along this path were surprised to see a tiger sprawled on a rocky promontory of the hillock, basking in the rays of the sun that had still an hour to go before it would sink behind the tops of the towering teak trees to the west.

They quickened their footsteps. Everyone knew that these dense jungles were the homes of tigers, although such animals rarely showed themselves in broad daylight. The tiger they were now watching although fortunately from an appreciable distance, was an enormous brute and, to judge by his attitude of lazy indifference, seemed to care little about their presence. They were talking loudly and he could see and hear them, but he continued to lie on the warm rock as he turned his huge head in their direction with the mildest curiosity.

Thus the woodcutters judged it better to get home while the going was good and before darkness overtook them. Against such a monster they would have no chance whatever, once the sun sank and the brief jungle twilight merged into gloom.

Quite often thereafter, the graziers, woodcutters and forest guards saw this tiger of an evening, at about the same time, sunning himself on the same promontory and looking at them quite unconcernedly, as they moved through the jungle or followed the footpath that wound around the base of the hill on its way to Amligola.

None of them remembered having seen a tiger do this sort of thing before. Panthers had been seen quite often, on the same rock, on other rocks, sunning themselves of an evening; but never a tiger. The larger carnivores are too cunning and too shy to expose themselves in this way to an easy shot from a rifle.

Nobody fired at the basking tiger, for the very good reason that nobody in Amligola at that time possessed a rifle, while the range was too great for the ordinary muzzle-loading gun, a couple of which, unlicensed of course, were owned by local villagers.

For the first few months this seemingly inoffensive tiger had been content to confine his attentions to the spotted deer and other wild fauna of the forest. Then, as rarely happened in this area that was so close to the Western Ghats and received a heavy rainfall, the southwest monsoon failed one year and the jungle became dry. The grass withered, the fields lay fallow, and the wild creatures that fed on the grass and the grain were compelled to move away to regions where a little water was still to be found and some grass for their bellies. The herds of cattle that had hitherto fed along with the deer and had not been molested by the tiger so far now found themselves alone.

Nevertheless, this tiger was choosy about his meals. He left the herds and wandered into the village postmaster-cum-schoolteacher's field, where he started by killing the owner's large white bull that used to draw his cart all the nineteen miles to Sagar town once a week, on shandy (market) day. Not only did the tiger slay the huge bull with one slap of his paw and a twist of its neck, but he slung the quarry across his back and walked off with it in broad daylight, neatly leaping the six-foot-wide nullah that divided the field from the forest.

The field was at the back of the postmaster's house, and the owner was in the backyard, washing his clothes at his little well, and saw the whole thing happen. He shouted at the top of his voice, hoping to frighten the tiger into releasing its prey, although this would have done no good anyway because the white bull was already dead. But, far from being alarmed, the tiger was not even perturbed. He walked majestically at the same pace towards the nullah, the dead bull across his back, jumped the obstruction, and disappeared into the forest beyond.

The tiger killed again, and quite often after that, but strange to relate, on each occasion his prey was a lone, large bull or a fat, sleek cow. Never did he attack the herds, as other tigers and panthers had done before him, to choose and kill the first animal within reach.

This tiger spent a long time in reconnoitring and selecting his victim, and it always had to be the biggest animal he could find, proportionate to his own colossal size, revealed by the immense pug-marks he left on the fields and in the windblown sands of the pathways leading into the forest.

At that time I happened to visit Tagarthy, a favourite haunt of mine, where I came to hear about the Gowndnorai and his colossal size. As this animal was killing normal prey I had no intention of interfering with him, but repeated stories of his extraordinary size made me curious to catch a glimpse of him if I could.

So I set out on foot one dark night along the jungle track that led through dense forest to Amligola, the rifle across my back in case of emergency, a three-cell spotlight torch in my hand and a set of spare cells in my pocket.

I remember that night well. On the way, the beam reflected the green light of the eyes of spotted deer and sambar, bobbing up and down as they tried to avoid the torch-beam; the single, red eye of wild boar that refused to face the light but rushed away; the wide-set blue light from the eyes of a bull-bison that stared morosely as I passed; the red-white light of a panther's eyes as they sank behind a small shrub and then peeped at me from over the top; and the pinkish-blue eyes of a sloth-bear as it sat on its haunches to watch me as I padded past in my rubber shoes, not ten feet away.

I had entered the fields bordering Amligola when I met the Gowndnorai and immediately recognized him, although I had never set eyes upon him before. Two great blobs of light blazed white-red like brilliant stars suspended just above the tops of the grasses that were swaying gently to the night breezes as they blew down from the small hillock. It might have been a hundred yards away.

This tiger was, indeed, of colossal proportions.

The Gowndnorai gazed back at me unflinchingly as I stopped to watch him with the beam of my torch directed at him steadily. We returned stare for stare, and thus we remained for what might have been the better part of ten minutes. Then the tiger did a strange thing. With a low grunt, and eyes still blazing into the bright rays that confronted him, the Gowndnorai started to walk towards me.

No ordinary tiger would have done that; it would have bounded away. No wounded tiger, or even potential man-eater, would have done so either; it would have charged towards me, roaring in furious attack, or have melted away into the jungle, refusing a direct encounter.

The Gowndnorai did neither. He advanced upon me slowly, inexorably, determinedly, a guttural grunt issuing from his slightly opened mouth as he came, no signs of anger or of fear upon his striped visage.

One fact soon became evident. This strange animal, whatever his reason, was obviously quite determined to come right up to the torch and find out what it was all about.

I must confess his attitude rather unnerved me. I had no wish to shoot the beast, for he had done no harm to the human race. But what he might do when he came right up to my torch and found a man behind it was anybody's guess.

The tiger was now less than fifty yards away and still approaching, pace by pace, when these thoughts rushed through my mind and the reason for its strange behaviour dawned upon me. There were just four days until Christmas and this was the middle of the mating season. Without doubt the tiger was a male, and a tigress was sitting on her haunches somewhere near by, regarding the scene with admiration, as to her adoring eyes the Gowndorai displayed his prowess and contempt for danger.

Tigers can be very dangerous if encountered in the mating-season in company with their newly-found spouses. Their desire to flaunt themselves and their natural aversion to any intruder who disturbs their lovemaking, together with a fear that some harm might come to their mates, combine to turn them into creatures of destruction that will wipe out the intruder, man or beast.

Then came the disquieting thought that the tigress might even be creeping up behind me in the darkness, in support of her mate. I did not want to remove my torchbeam from the Gowndnorai's eyes, in case such action might precipitate a charge; at the same time the possibility of the close presence of the tigress behind me left no alternative.

Taking a chance, I whipped around, allowing the torch-beam to flash through the jungle in a quick semicircle to my right, and then behind. Sure enough, that was exactly where the tigress was. She was seated on her haunches, like a great big cat, directly behind me, awaiting the oncoming of her mate.

The reason for the tiger's strange behaviour was evident enough after that. He had been approaching the tigress when I had happened to move between them, and the mating urge had been too strong to deflect him from his purpose. I had no illusions about what he would do when he found me standing between him and his girlfriend. It was time to get the hell out of there!

This I proceeded to do forthwith, and with dispatch, by stepping sideways as rapidly and as silently as possible, while still keeping the torch-beam directed upon the tiger. The Gowndnorai halted abruptly and his grunt turned into a loud growl. What was worse, I could hear the tigress growling behind me. It seemed that a concerted attack was imminent.

With my left arm I unslung the loaded rifle, slipped the butt into my shoulder, and pressed the button of the other torch that was clamped to the barrel of the weapon, using my thumb for the purpose. The two beams shone together for a moment as I prepared to slip the three-cell torch into my trouser-pocket prior to placing my right forefinger upon the trigger.

Perhaps it was the two torches, shining together, that averted disaster. Maybe the Gowndnorai did not like the sight, and the potential danger revealed by the presence of a second light appearing so suddenly where a moment before, there had been only one. With a series of snarls he bounced obliquely forward in the general direction of his mate, and understanding the situation, I followed his movements with both torches still alight. As soon as he had reached her, the two animals turned to face me. Now two pairs of white-red eyes glared back at me resentfully.

Then I began to pace backwards in order to escape. Easier said than done, indeed. Have you ever tried to walk backwards, in pitch darkness along a twisting footpath, through heavy grass and jungle, with a rifle balanced awkwardly against your shoulder in your left hand, your thumb pressing against a torch switch, and another torch held in your right hand which is also helping to keep the rifle in place, while a pair of mating and naturally resentful tigers confront you?

I succeeded in the manoeuvre for a short distance and then, as the two tigers had shown no inclination to follow me, I whisked around in order to hurry along the footpath for a few seconds and afterwards whisked back again to see what the tigers were doing. They were in the same positions, obviously glad that I was departing.

Soon I reached Amligola and the hut of the headman, who was my friend, where I related my adventure. Ramiah, the headman, was a widower and invited me to spend the rest of the night with him. Perhaps in daylight I could study the tigers under better conditions, he suggested.

Along with numerous mugs of milk, and some rather stale vadais (small pungent cakes) that he offered me, Ramiah and I began to chat, but it was not long before loud roaring and growling from the forest told us that the tigers had begun their mating in right earnest. The din continued for quite a while. Then there was a period of silence, after which the noises started all over again. This sort of thing continued till we fell asleep.

Next morning I was in no hurry to investigate, for I knew that both would be resting after their strenuous mating-sessions and my appearance too early might precipitate a showdown. Besides, I was feeling inordinately sleepy after the rather restless night I had spent in Ramiah's hut.

It was nearly ten in the morning when I awoke and, after another bout with Ramiah's now tough vadais, followed by at least three cups of coffee which (rather than the tea that I would have much preferred) is the normal beverage of the Kanarese villager, I prepared to investigate the scene of the previous night's noisy mating. Ramiah excused himself from accompanying me on the plea of urgent field work, so I set out alone.

The spot whence the noises had come, when at last I located it, may be a little over a furlong away, revealed the energy that the two tigers had put into their lovemaking. Although fairly hard at this time of the year, the earth was scored and dug up in clods, the smaller shrubs having been ripped from the soil, roots and all, by the antics of the gambolling beasts.

From this place the ground dropped into a densely vegetated ravine, where scratchings upon the bark of a tree, along with freshly-shed dung which—unlike the panther—a tiger leaves exposed rather than covered with earth, indicate the way the lovers had entered the ravine. Curiosity prompted me to follow, although I knew that what I was doing was rash; so with rifle at the ready and eyes that endeavoured to see through and behind every bush, I advanced in silence, taking care my rubber-soled shoes did not tread upon any dry leaf or twig.

No sooner was I in the shadow of the large trees that grew in this hollow than the sweetish stench of death was borne to my nostrils and I knew I was approaching an animal that had been killed. A few yards farther, and I found it. The partial remains of a huge wild sow that had been slain by the Gowndnorai and upon which the two tigers had feasted hungrily, for tigers love pork. Although a sow, the pig had put up a fight, as could be seen by her hoof-marks in the ground.

I did not examine the sow very carefully, for you may be sure I was watching all around me against being surprised by one or the other of the terrifying lovers, and it was while I was doing this that I caught a glimpse of something white that showed through the leaves of a jungle-plum bush, perhaps thirty yards away. I approached this object, and it turned out to be the pelvis bone of a sambar doe also half-eaten by the tigers during their spree the night before. There was no means of knowing which of the two animals—the sow or the sambar— had been killed first, but it was clear that the latter had been slain some distance away and then brought to the spot by the Gowndnorai for the benefit of his mate, for no wild animal would have come anywhere near a spot where a kill had already been made.

The presence of the three crows, flying down from a branch to the earth and up again, betrayed a third kill slightly farther away. The fact that the crows were flying to the ground indicated that neither of the tigers was near. This kill turned out to be a spotted stag which the Gowndnorai had also brought to the ravine after killing it elsewhere. Little of the stag had been devoured, for by this time the tigers were too stuffed with food to do more than sample the meat.

But I had not finished yet with finding kills. In fact, I tripped over the carcase of another sambar doe that lay most halfway between the carcase of the spotted deer and the sow. There was little left of this sambar, most of it having been devoured by the tigers. I was almost certain now that this sambar, and not the sow, as I had thought, had been the first of the four victims. The sow had followed next, her hoof-marks on the ground showing she had fought before she had been killed. She ought not to have come near the dead sambar. Perhaps one of the tigers had chased her there. The other sambar and the spotted stag had been carried to the spot later, for nowhere had I seen any traces of dragmarks upon the ground, which made clear that the tiger had carried his victims, one at a time, across his back. If I needed further proof of his size, here it was indeed.

There is a strange satisfaction in reasoning out the facts of apparent jungle mystery, and I felt this as I reached my conclusion. The ravine was, in fact, a veritable charnel-house; the stench of death hung heavy in the air, and suddenly I grew afraid.

Something warned me that I was being watched. I took a quick pace to the rear to bring my back against a tree and so shield myself against attack from behind. Then I began to scan every bush and tree-trunk in the immediate vicinity.

Not a breath of air stirred in the forest that grew hotter with the passing hours, as the sun climbed higher into a cloudless sky, although I could not see it at that moment because of the trees. Not a whisper of sound broke the stillness; even the two cicadas that had been calling from trees higher up the banks of the ravine were now silent. The crows had seen me and watched the scene with mute expectation, heads cocked slightly to one side, beaks partly open and panting with the heat. It was as if the jungle lay in breathless suspense, awaiting the next act in the drama that was about to be played at any instant.

Out of the corner of my eye I saw a tuft of grass, frail and feathery, suddenly sway for an instant and then become still. It had no business to sway on that breathless forenoon, unless something had pressed against the stem near to the ground.

The something must be one of the tigers!

Most tigers—even a man-eater—will hesitate to attack if it feels that a man has discovered its presence. It prefers to have the element of surprise on its side. I knew this from my own experience, so I opened my eyes as wide as possible and stared hard at the spot where the grass had just moved. This would tell the tiger I had discovered where it was hiding.

For a moment I could see nothing. Then two black protuberances, tipped white behind, seemed to rise slowly from beyond the grass, and I knew that I was looking at a tiger's ears. An instant later, the animal raised its head a fraction higher and I was gazing into the baleful eyes, of one of the tigers. I knew it was the female. Her head was too small to belong to a male of her mate's size. That left the tiger to be contended with. He was probably in hiding at the moment, I knew not where, gathering courage for a sudden onslaught, if for no other reason than to prove to the tigress, who was watching closely, what a great brave creature he was.

Nothing happened while the tigress continued to peep at me over the top of the grass, and after a while I began to hope that she was alone. Maybe her mate had gone to look for a fifth victim!

It must have been ten minutes later when the tigress began to make a peculiar sort of noise. I might say she was mewing, but it was too guttural and hoarse a sound for that word to convey. She was summoning her mate. As she had not attacked me all this while, it was clear that the tigress, by herself, lacked the courage. What would happen when the tiger arrived would be quite another thing.

I decided that discretion was the better part of valour and I slipped behind the tree-trunk that I had stood against all this while. Then I started to back away.

The next moment a loud roar from the top of the ravine behind me told me I was too late. The Gowndnorai had arrived. Something in his mate's mewing calls seemed to warn him that all was not well. I could hear him crashing through the dead leaves and undergrowth now, coming directly towards me at the gallop.

I am far from being a good climber, but sheer funk lent me agility and I dragged myself up the tree with commendable speed, the rifle hanging on my shoulder. The first fork was hardly eight feet from the ground. I reached it and tried to climb higher, when the rifle slipped awkwardly from my shoulder down to the crook of my arm. I hitched it up again, and just as fast it slipped down once more.

The Gowndnorai arrived at the base of my tree and my movements made him look upwards and see me. I decided I must face him and bring the rifle from the crook of my arm to my shoulder. I expected him to make a bound at me at once, but strangely enough he did nothing of the kind. He crouched on the ground instead, looked up, and snarled and snarled and snarled.

Rather foolishly, as I think of it now, I changed my mind and decided to try to climb higher, but in any case I could not go very far. I managed another seven feet perhaps when I found I had gone as high as the thinning branches would permit. At this juncture, the tigress, confident of the protection offered by her mate, emerged and advanced towards him in gambolling leaps till the two of them were together barely fifteen feet below.

I hoped that neither of the tigers would try to follow me, as the bough to which I was precariosly clinging was too frail to support any additional weight, while by my own foolishness in ascending higher I had put myself in a nasty plight. I was obliged to cling to the branch with both my hands and knees, and this prevented any possibility of using my rifle, which I could not unsling, since I would fall from the tree if let go my hold. Moreover, the strain on the muscles of my hands and legs was tremendous, and I could not possibly maintain the position for long.

It occurred to me that I might try to shoo the tigers away by shouting aloud. The ruse would probably succeed; but again it might not. The sound of my voice might irritate the animals, particularly the tiger, who till now had behaved like a gentleman.

The two tigers settled the matter after a few minutes, as if by mutual consent, when they calmly walked away side by side. Allowing another five minutes to pass, I descended cautiously, but there was no sign of either animal even after I climbed the bank of the nullah and started walking to the village. I really owe the Gowndnorai and his mate a debt for sparing my life.

Shortly afterwards I was trudging back to Tagarthy, thinking I had heard—and seen—the last of the tiger. But as I was soon to discover, that thought was entirely wrong.

Hardly had I been a month in Bangalore when the headman of Amligola, with whom I had spent the night listening to the Gowndnorai and his mate, wrote me a postcard which he had tramped all the way to Tagarthy to post, informing me that the big tiger was growing overbold and begging me to come and shoot him. It was only a matter of time, he said, before the Gowndnorai would turn man-eater.

I oppose hunting tigers that have not molested man, and I was not going to accept the headman's fear of something that had not yet happened; the Gowndnorai might never become a man-eater and I had certainly no justification for shooting an animal that had spared my life on two occasions.

It happened that I had a few days to spare and could think of no more pleasant occupation than trying to see my benefactor, the huge tiger, once again. But things had changed by the time I reached Amligola, although it was only a matter of a few days since Ramiah had written. The big tiger had grown bolder indeed, killing more of the villagers' choice cattle. Ramiah had already lost his best bull, and now the Gowndnorai saw it fit to slay his second best.

This was too much for the already exhausted patience of the headman. Disdaining to wait for my arrival, Ramiah journeyed to the town of Kumsi, about twenty miles away, borrowed his cousin's .12 bore shotgun, and sat up to ambush the tiger when he next visited the outskirts of Amligola in search of prize cattle. Having succeeded so many times before, the Gowndnorai walked into the trap all unsuspectingly, to receive a charge of slugs full in his face from Ramiah's borrowed weapon. The tiger then dashed away roaring terribly as he went. So great was his anger, caused by the wound, that he entirely demolished a bamboo platform erected by the villagers on a field from which to drive away the birds that fed upon their grain, and which stood in the tiger's path as he rushed back to the forest.

All that day and night, and throughout the two nights that followed, Ramiah and his companions were forced to listen to the pain-racked roars of the wounded tiger as he voiced his woe and anger to the jungle at large, while they cowered within their huts.

Unaware of what had happened, as nobody told me anything at Tagarthy, I arrived late in the evening of the fifth day at Amligola, having walked through the jungle in blissful ignorance for eight miles without hearing or seeing a thing. We did not hear the tiger that night, but the morning of the sixth day brought the first result of Ramiah's ill-timed shot.

It was just after nine o'clock and I was about to set out on my return journey to Tagarthy, when a man staggered into Amligola and fell exhausted in the one lane that formed the main village street. He said that he and another man had started out from the village of Chordi, which was some miles away, just before dawn, and had been travelling to Amligola when, about two miles from their destination, they had seen a tiger following. Accustomed to tigers and not knowing that the Gowndnorai had been wounded, they were not unduly perturbed, but decided to keep a sharp lookout behind them as they walked.

For the next two or three hundred yards they saw nothing. Then they glimpsed the tiger, and this time he was not more than thirty yards behind them. Sensing that the animal was bent upon mischief, the two men had broken into a run, whereupon the tiger roared and charged them.

The man who had staggered into Amligola had escaped merely because he happened to be the faster runner. He told how the tiger had quickly caught up with his companion, who was racing just a yard or so behind. His friend's dying scream had compelled him to look back over his shoulder and the lucky woodcutter affirmed that the sight he had seen would remain in his memory for ever. The tiger's countenance had been dreadful to behold. It was badly mangled and a mass of blood. He did not think the animal had any eyes left: its ferocity vented upon the victim it had just seized, was truly awful. Not daring to look back any longer, the man had raced to Amligola for all he was worth, to reach its shelter utterly exhausted.

The wounded Gowndnorai had killed its first victim. To judge by what we had heard, Ramiah's slugs had blinded the unfortunate beast.

Without delay, I hurried to the place where the attack had been launched, Ramiah and the surviving woodcutter reluctantly accompanying me. The tiger must have been ravenously hungry; he had eaten the most of his victim on the spot. Then he must have heard us coming, for he had carried away what remained as he dashed into the undergrowth, perhaps only a matter of minutes before our arrival. We knew the tiger had eaten well, for his victim's head, hands and feet lay scattered about, a sure sign of a hearty meal.

The trail was fresh, but the undergrowth was extremely lush. Ramiah and the woodcutter were Kanarese and not of the stuff of jungle-men and trackers. They flatly refused to come any farther. So I followed by way of the broken weeds and the bent branches of his victim. It was difficult to watch ahead and both sides against a surprise attack while moving fast at the same time.

The Gowndnorai, for all his size, did not stop to fight it out. Probably his recent wound, and the pain he was suffering, made him reluctant to risk an encounter with another armed man. It is uncanny how a wild animal is able to sense the presence of a human being who may spell danger and distinguish him from one who is helpless, unarmed, or bears no hostile thoughts.

The trail led through the belt of thick forest into lighter scrub, where it was more difficult to proceed, and then down a steep decline where the tiger had finally jumped into a narrow ravine, more a watercourse than anything else. Here I had to go down on hands and knees and within a few yards it became too dense to go farther. In any event, pursuit was fruitless as I could never hope to overtake my quarry under such conditions.

Disappointed as I was, two facts were now established beyond any doubt. Firstly, the Gowndnorai had not been totally blinded by Ramiah's pellets. Therefore he remained a very real danger to the human race and would continue to be so till he completely recovered from his wounds and went back again to killing cattle and wild game. That was extremely unlikely to happen, however, as once a tiger has tasted human flesh and comes to realize how easy it is to kill a man, it rarely abandons the habit. In other words, here was a man-eater at the beginning of his dreadful career. Secondly, despite his enormous size, this tiger did not have a fighting heart, so he was likely to prove more cowardly, cunning, elusive and much more difficult to bring to book than most ordinary tigers, normally more daring and so liable to expose themselves.

How correct both my surmises were was revealed in a comparatively short time. My visit to Amligola could not be prolonged as I had to return to work to the aircraft plant in which I was employed at that time. So leaving instructions with Ramiah to keep me closely informed of events as they occurred, I returned to Bangalore the following morning.

It did not take long for Ramiah to write again. He related that the Gowndnorai had turned into a dangerous and elusive brute. No longer did he sun himself on the slopes of the small hillock, in full view of every passer-by. Now there was no sight of him, no sound to be heard. Only his huge, saucer-sized pug-marks betrayed his passing, and with each such visit some traveller, who had set out on a journey, failed to reach his destination.

Ramiah said that the tiger had taken to haunting the most lonely section of the footpath leading from Amligola to Tagarthy, from where he would snatch the last of a group of travellers. Apparently this had happened on three occasions, and now people shunned this track. They preferred to walk twenty-five miles by a circular route to Tagarthy.

Having covered the short cut many times myself, I knew exactly the spot to which Ramiah referred. It was a dip through a valley running between two low hills, where the vegetation consisted of tall bamboos and fairly heavy evergreen scrub that provided ideal cover in which a tiger could spring an ambush upon a group of passers-by.

I left for Tagarthy the next day, parked the car at the rest house of the forest department that stood in a beautifully wooded setting a mile away, and set out to cover the eight-mile footpath to Amligola, which would lead through what had become the valley of death, in which the Gowndnorai launched his attacks. It was exactly two in the afternoon when I started, and it was a cloudy, cool day. The conditions for a tiger to be early afoot were ideal.

I would have to progress slowly and carefully and timed my arrival at Amligola at about six o'clock or at most half an hour later, just as it was getting too dark to see. To stay out after that would force the use of my torch, and realizing I was dealing with a very shy and crafty animal, I felt he was less likely to show himself then, and would probably prefer to launch his ambush at a time when he thought the traveller was unprepared.

For the first mile or so, the pathway traverses beautiful park-like country, and here peacocks, which had just begun to grow their new plumage after dropping their tail-feathers subsequent to the mating season, grubbed under the bushes and flapped heavily skywards as I appeared around a corner.

Gradually the vegetation grew more dense, the trees higher and the undergrowth thicker. After the second mile, I could only see the track ahead and snatch a quick glance around at it behind me. To my left and right a wall of impenetrable green hid everything more than a yard away from sight.

The dangerous valley about which I have spoken, where the Gowndnorai had thrice launched his ambushes, still lay three miles ahead, beginning at about the fifth mile along the track I had come, with another three miles to my destination, Amligola.

The closer I approached this valley, the more dense became the vegetation. Actually, this sort of jungle is not favoured by tigers as a rule, who prefer the park-like country I had already come through. Bison, elephant, sambar and barking deer are at home here, the felines choosing the more open jungles where their main prey, such as spotted deer, wild pig, and of course village cattle, graze on the plentiful grass that grows there. It was another indication of the Gowndnorai's craftiness that had induced him to change from the habit of his species to haunt a place affording him the maximum cover for his ambushes.

At last I tipped down the foot of the hill, the base of which marks the start of the valley of death. It is three-quarters of a mile, or perhaps seven furlongs, to the point where the path starts climbing the next hill, and dense bamboos with lush undergrowth press heavily upon the narrow trail on both sides.

I halted for a moment to pick up a handful of sand, which I raised to shoulder level and then allowed to trickle slowly from my fingertips. There was little breeze, but what there was carried the sand earthwards slightly to my left. The wind was therefore blowing from right to left, and the tiger, if he attacked, would almost certainly do so from the left-hand side of the track and not from the right. My deduction was based upon a fundamental law of the jungle.

Felines prey upon deer and such creatures as have a keen sense of smell. To do so upwind would render their stalk abortive, for the currents of air would betray their presence and their quarry would escape. Carnivores have therefore learned by instinct always to approach downwind, that is against the wind, so that their own scent will not give them away before they can attack.

Unlike deer, the human being has practically no sense of smell so far as self-preservation is concerned, and the average person would not be able to scent a tiger or a panther, even in hiding a yard away, whatever the direction of the wind. But the feline does not know this and so applies the same rules to stalking a man as it would to stalking any other jungle creature. For this reason, I was almost sure that the Gowndnorai, if he came for me, would attack from the left; and being the coward that he was, ten chances to one from behind me.

Having established all this by reasoning, I began to walk silently forwards along the track, alert for anything that might happen.

The first quarter-mile or so was fraught with apprehension. Every little while I glanced backwards to see if I was being followed. Once, as I looked back, I was in time to see a bush I had just passed sway violently, then come to rest.

I swung around. I knew that I could not see beneath the bush; it was far too thick. But I could watch the top of it. A tiger cannot spring out of the middle of a bush, it has to creep forwards to break clear of its branches before he makes its leap, and when it creeps the tops of the bushes will shake. If you keep watching the tops of the branches you will be able to see them move, then you will know it is coming.

Sure enough the top of one of the branches very near the edge of the pathway shook slightly as something brushed against its base. This is it, I said to myself, and raised the .405 to my shoulder.

A moment later the branch vibrated more noticeably and out walked a wild boar into full view. Seeing me suddenly, it swerved head-on, the bristles on its neck rising like spines, head bent low with tusks aimed at me, small red eyes looking upward angrily.

I felt like laughing, but sighed with relief. The fact of the boar appearing from my left indicated that the tiger was not in the immediate vicinity.

Noticing that I stood motionless and made no move towards him, the boar decided that I must be harmless after all, although something to be regarded with grave suspicion. With head still bent at an angle to keep me in view and charge if necessary, the pig crossed the track to plunge into the thickets on the right with a loud brushing of the leaves. The next instant it was gone.

This time I really sighed. I went on again, relief making me a trifle less cautious perhaps, and was soon within reach of the end of the valley. I saw nothing in front of me; I looked back, but nothing was there. I looked in front again, when something urged me to turn around.

And there was the Gowndnorai, or rather his head, emerging from a wall of green to my left that I had just passed. Not a sound had he made. My rifle came to my shoulder and I squinted down the barrel.

But the tiger was no longer there to aim at. Instinct and his inherent cowardliness warned him that here was no defenceless passer-by. He vanished as silently as he came.

Confidence made me bold and I stepped forward to catch a glimpse of him, if possible. A low growl, and then the rustle of leaves several yards away in the undergrowth, told me that the big tiger would not stay to fight. He was running away.

I arrived at Amligola shortly before dark to recount my adventure to an astonished Ramiah.

I did not know quite what to do the next day. Ramiah said it was useless to tie out cattle as bait, for the Gowndnorai would not look at them. In any case, there were very few cattle in Amligola, and none of their owners would sell for this purpose. I would have to wait to walk back to Tagarthy the following morning if I wanted to buy a bait.

That afternoon the Gowndnorai broke his own rule. Perhaps he was over-hungry. Maybe he thought the valley was too dangerous for him to haunt for a while, with me in it. So he killed a man in the park-like jungle I have told you about, a mile or so from the Tagarthy forest rest house where I had left my car. The victim's three companions came hurriedly through the valley to bring me the news. They knew it was safe enough to traverse while the tiger was engaged in eating this kill. It was nearly three in the afternoon when they arrived and I had seven miles to cover to reach the site of the incident. We found what was left of the man a little after four-thirty.

The Gowndnorai had attacked his victim in the expected fashion from behind a bush, out of the centre of which grew a wild-cashew tree, killed him and carried him back to the same bush, behind which he had set to work and eaten more than half the body. The three men who had been walking in front of the victim had practically run the rest of the way to Amligola.

The wild-cashew tree growing on the spot was a very lucky factor. Its many branches and large leaves made the construction of a machan a quick and easy matter. Although I made a bet with myself that the Gowndnorai would never show up, because he was far too cunning for one thing, while the noise the men made in building the machan, in spite of all their efforts to work silently, must have been heard by him where he lay, probably not very far away, there was always the slimmest chance that he might appear. By six o'clock I was in the machan, quite a snug affair considering the short time in which it had been made, and the three men hurried back the mile to Tagarthy which they had covered that morning in the company of the unfortunate man now lying mangled behind the bush.

This was the Indian spring and it soon began to grow dark. Within another hour the remains of the corpse on the ground beneath me was hidden from sight. There was no moonlight and I was relying upon the torch, clamped to the barrel of my rifle, to light the scene if the tiger returned.

All was silent for nearly an hour except for the calls of a few night-birds and the flapping of the large fruit bats around the tree. I glanced at the luminous dial of my watch. It was eight o'clock, the time when tigers generally return to their kills!

Almost punctually to the hour, a group of spotted deer began to call in alarm from the park-like jungle to the east. Their cries were dying away when an animal moved in the bush directly below me. The Gowndnorai had come. In another moment he could start to eat and then would be my chance.

This was precisely the moment when I heard a tiger growl, but it was at least a hundred yards or more away; certainly not below me. So the Gowndnorai had a companion!

This fact raised complications. Was this the man-eater after all? I remembered his cowardliness. Maybe another tiger was the true man-eater. Or perhaps both had the habit!

My thoughts were interrupted when the animal below me snarled; then dashed off at top speed. After that I heard neither of the tigers and thought they both had gone when, a few minutes before nine o'clock, a twig snapped and this was followed by the crunching of bones. One of the tigers had returned. So I slowly raised the rifle to my shoulder in preparation for a shot.

An instant later pandemonium broke out. A series of shattering roars came from the darkness a short distance behind me, a coughing snarl issued from directly below, and this was followed by the sound of a large body frantically clawing its way up the trunk of the tree upon which I was sitting. At about the same instant a second body crashed against the tree, which shook under the impact, and started tearing at the trunk.

The tree swayed as if struck by a hurricane and I felt I would be hurled out of the machan. Roars, growls and snarls from below my very feet threw me into panic. Hastily pointing the rifle-barrel downwards, I pressed the torch-button. The light cut through the night and fell upon a panther, only two feet below. But it was gazing downwards.

I moved the barrel slightly, and now, I looked into the blazing eyes of the Gowndnorai, who would never have had the courage to attack the tree on which I was hiding had not the panther, stealing from the kill, thought fit to take refuge in it. Neither animal knew the tree was already occupied by me.

The first was an easy shot—between the eyes. The Gowndnorai fell backwards as his roars came to an end. So was the second. The panther looked up in startled amazement to provide another easy shot, also between the eyes. I could not afford to spare him, though I would have liked to do so. He had been eating from a human kill and might turn into a man-eater himself.

The Gowndnorai was perhaps the largest tiger I have ever shot; and surely the most cowardly.

Four

The Assassin of Diguvametta

If you were to travel in a southeasterly direction by metre- gauge railway from Guntakal junction in the state of Andhra Pradesh, you would pass the large town of Nandyal and shortly afterwards enter a delightful stretch of hilly country, heavily forested and intersected by numerous streams. Over these you would rattle, halting briefly at the jungle stations of Basavapuram and Chelama, and traversing two tunnels, one short and one extremely long. Finally you would cross a verdant valley by a picturesque high viaduct, with tree-tops far below. In a few miles you would probably observe a large stone water-column at the right-hand side of the line, always overflowing, next to which stands the 'outer' signal that heralds the advent of Diguvametta railway station, where the hills and the jungle end and the cultivated plains begin again.

The 'assassin's' operations extended from this station as far as the very long tunnel in the valley crossed by the long viaduct, but it was particularly active in the vicinity of the dripping water-column and the 'outer' signal beside it.

I have always had a sneaking fondness for the forests between Chelama and Diguvametta, not because they are particularly well stocked with game or carnivora, but for the utter peace and solitude of the area, and the friendly disposition of the wild Chenchu tribesmen who inhabit the extensive jungles in this section of the Eastern Ghats. I have found that even the ordinary villager of Andhra Pradesh is, on the whole, much more friendly than his counterpart in Mysore state, where I live, while the folk in Madras state reveal a disposition between the two.

Also, the nature of the vegetation here is quite different from that growing farther south, and while no elephants or bison occur, this area represents the southernmost limit where the nilgai or blue-bull, a large animal of the antelope species, looking like a sambar deer, is to be found.

So to Diguvametta I travelled by train one day, passing through the long tunnel and over the long bridge, both of which always held for me a childish fascination, skirting the signal and dripping water-column, to alight at Diguvametta with my small bedroll, campkit, and rifle. A couple of urchins grabbed the bedroll and campkit, and with my rifle slung over my shoulder, we began walking up the road that ran parallel to the railway track in the direction from which the train had just come.

It was perhaps half a mile to the forest bungalow, a wonderfully cosy structure for so old a building; a plantation of teak seedlings lay to the south of it, the jungle lay east and north, while to the west was the road leading to the railway station, and after that again the railway-line, as I have just said. The signal and water-column stood a bare half-furlong away. My old friend, Aleem Khan the caretaker of the forest bungalow, welcomed me at the gate with his expansive smile, at the same time shouting to the urchins to get a move-on with my samaans.

The bungalow had two suites of rooms, and as usual Aleem was good enough to put me into the better one, the one that faced the road and the railway. It was better because the bathroom attached to this suite was fitted with a shower, while that on the other side had none.

Aleem was a Muslim and had only two wives, while so many of his co-religionists had four, the maximum allowed to a Mohammedan legally. He had told me once before that he felt that two were just enough. Without further ado he summoned these two women and set them to operate the hand-pump together. This contrivance drew water from a large well and fed it to a zinc water-tank situated on the roof of my bathroom. For half an hour, while I unpacked and then drank tea, hastily prepared for me by the caretaker, I could hear the clank-clank-clank of the hand-pump, and the chatter of the two wives as they argued with each other and then started to quarrel, each accusing the other of shirking her bit of the pumping. The dispute was brought to an end by the sound of water pouring off the bathroom roof. The tank had been filled to capacity!

Then came the much anticipated pleasure of a shower bath, or rather a series of shower baths, one after the other, the cool water trickling over my body in fine jets. Outside the temperature was well over 100° F as the sun shone down with the merciless intensity usual to Andhra, but inside that bathroom it was so cool, so damp, so heavenly. I smiled maliciously to think I was so callously wasting the precious liquid those two women had worked so hard to pump for me.

Refreshed, and stretched at length in an armchair on the veranda, I drew placidly on my pipe and drank mug after mug of tea. A goods train clanked past heavily, an engine at either end, the one in the front blasting clouds of black smoke from its funnel and tugging for all it was worth, while the one at the back came along unconcernedly, as if there was nothing to bother about at all.

Aleem Khan squatted on his heels on the ground at the side of my armchair, telling me some of his family troubles. His only sister had lost her husband, a forest guard who had died suddenly of tuberculosis, leaving his wife and two children unprovided for. They had immediately come to Aleem for shelter and the problem was now a major one. Aleem's first wife had three children, the second had two; and now his sister with her two children and himself made a total of four adults and seven children to be fed on his meagre salary.

Could I do something about it? Aleem confided that, in spite of her two children, his sister was still a comely lass, good to look upon, with a fine figure, amiable disposition, and all the attributes required to make a very desirable wife. In a moment of temptation, I closed my eyes and let my thoughts run wild. What fun it would be for me to announce my conversion to Mohammedanism! I could then marry Aleem's sister and take two more wives into the bargain. With the one back in Bangalore, this would make the fully permissible four.

Then the expense side of the question hit me a sharp blow, and the troubles that would follow as a consequence hit me a sharper one. I opened my eyes in horror to think of what a predicament I was in, and then smiled when I remembered it was all in the realm of speculation.

Hastily I told Aleem I would inquire in Bangalore for a suitable candidate, and then, equally hastily, changed the topic. Were there any tigers or panthers about?

A tiger had been poached just ten days ago he confided, by some government official in a jeep, using a spotlight, on the forest department's fire-line two hundred yards from the rest house. This fire-line, I must tell you, extended from west to east. It began at the road to the northwest of the bungalow and a furlong away, and went on in an easterly direction to another road two miles distant that traversed the forest and connected Diguvametta to a hamlet named Gondacheruvu, some forty miles away.

Aleem also mentioned that there was a panther about, and this animal was beginning to prove troublesome. Its pug-marks could be seen early in the morning around the rest house, and it had taken his dog three weeks earlier from the place where it had been sleeping on the back veranda. He added that his sister had not only brought her two children but her dog as well, and this the panther had attacked immediately outside the door of the outhouse that Aleem had allowed his sister to occupy. But this animal, unusually big for a village cur, had also a big heart. He had turned on the panther with such ferocity that the latter had fled precipitately with the cur in hot pursuit. Both Aleem and his sister had witnessed the scene in the bright moonlight.

Nevertheless, the caretaker said he was not happy about matters and felt the panther would summon up enough courage to return and would eventually get the dog. But what really troubled him was the presence of the seven children, two of whom were mere toddlers. Should the panther become sufficiently bold—or hungry—he might be tempted to run off with one of them.

Many people have asked me why I do not leave India and go to England, Australia or even Canada. I have tried to answer that question, but I do not think I have convinced anybody. This thought returned to me as I lay in the armchair that afternoon at Diguvametta. Where in England, Australia or Canada, where anywhere else in the world, except perhaps Africa or South America, would I find the conditions of India? A journey by train or road of a few hours separated my home in Bangalore from the cold climate to be found on any of the several mountain ranges that lay within two hundred miles, or from the swelteringly hot weather of the plains that lay even closer; from the dense forests to the west, with their very heavy rainfall, and the extremely arid, semi-desert areas to the east; from the teeming millions of one of the cities and the utter solitude of a jungle within fifty miles of home; from the varied languages and dialects of the towns and the almost incoherent vocabularies of the forest tribes; from the safety and comfort of home and the ever-present hazards of death from a sudden sickness, snakebite or some wild animal. Where in the world would time be of so little, if any consequence, as in India? Where in the world would consequences themselves be of so little importance? It matters not how you dress, or whether you dress at all! The bare requirements of existence are all that do matter. Everything else is thrown in along with that, sometimes in good measure and sometimes scarcely at all; but really it does not make much difference either way and there is never any hurry about anything. There is a time to be born and a time to die and each event is as inevitable as the other. Moreover, death follows life and life follows death, so it really does not matter where you start and where you end, as it all works out to the same thing.

My friends cannot understand when I tell them that these things are the reasons why I love India, why I do not think I shall ever leave it.

My reverie was broken by trouble in the form of the forest range officer, who arrived on a bicycle to inform Aleem Khan that word had just been received that the district forest officer (D.F.O.) was passing through Diguvametta and would spend the next night at the rest house. Did I have written permission to occupy the bungalow?

I had to reply in the negative, and the range officer looked aghast. I had committed the unpardonable crime of trespass. I was occupying a government building without permission. He swallowed hard and then told me I would have to get out forthwith.

Here was the same difficulty that I had experienced in so many forest bungalows in so many jungles. This is why I have purchased so many parcels of land in so many areas, in order to be able to camp in peace without being troubled by authority, that ever-present bogy that has stalked the length and breadth of the country from time immemorial, that stalked it during the days of the British Raj and that dominates it even more since Independence.

I flattered the range officer and in no time he was eating out of my hand. Certainly, sir, he agreed, these senior officers coming on tour were a damned nuisance. Why (and being the gentleman that he knew I was, he could tell me in confidence), they did not work at all when they came. It was he and his subordinates who were the workers. These visits were only a pretext for collecting batta, the colloquial name for a travelling allowance, when they were hard up. Witness the fact that these 'tours' invariably took place during the last week of a month. Certainly, I could remain for the night in the bungalow, but I must promise faithfully to go before noon the following day or he would be in grave trouble should the D.F.O. find me occupying the bungalow without permission.

I promised, and then inquired if there was a vacant room anywhere in the village. The range officer did not think so.

At this stage in the conversation I mentioned that I had suffered similarly in so many other areas that I had begun purchasing small plots of land in nearly every jungle I visited and had at that moment over twenty camp sites of my own. He brightened at this idea. He had a friend, he said, in the revenue department, who owned many acres of land just beyond the railway station. Upon his recommendation, the ranger was sure this friend, whose name was Ranga Reddy, would be glad to present me with a small plot of land all my own, big enough to pitch a tent upon, as a gift and free of all charges.

Within the hour we were at this friend's place. There we drank coffee and were forced to consume two dosais [1] each. Then Ranga Reddy took us to his land, which was a quarter of a mile beyond the railway station and to the east of the line, and invited me to select any spot I fancied, anywhere I wished and to the extent required.

The field was good agricultural land, consisting of rich black soil, and we had to go to the far corner to find a vacant bit, lying fallow and with earth that was not quite so rich as the rest of the field. After all, I required only a camping site and did not want to deprive my new friend of anything of value. A stream flowed a short distance away, while the main road bordered the plot on one side. An ideal camping-site! Ten cents of land would be ample for my requirements.

I told the owner of my choice. He answered with an expansive smile that I could certainly have the land. He would take me in his jeep the following day to the town of Giddalur, twelve miles away, where the formal registration of my ownership would have to be made.

I asked the price. Free, of course, he replied. This would never do, I answered. Besides, it would not constitute a legal purchase; he must accept some price. With hesitation, Mr Reddy said 'Five rupees,' and I said,' 'No, take fifty.'

He recoiled in horror. 'Take fifty rupees from a friend for such a useless plot of land!' Eventually we agreed to thirty rupees, which is less than two pounds in English currency.

The next morning we were at the registrar's office at Giddalur when it opened for business. Half an hour later I was the proud owner of my own camp site of ten cents of land at Diguvametta!

However, I have anticipated events a little by telling you about the purchase of the site. I should have related, in proper sequence of events, what happened on the night after I had returned to the rest house from a short stroll along the fire-line where the tiger had been shot so recently. This fire-line traversed a deep nullah that formed the bed of a running stream where the flow of water, now that the dry season prevailed, was not more than a yard wide. Implanted in the mud on both sides were the pug-marks of a medium-sized panther. This animal, like all its kind, had been loath to walk in the water, and so it had jumped across.

I wondered if it could be the animal Aleem had told me about. The tracks led towards the forest lodge and had probably been made the previous night. Then I stooped to examine them more closely and changed my mind. The dark-green layer of surface fungus that borders old watercourses and streams in some places grew to the water's edge on both banks, and it had been pressed down by the weight of the panther both on the side from which the animal had jumped and, considerably more deeply, upon the bank where it had landed. The fact that the dark green fungus was still pressed down on both sides was very significant. Why had it not returned to the upright position of the fungus elsewhere? It would have done so had the panther made its leap the previous night, as I had first thought. There could be only one conclusion: the facts clearly showed that the panther had crossed not more than an hour or two earlier.

It was now after six in the evening, so the animal must have passed this way between four and five, long before sunset. In this case it would be in the vicinity of the bungalow right now, unless it had gone on to cross the railway track in the direction of the water-tank. I turned back from my walk, wondering if I would hear it calling during the night.

I had just sat down to an early dinner of cold roast beef that I had brought from home when it happened. The time was exactly 7.45 p.m.; I remember this because I had just wound my watch, a habit I follow as I sit down to dinner. Aleem's sister's dog had made itself friendly and was sitting on its haunches by my chair, gazing soulfully at me in anticipation of receiving scraps from my plate. I gave it a piece of dried chuppatty.

Most dogs would have gulped the morsel and looked for more, but this creature, in common with all village curs, decided to take the mouthful outside and enjoy it in solitude. It ran out on to the veranda, and then I heard a low snarl, followed by a loud yelp from the dog.

My rifle was in the bedroom that led off from the central dining-room, and there was no time to get it. Realizing that the panther had struck and that if I wanted to save the dog I would have to act fast, I rushed on to the veranda where I was just in time to see in the moonlight a spotted form leap down from the raised plinth on which the veranda stood, with the dog in its jaws, still alive and struggling.

Shouting loudly to frighten the attacker, I hurled the first missile that came to hand at the slouching form, one of the hard wooden chairs with which all government buildings are furnished. The departing leopard was only fifteen feet away when the chair descended squarely upon it, but the panther did not let the poor dog go. On the contrary it began to bound away with the dog still held firmly.

I rushed back into the bedroom for my rifle, hastily loaded it, and followed in the direction taken by the panther. Bright moonlight lit the compound, and so I had not waited to attach my torch-equipment to the weapon. That would have taken time, and not a second was to be wasted if I were to try to save the dog.

It was quite a different matter, however, when I reached the jungle that flanked the bungalow's grounds. Darkness, cast by the foliage of the trees, enveloped me, relieved here and there by shafts of moonlight. I soon realized that to crash about in the underbrush and darkness would only serve to frighten the panther and make it carry the victim farther away. In any case, it was too late for me to save the dog's life. So I sat down in the shadows at the foot of a tree, annoyed with myself for not having fixed my torch to the rifle. It would have taken time to do so, but at least I would have been able to see.

The panther, realizing I had stopped chasing it, must have thought I had gone away, for within ten minutes it began to eat. Nor was it very far away, for I could hear its low growl now and then, alternating with the sound of tearing flesh and the crack of a bone. I was undecided whether to try to creep up to the beast or go back to the bungalow for my torch, and as so often happens when one is undecided, I chose to do the wrong thing.

Rising to my feet slowly, and treading cautiously in the darkness for fear of making any sound, I tiptoed towards the noises that reached me now and then, adopting the old hunter's practice of only moving while the sounds lasted, and stopping as soon as they ceased. For when an animal you are trying to stalk is eating or making a noise of any kind there is less chance of his being able to hear the sounds that you might make, however slight they may be, in your approach, but it would be much more likely to hear you if it were silent.

I came quite near the panther that night. I do not think it could have been more than five yards away when luck, that had helped me so far, decided to put a spoke in the wheel. Incidentally, it sealed the fate of three innocent people. A bear, pig or pangolin had dug a hole in the ground. In the darkness I did not see it and put my left foot right into that hole, bringing me down with a jerk. I stumbled forward, and the panther knew I was there. With a coughing snarl he was away, and I heard him bounding through the bushes.

Extricating myself, I went on till I found the body of the dog which the panther had started to feed upon. I could make out its form as a light blur against the darkness of the ground. When I returned to the rest house, Aleem and his family had come out, searching for the dog and wondering where I had gone.

I fixed my torch on to the barrel of the .405 then, and returned with the caretaker. Only a fourth of the dog had been eaten. Aleem carried the remains back to the bungalow, where he said he would bury them in the morning, while I decided to try to search for the panther.

It was easier now to wander in the jungle with the help of my torch, and I scoured the area right around the building within the radius of a furlong for over two hours. No sign of the panther did I see, while the presence of a small sounder of pigs showed that the spotted cat had moved away from this area completely. On the other side of the road and bordering the railway track close to the signal, a few spotted deer and a solitary nilgai cow grazed in peace, suddenly shattered by a shrill whistle of an engine and the heavy rumble of a goods train.

The panther had gone. There was considerable weeping on the part of the women and children when what was left of the dog was buried the next morning. A little later, as agreed, I moved out of the rest house, stopping at the ranger's quarters to borrow an old tent that he had promised to lend me.

Within two hours the tent had been pitched and a camp made on my new site. Two mud-pots, purchased in the marketplace and stored in a corner of the tent, served for drinking and washing water. Two fireplaces, built with stones and placed outside the tent, were ample for my needs, one for brewing tea and the other for cooking food. The earth was my bed; the stream not far away was my source of water, both for drinking and bathing; a small lantern was my illumination at night. What more did I need? Free to come and go as and when I liked! At least, as far as Diguvametta was concerned, I was henceforth rid of officials and government rules and regulations for evermore. Happy was I and very contented.

There was just one thing that could go wrong. If it happened to rain, the black-cotton soil would be churned into a sticky quagmire. I had not brought a campcot as I had intended to stay at the forest bungalow. So I would, literally, be in a mess.

Early that afternoon, after I had returned from Giddalur, a jeep came tearing down the road, and as it flashed past my tent I read 'Andhra forest department' in large white lettering on boards both behind and in front. The dark face of the occupant next to the driver stared at me hard. The district forest officer had arrived!

Later in the evening I called at the rest house on a courtesy visit. As much as I dislike government officials, one has to keep in touch with them in India if one wants to move about freely.

The D.F.O. was a young man, practically new to the service, and had been recruited directly to the department after passing through college, followed by training and a departmental examination at one of the provincial centres. Very soon I discovered that he knew nothing whatever about the jungle fauna and that he harboured the usual vague ideas regarding the terrible ferocity of tigers and panthers.

Aleem had told him what had happened to the dog the previous night without disclosing my part in the story or, most important of all, the fact that I had been occupying the bungalow.

So the D.F.O. in his turn now related to me a highly embellished account of the incident, including how the panther had leapt upon Aleem's breast and carried away the dog that had been sleeping there, to all of which I listened with an innocent, not to say surprised, expression. Apparently it did not occur to him that people ordinarily do not sleep with great hefty dogs upon their chests.

However, the upshot was that the D.F.O. invited me to shoot the panther. He inquired where I was staying and was markedly surprised to hear I was the owner of ten tents and was camping on my own site. Very generously, he suggested I should occupy the other half of the bungalow and enjoy its comforts.

Hanging my head in shame, I reminded him that I did not have 'official permission to occupy the Government forest lodge,' and slyly added that the rules of his department were very strict on this point. Permission could only be granted by the conservator of forests or by the collector of the district.

My new friend was offended. Was not he the D.F.O.? Was his permission not good enough? To hell with the conservator and the collector! 'You come along to the bungalow right away,' he said; 'we'll have dinner together tonight.'

So I came back where I started, but now as a guest, having left rather in the fashion of a vagabond. Moreover, but this I am sure was pure luck, I was installed once more in the western or shower-bath side of the building. And it was fortunate, indeed, that I returned to the shelter of the bungalow just in time, for that night we had a heavy downpour. Next morning, my campsite was a sea of black mud.

The D.F.O. made Aleem bring a dog from the village, at Aleem's own suggestion and much against my desire, and instructed the caretaker to chain it to a teak-sapling that grew about ten yards behind the building. He was keen that I should bag the marauder. I dislike using dogs as bait. They are far too sensitive and suffer an agony of apprehension when chained up, as they appear to realize the danger they are in.

The D.F.O. had no firearm, but sat with me on another chair inside the dining-room. By keeping the door half-open we could see every detail outside in the clear moonlight, while the panther might not be able to see us in the darkness of the dining-room.

You may be sure that I kept a sharp lookout, for I did not want the dog to be killed. The cur, on its part, realizing the danger and feeling the discomfort of the chill air, began to yelp and whine loudly. The panther, if it happened to be anywhere within half a mile or even more at this moment, would certainly hear it.

The D.F.O. began to doze shortly after 11 p.m., and retired to his bed before midnight. Soon after two o'clock in the morning, with the moon behind the trees, long shadows began to fall and hide the dog, which had resigned itself to its fate. It had stopped yelping and was curled up fast asleep, and out of my sight. Should the panther attack now, I certainly would not be able to save the mongrel from being killed. Yet I hesitated till the moon disappeared behind the jungle to the west and it became pitch-dark. Then I got up from my chair, untied the dog, who wagged its tail joyously on seeing me, brought it indoors, and went to sleep myself.

After lunch the next day the D.F.O. departed on his return journey to Nandyal, while I left by the midnight train after giving my Bangalore address to Aleem, along with a couple of stamped postal covers which I always carry about with me for just such a purpose, instructing the caretaker to write to me should any unusual event occur. I had a hunch that I had not heard the last of that panther. But I forgot all about the affair before I even reached my journey's end.

It came as a surprise when Aleem's letter reached me about four months later, stating that a railway ganger had been killed by a wild animal midway between the long bridge and the water-column with the 'outer' signal close beside it. The letter said that no tracks could be found and that the ganger's body had been partly devoured. Then it went on to explain that there was a division of opinion as to what kind of beast had perpetrated the crime. Some said the killer was a tiger; others said it was a sloth bear. A few supersititious people blamed an evil spirit, but Aleem himself thought it was the panther. Would I come and shoot the creature, whatever it might turn out to be?

I answered, saying that as the killing was an old one and might be merely the odd result of a chance meeting with an irate bear, my visit to Diguvametta would be of no use just then; but I impressed upon him to write again should anything further transpire.

The next letter came about a month later. This reported that the ganger in charge of the water-column had made a practice of returning to the railway station by sunset. Invariably he and another ganger, whose duty it was to light the oil-lamp serving the 'outer' signal at precisely six o'clock every evening would meet at the foot of the signal and return together. This had been their regular habit ever since the two had become friends.

On the evening before that on which the letter was written, however, this meeting had failed to materialize. The second ganger had lighted the lamp on the signal, came down the iron ladder and found no signs of his friend from the water-tank, who should have been waiting for him there. Thinking the fellow must have fallen asleep, he called his name loudly, 'Ram! Ram!'

No answer had come, so the second ganger, apprehending no danger, had gone in search of his companion. He came upon the body at the base of the stone structure that supported the cast-iron tank of the water-column. Not much of it had been eaten: just a little from the chest. And although it was after six o'clock, there was still light enough for him to see in the sodden earth, saturated by the overflow from the water tank, a number of pug-marks, crossing and re-crossing each other. They had been made by a panther.

The ganger took to his heels and did not stop running till he had reached the station.

'Come at once,' Aleem's letter concluded urgently. 'A man-eating panther is amongst us!'

Unfortunately, I had urgent engagements that day, so I decided to leave early next morning, travelling by car so as to avoid delay and in order to carry the tent, stores and all the other kit that I would require for living on my camp site. I did not want to risk again the nuisance of being ousted from the bungalow in the midst of my operations. Moreover, when hunting a man-eater, particularly a panther, one cannot possibly conform to government rules that limits one's stay in a travellers' bungalow or a forest rest house to not more than three days.

I had just returned that evening, completed my packing and was about to have dinner, when I heard a bicycle bell outside. Then Thangavelu, my servant, came in with a telegram and the messenger's delivery book for my signature.

Hastily I signed and tore open the cover of the telegram to get one of the most unpleasant shocks I have ever received: 'Panther killed sister's child. Come immediately. Aleem.'

Before dawn I was on my way.

If you ever go to the forest rest house at Diguvametta, at the southeastern corner of the building and within twenty yards of it, you will come across a little grave under a stone slab. Inscribed on the stone is the one word: 'Mischief.'

The story goes that many years ago, in the days of the British Raj, a visiting British forest officer, or it may have been a collector, was occupying the bungalow along with his little dog whose name was 'Mischief.' A panther had suddenly pounced upon the latter and was carrying it away when the Englishman fired, killing both the panther and his own dog with the spreading shot from his gun. In sorrow, and in memory of his pet, this officer had buried it where it had been killed and had later returned, bringing an engraved tombstone to place over the spot.

Aleem told me the story of the latest tragedy as I was getting out of my car. His sister's elder child, who was a girl, had been told the story of 'Mischief and had formed the habit of placing a little bunch of jungle flowers early each morning on the grave. That morning, for some reason, she had forgotten to put the flowers she had gathered on the stone slab, but only remembered late in the evening when it was almost dark. Meanwhile, the little bunch of flowers had withered noticeably.

'Peearree,' which was the girl's name, had told her mother, Aleem's sister, about her omission and said she would put the flowers on the grave at once. Her mother had answered that it was growing dark and the man-eater would catch her. Besides, the flowers were already withered; she could put fresh flowers on the grave the next morning.

Without heeding, Peearree had grabbed the dying flowers and dashed out. She must have reached her destination, for the little bunch was found there. Nobody had heard a sound; neither a scream, nor a whimper, nor a growl. The child did not come back.

Alarmed, her mother had called out to her, but receiving no answer summoned Aleem and his two wives from the adjoining room. The caretaker snatched up a stick and the four of them, carrying a couple of lanterns, went to the small grave, where they found the flowers, but of the little girl herself, no trace. A few feet away lay a scattered heap of glass beads, and the string on which they had been threaded. And, of course, a little farther on, a few drops of blood!

Aleem and the three women had hurried to the village, to return considerably later with the ranger, a couple of forest guards, and quite a number of people armed with hatchets, sticks, knives and lanterns. Nobody had a gun.

They searched the undergrowth rather haphazardly that night without result, because everyone feared the panther. Next morning, they had looked again. This time they found the killer's pug-marks, and the marks left by the child's body where it had been hauled through the thicker bushes. They even found some tattered remnants of clothing. After that, all signs of man-eater and victim had vanished.

Aleem said I should stay in the rest house and not expose myself to risk from attack by the panther while in my tent. This I resolutely refused to do till he tempted me with an idea, as brave as it was dangerous. He offered to sit on Mischief's tombstone all night as bait, if I agreed to lie prone upon the veranda with my rifle, hidden behind a pillar. He said he would call softly, as soon as he felt the panther's presence. I could then switch on my torch, play the beam around, pick up the animal's eyes or form in the light and shoot it. There was no moon at this time, the nights were totally dark.

Aleem's was a magnificently brave, but an utterly absurd and foolish plan. As if he would ever feel the man-eater's presence in time to warn me before it attacked him! He would feel nothing till it was upon him, and then it would be too late. What was worse, I would not be able to fire, for if I did so, I would possibly hit him and not the panther. Even supposing Aleem sensed the panther coming and called to me, the man-eater would never show up.

'No!' I kept repeating, 'No, no, no!' But at the same time I was thinking that Aleem's scheme had possibilities and they gave me an idea: there was nothing to prevent me from dressing in Indian clothing and sitting on Mischief's grave! My usual attire might scare the man-eater away, as panthers are inordinately cunning and clever, but Indian garb would deceive him. No other party being endangered, no charge of manslaughter could be brought against me; nor could there be any idea of suicide. Should the man-eater come, and should I not be aware of it beforehand, the question of suicide could not arise, for the very simple reason that I would not be present to answer the charge. So I told Aleem of my scheme and now it was his turn to remonstrate.

I had my way, however, as I usually do in these matters, and sunset found me seated on Mischief's tombstone with crossed legs, dressed in Aleem's dirtiest clothing, my face and hands blackened with charcoal, and a filthy rag tied round my forehead to emulate a turban. The rifle lay inconspicuously on the ground close at hand, with the torch clamped to it, covered with a light layer of leaves so that the man-eater might not notice it. You may be certain I took good care to sit with my back towards the rest house so that I could watch the jungle on three sides.

The sunset hour and the corresponding break of day are the most delightful moments to be in a forest to anybody fascinated by the jungle and the wild creatures that inhabit it, for it is at these times that one hears the songs of the birds of the day at their best. The creatures and birds of the night seem to take the cue from their brethren of the day, and their calls of welcome to the hours of darkness that lie ahead mingle with those of their roosting fellows, to fade away correspondingly at break of day.

But I had no ears for such music at this moment, enchanting as it always is to me, for my ears, mind and nerves were attuned for the coming of the killer. Now was the hour, the sunset hour, when it would be afoot. It was at precisely this moment that it had taken poor little Peearree, and there was every likelihood that it would revisit the place where it had killed her in the hope of finding another victim. Thoughts such as these came into my mind and filled me with an ever-growing sense of danger.

It was soon quite dark. The rest house behind me, although so close, was a mere shapeless blur against the blacker background of the jungle behind it. Overhead, the stars twinkled here and there in the open spaces between the tree-tops that swayed slightly to the faint breeze. A short distance away a tall clump of bamboos reached heavenwards, the tops of their giant feathery culms drooping back to earth again in all directions like a graceful but huge bouquet.

Then I heard a faint rustle a little to my left. Very soon I heard it again, coming, it seemed, from a bush a few feet away. I strained my eyes but could see nothing but the blob of deeper blackness that was the bush against the blackness of the jungle beyond. My hand grasped the loaded rifle, kept ready at my feet, and in a lightning-swift motion the butt was at my shoulder and my left thumb was pressed hard upon the switch. A bright beam cut through the darkness to reflect tiny eyes that gazed back at me, brilliant as rubies, in innocent resentment. What I thought to be the man-eater turned out to be one of those huge black scorpions, common in India and particularly in Andhra state, rustling the dry leaves in its search for grubs.

These creatures grow to a length of eight inches, vary between jet black and very dark green in colour, are covered with short, bristly hairs, have a tremendous crab-like pair of pincerclaws before them and a long segmented tail, with a needlesharp point at its end. The sting of this creature brings with it intense agony for twenty-four hours and death to such of its victims as may suffer from a weak heart.

The scorpion halted in its tracks when the light fell upon it and hissed audibly with vexation. I picked up a handful of earth and tossed it at the scorpion, which hissed again before scurrying away. Then I switched off the torch, replaced the rifle carefully on the ground at my feet and, groping for the leaves I had displaced, lightly covered it once again, cursing under my breath.

The whole incident was most unfortunate. The scorpion had made me reveal my position by shining my torch. If the panther had been anywhere near by it would have seen the light, and with the uncanny instinct of man-eaters who can sense when they are being hunted, the beast would beat a hasty retreat and now be far away.

It is said that scorpions have more than two eyes. I began to wonder if this was so and which of its eyes could have caught and reflected my torch-beam, when I heard the whistle of an engine as it rounded the bend just before reaching the outer signal. The goods train rumbled to a grinding halt and the engine-driver started to whistle again, first in short, rapid bursts and then in a prolonged blast that disturbed the whole jungle. I could hear voices too, the driver and his firemen talking to each other. They seemed to be unduly excited and were making quite a lot of noise.

I began to wonder what it could be all about when what I thought to be the solution came to me. The 'outer' signal must be 'up,' against the train entering the station, because the down passenger on its way to Nandyal was coming in from the opposite direction. This meant it was midnight and time had passed much faster than I expected.

The sound of human voices continued while I heard the distant hooting of the passenger train's engine, followed by the sound of its arrival at the station. The goods train driver now whistled and started his train, which clanked slowly along. A few minutes later, the down passenger drummed by as it picked up speed on its journey to Nandyal.

The quiet that I had expected would follow did not materialize, however, for soon I heard voices again, which grew louder as a group of men carrying a couple of lanterns turned in at the gate of the rest house and approached the building. Annoyed because all hope of shooting the man-eater was now gone, I rose from Mischief's grave and approached the veranda, where I was joined by Aleem, who had been awake and listening. The party turned out to comprise the stationmaster, the ranger, and the driver, guard and one of the firemen of the goods train.

They were all worked up and told how, upon coming out of the long tunnel, the headlight on the engine had revealed what looked like a crumpled human body lying at the side of the track. Observing this, the driver had concluded that one of the earlier trains must have knocked over some man who had attempted to cross the line, and as his train was moving slowly at the time, he decided to stop and investigate, lest the blame of having killed the man be put on him later. To his dismay, however, the driver and his firemen discovered that the man had not been run over at all. On the other hand, he had been devoured by some animal, as was evident from the fact that his gnawed bones lay scattered around.

The train guard, who had joined them by this time, suggested the body might be that of some wandering Chenchu tribesman, as it was clothed only in a loincloth. Having heard of the depredations of the panther, the driver and his companions decided to inform the stationmaster at Diguvametta, who could report the incident by telegram to the authorities. This they had done when the stationmaster, knowing I was at hand and had come to shoot the man-eater, resolved to inform the ranger and me first, before sending out his message.

So I had been right! The panther was, indeed, far away. Perhaps it had never been near the bungalow that night. Perhaps it had come at just about the time when the big scorpion had given me a false alarm. Maybe it had seen my torchlight, scurried away, met the Chenchu near the tunnel and killed him. But this was hardly possible, considering the distance of the tunnel from where I was sitting. As likely as not the Chenchu was a traveller who had not heard about the man-eater, or perhaps he had heard and for that reason had decided to sleep inside the tunnel, thinking it a safe place where the panther would never come.

I thanked my informers and said I would do what I could. After they had departed, as there was no point in remaining any longer by the grave, I determined to snatch a little sleep, instructing Aleem to wake me after four o'clock.

He must have remained awake, for it was a few minutes to four when he called me. We brewed tea and munched a few biscuits, after which we set out in darkness, walking in single file along the railway track. Had the man-eater been a tiger, to have done this would have been extremely dangerous, for a man-eating tiger nearly always carries away the person last in line. With a panther the risk was less: the more timid, but also more cunning, it waits for the victim who is alone and helpless before launching its attack, avoiding showing itself when more than one person is present.

Dawn was just about to break when we reached the long bridge.

Here we had to wait for about ten minutes before it became bright enough to attempt a crossing as this was a tricky business, involving stepping from sleeper to sleeper between the lines. One did not dare to look too much at the valley and the tree-tops far below as we glimpsed them through the open spaces between the sleepers.

It seemed an endless distance to the other end, but we made it eventually. Not far away was the yawning black hole that was the tunnel's entrance. Just before reaching it, on our left and close to the track, lay the mangled remains of what had been a Chenchu.

Examination showed that the man-eater must have returned to its meal, either after the goods train had passed or later perhaps, after the passenger train had gone in the opposite direction, for much more of the body had been eaten than had been reported to me. The head, feet and hands were now severed from the trunk and lay scattered about, leaving just a possibility, though not a strong one, that the man-eater might return.

Our thoughts were rudely disturbed just then by the rumbling sound as of distant thunder. It issued from the mouth of the tunnel, growing momentarily louder till it became a continuous roar. The up morning passenger train to Diguvametta was approaching. Making up my mind quickly and calling to Aleem to follow, I ran a few yards from the tunnel up the track to give the driver a chance to see me, stood between the rails and began to wave frantically as the front of the engine, in billows of smoke, dashed out of the tunnel.

The train was moving fast when the driver saw me. He applied his brakes while I skipped clear of the lines, but half the train had passed before it could be brought to a halt. I explained the situation briefly to the driver and guard who came running from both ends of the train, and asked them to take Aleem along and tell the stationmaster at Diguvametta to ask the ranger to issue orders through the local police, forbidding anybody to approach the bridge or tunnel that night. I intended to await the man-eater's possible return. To Aleem I gave hasty instructions, asking him to return with food, tea and blankets for both of us. A down passenger was due to pass shortly after 2 p.m., and he could safely come by it.

While I was speaking, a large number of passengers had crowded around, wanting to know what was going on. Some of these now insisted upon going to look at the corpse, so that it was over fifteen minutes before the driver could continue his journey. I watched the train as it clanked over the long bridge and disappeared around the curve.

In an incredibly short time the vultures discovered the remains. At first one appeared as a speck in the sky high above me, soon followed by other specks. Then came the loud rustle of air through their wing-feathers as they swooped to earth to alight heavily a few feet from their prospective feast, towards which they began to waddle in ungainly fashion.

Squatting at the mouth of the tunnel, I had an abundant supply of ammunition in the gravel ballast of the line. I hurled the stones at the venturesome vultures, and from such close range I managed to score a fair number of direct hits which served to keep the unwelcome birds at bay. All this helped to pass the time and an up goods train to Duguvametta roared through the tunnel without the driver noticing me, squatting to one side of the mouth, or the scattered remains of the Chenchu, though he could not have failed to observe the abnormal number of vultures that gathered on both sides of the track.

The section is not a busy one and no other trains came through till the arrival of the down passenger shortly after two o'clock, bringing Aleem, the tea, my lunch and a blanket for each of us for the night. The driver stopped his train for Aleem to alight and then stepped down himself, with his firemen and, of course, the guard and a crowd of passengers, to view the cadaver which by now was smelling strongly.

Amidst cries of 'good luck' the train rumbled away again, followed an hour later by a goods train, after which we were left to our own devices. The vultures had by now abandoned their task as hopeless and had flown dejectedly away, leaving us to make our plans for the night.

There were two possible places in which to hide. The first was the mouth of the tunnel itself; the second, somewhere above the entrance. To determine which would be the less likely of the two hiding places to be discovered, I put myself in the man-eater's place. Instinct, and a long association with the locality would have conditioned it to the fact that huge monstrosities, rumbling and roaring and billowing smoke, every now and then issued from the hole in the earth. So it would certainly watch the hole very carefully and for a long time before daring to show itself; in the course of this close scrutiny it would very likely discover us, for I would have to keep Aleem with me. There was nowhere to send him away to, and it would be most dangerous to ask him to return home unarmed.

The conclusion we reached therefore was obvious: we would hide somewhere on the hillside, as close as possible above the mouth of the tunnel, hoping that the panther would keep to the general rule of not looking upwards for an enemy. The ground above the entrance to the tunnel sloped gradually and was mostly covered with coarse grass and weeds with a stumpy tree here and there. It was quite rocky and boulders lay scattered around in profusion, varying in size from a football to the height of a man.

Grateful for the luck afforded by this cover, it did not take us long, working together, to construct a small buttress of boulders which we placed in line a little above the entrance to the tunnel-mouth in the form of a wall high enough to conceal us when lying prone behind it. Between these boulders we allowed enough space for two loopholes, one for Aleem and the other for myself, through which to keep close watch upon the remains at the side of the track below us, and a little of the terrain around it. For a wider view, and to take a shot, I would have to look over the top of the rough stone parapet we had constructed. If I were to try poking the rifle through the aperture, I might make some sound if the barrel struck against the stone. The panther would hear this, look up and spot us. The one disadvantage of our situation was that we were lying at a downward-sloping angle, with our heels at a higher level than our heads.

We were in place by four o'clock, with the sun still blazing down upon us and the ground fire-hot beneath. We lay on our blankets, but these soon became unbearably warm, while the disadvantage of the downward slope now began to make itself felt. I suppose, because of the steady accumulation of blood in my chest and head, rather than in equal distribution over my whole body, I began to experience an uncomfortably stuffy sensation, which grew more and more apparent as sunset approached. This caused me to squirm about, and I saw that Aleem was squirming too, from which I concluded that he, like me, was feeling uncomfortable. If in the short space of only two hours I could feel so suffocated, it was quite apparent that we would be compelled to change position before very long.

It was now beginning to get dark, and we could still make out the remains of the Chenchu, when a barking deer called sharply from the hill-top at the back of us. 'Kharr!' eh cried, 'Kharr! Kharr! Kharr!'

It kept barking hoarsely, but did not move away. Therefore, whatever it had seen was evidently at a safe distance, enabling it to hold its ground while continuing to give the alarm. A peacock honked loudly and left its perch on a tree, also behind us, and flapped heavily away. I caught sight of it out of the corner of my eyes as it sailed with spread wings into the valley beneath the long railway viaduct.

There was silence after that and darkness had almost fallen when a junglehen, also from somewhere on the hill behind us, fluttered from cover with a hysterical 'Kok! Kok! Kok! Kok!' I did not relish all this activity behind me. Without doubt, some animal that represented danger to the creatures that had given their alarms, was afoot somewhere behind us. It could be any tiger or panther, but far more likely it was the man-eater itself.

Within the next few minutes it became too dark to see the Chenchu any more, although I could observe the line of ballast beside the railway track, stretching away like a faint grey ribbon from the tunnel beneath me. While I was still looking, I heard a small stone roll somewhere behind me. The sound was faint, but my ears, attuned closely to any noise in the jungle, did not fail to register it.

From straining my eyes to see the ballast below, I turned my head to the left to glance uncomfortably backwards. Aleem, next to me was doing the same. Then the thought occurred to me: perhaps the man-eater, in walking along the track, had dislodged one of the small granite stones down there. Maybe the beast had come through the tunnel itself and shifted one of the stones at the entrance. What a lucky thing we had decided not to sit at the mouth of the tunnel!

I was just congratulating myself in this way when a thought struck me with horrifying significance: perhaps the panther was not below us at all. Maybe it had seen us from the hill top above and was crawling down upon us that very moment from behind, waiting to get close enough before launching a final attack.

All further conjecture was interrupted at that moment as the earth beneath me appeared to quake and tremble. As deep rumbling increased to a prolonged roar, and a moment later a shower of sparks and black smoke shot out of the earth before me as a light engine, travelling backwards, rushed out of the tunnel-mouth. Because this engine was moving in reverse, the driver could not use his headlight, and we had no warning of his approach. All other sounds were shut out as the black silhouette of the engine disappeared into the darkness.

That was when the panther decided to attack, and it came from behind us, not from down below. Maybe it could see only one of us and therefore failed to realize that there were actually two people present, for it came bounding along in true man-eater style, but without making a sound, unlike the normal panther that 'woofs' and coughs harshly and loudly when it attacks.

We heard only the muffled fall of its soft pads on the hard ground as it leapt towards us, a faintly-scraping, hollow, bumping sound, which puzzled us. A moment more and it would have been upon us but it then discovered that it was attacking two people where it expected only one. The panther checked itself two yards away, snarling and growling in baffled rage. Then, and only then, did we know that the man-eater had indeed arrived.

I can hardly remember what happened next. I know Aleem sprang up, yelling and I know I rolled violently over and over away from where instinct told me there was danger. But I do remember switching on my light and firing into the face of the panther at point-blank range. It sprang forward then, passing between us and over the edge of the tunnel above which we were seated, to fall with a loud thud upon the railway track below.

The driver of the midnight down passenger was amazed at the sight revealed by his headlight some time later. Two men were drinking tea. Between them lay a dead panther, and but a short distance away the mangled remains and bones of a man. I wager he will remember the sight long after he retires from service. Being a good fellow, he gave Aleem and me, along with the dead panther, a lift to Diguvametta.

Tales of the Supernatural

Many people have asked me if i have had occult experiences during the years I have spent in the jungles, and for my views on whether such things are true or fictitious, or perhaps the product of an overwrought imagination.

I have really no idea why the occult should be associated with hunting experiences and forest lore, but somehow it is so. Other hunters, far more experienced than I am, have related some interesting happenings of this sort and we have little reason to doubt them. I have had a few curious experiences myself and have told them already, like that of the dead watchman of the Kalhatti forest bungalow. [1] Fortunately I was not alone at that time; my son Donald was with me. We both saw the watchman as clearly as I can see this sheet of paper; yet he had been shot dead and buried long before!

Then there was the case of Captain Neide, who removed an old lamp from an ancient temple. He almost died of fever shortly afterwards and only recovered when he returned the lamp to its resting place. Practically in the same locality lived the girl who was possessed by an evil spirit or spirits, that made her vomit stones each time she attempted to eat her evening meal. I saw this for myself and I saw her cured by a religious healer. Details of both these happenings have been related by me in an earlier book [2]

I am no authority on the occult and I think it is very foolish for anyone to express an opinion on a matter he knows nothing about. So I propose only to record some of the beliefs of the people of South India. Of course, this is no answer to the questions of those who have asked me for a personal opinion. In fact, I have no answer.

Perhaps the most common belief in the south of the peninsula is in a pair of evil spirits that exist as man and wife. The female is referred to in the Tamil language as a minnispuram and in Malayalam as a Yakshi. It is universally agreed that the female is very hostile and dangerous to human beings, particularly to other women, while the males are generally quite harmless, at least according to Tamil ideas. Such a view corresponds closely to our own as regards the males and females of the human race. But the Malayalees think differently: they say both Yakshis (female spirits) and Gandharwas (male spirits) are highly dangerous to humans.

The Tamils believe that minnispurams (female) can adopt any shape or form, animal or human, and frequently appear as tall pillars of nebulous whiteness or blackness. Malayalees say that Yakshis generally show themselves in a more comely way, as graceful bare-breasted women, clad below the waist in semi-transparent lungis, their hair long and flowing down their backs, thus concealing the hollow backs that are characteristic of these spirits. Tales are rife of how a man or youth, returning home at night, had met one of these nebulous creatures and was tempted to her side; he was then struck across the head or back, began to vomit blood and died within twenty-four hours. Others have been tempted to the edges of wells or tanks and then pushed in.

There is a story of two Namboodries (west coast Brahmin priests) who encountered two Yakshis in the form of beautiful girls. They spoke to the women and were invited to their home. The priests were tempted, and the house where the two girls lived turned out to be a very nice place indeed. Each of the Namboodries went into a room with one of the girls. But for some unaccountable reason one of them became nervous: instead of making love he clutched in his hand his personal talisman, a palm leaf with the sacred word Nghrie inscribed on it.

From the next room came the sound of giggling, which stopped suddenly and was followed by the sound of crunching bones. The girl did not touch the priest, but besought him earnestly to throw away the palm leaf and make love, emphasizing the temptation by exposing to him her naked body. But the priest, by now thoroughly suspicious, clung tenaciously to his leaf.

Suddenly the crunching sound in the next room ceased, whereupon the girl grew angry, abused the priest loudly, slapped him across the face and vanished from sight. So did the house! And he found himself alone in the darkness with the mangled body of his friend.

Belief in vampirism, but in a special form, is common. Instead of sucking blood, as do the European counterparts, the Indian vampire, which also appears only at night and sleeps in the earth all day, specializes in dogging the steps of a solitary man at night, stopping when he stops and walking when he walks. This continues to within a hundred yards of the man's destination, and then the vampire strikes! It attacks from behind, then tears its victim to pieces to devour his flesh. The only way of escape is to utter a very sacred word and turn upon the vampire with a drawn knife. The vampire will scream like a stricken animal. It must be stabbed repeatedly till it falls, when it will certainly disappear in a pool of blood. Or so it is said!

Great success in business and much prosperous trading, together with the amassing of several fortunes, can occur when a man agrees to hand over his wife to a spirit of a certain genus who confers great wealth on the family in exchange for the favour. The earthly husband must live apart from his wife and have no sexual intercourse with her, although he is allowed to speak to her and even feed with her occasionally.

The wife must live in a house apart; at nine each night the doors must be locked and the earthly wife must retire to a windowless bedroom. Soon a nebulous mist appears which takes the form of the spirit-husband. He stays with her till three in the morning, which is when all respectable spirits must depart in wraithform, just as they came, while less respectable men sneak home with their shoes in their hands!

Years ago, I knew a Jewish family that came from Rangoon. The husband dealt in hardware. He had a wife and three children. They were long-married and business was not good. Then a pact was said to have been made with a spirit-husband who came to like the wife, the woman being still of comely appearance despite her three children. It is not clear whether she sought the arrangement or the business-minded husband wanted it.

According to the rules, she shifted to a house apart, closed the doors by nine o'clock and enjoyed her spirit-husband till three in the morning. The earthly husband and the three children slept in another house all night but visited her during the day. Business improved. Everything they touched flourished and turned to gold. The family became one of the most prosperous in Rangoon and fabulously rich.

Then, one afternoon, something happened. The earthly husband and earthly wife were together. The children had gone out. The wife was still a comely woman and old habits were too strong to resist. The couple were intimate.

That night there was a great commotion in the wife's house after nine o'clock. The spirit-husband appeared, and he was highly annoyed; jealous, too. He beat her soundly and said he would never come there again. He did not, and the fortunes of the family went down and down. Business failed completely. They had to sell out, and from being one of the richest, they became one of the poorest families in Rangoon.

There have been cases, too, of spirit-wives who come at night. But whether these bring material riches, or material poverty and trouble, as their earthly counterparts generally do, is not quite clear.

Very frequently I have been asked if there is any truth in black magic, and instances in the lives of close friends of mine are many. I have already related the case of Ossie Brown, to which I was a most reluctant witness. [3]

About twenty years ago I was guilty of having done something that I should have avoided; but it is not clear to me now whether I offended the party concerned or whether I fell under the person s influence. Call it a subconscious fancy on my part if you like. But for more than a fortnight, at exactly 3 a.m., I would wake up with a frightening, choking sensation, as if something or someone were grasping me by the throat. Then I would hear heavy footsteps outside the window—the measured, slow tread of someone walking in army boots. I dashed out on more than one occasion with a stick—even with a gun! Yet in the bright moonlight nothing could be seen, while the footsteps ceased. No sooner did I return inside than the footsteps started once again. They would last for about ten minutes.

Things came to a head one night. I got up almost suffocated. I heard the footsteps. I dashed out with the gun as usual and searched everywhere. There was nothing to be seen. I came back and the footsteps started again. I closed and locked the window. It was all very strange, but I determined to ignore it. Switching off the electric light, I got into bed.

The next moment something soft struck against my mosquito curtain and fell to the floor. Leaping out of bed, I turned on the light. There on the ground, was a ball of wet mud as large as my fist. Where had it come from? The window was closed. My wife and children were in the next room, sound asleep.

At this stage I determined to do something about the matter—something I would normally never think of doing.

There is a seer living in Bangalore who has achieved considerable fame as a fortune-teller, a recoverer of stolen property and necromancer. His fee for consultation is one rupee (about one shilling and four-pence), to be presented to him on a betel leaf—nothing more; nothing less. I had heard a good deal about this man, and had thought him a clever rogue.

I went to see him. He had very large black eyes and a big moustache. Other than this, there was nothing outstanding about him. I came into his room and laid down my rupee on a betel leaf, feeling myself to be the biggest fool in town at that moment.

Looking at me, he calmly said: 'You are being troubled by hearing footsteps at night. Lately, a mud ball was thrown at you. You have been bewitched by'—(and here he described person concerned) 'because you refused to give the individual what was asked.'

That's easy to explain, you will say. Thought-reading is the answer; or some form of hypnotism; or both. You may be quite right. But listen to what happened next.

'Go home,' he told me. 'Measure six paces from your window in the direction in which the sun rises. Then dig a foot into the ground. You will find something. Destroy it. You will not be troubled again.'

I went home, feeling angry. I took a shovel in my hands, feeling more angry. I measured six paces from my window towards the east, and began to dig. Not only was I angry now, but also wondered how I had become such a fool. But I found something, and I had dug just about a foot deep. I found a doll made of clay buried in the earth. A crude affair with misshapen head and arms and legs. But human hair had been stuck to the head and a nail driven through it. At the pointed end of the nail was a dried lemon skin that had been sliced almost in half. The human hair looked remarkably like my own.

I was amazed; and I burned the damned thing! I did not hear the footsteps at three next morning, or ever again!

Now, how had the seer known? It could not have been thought-reading, because I did not know about the doll myself. And he could not have prepared the stage beforehand, for how did he know I would consult him?

Years later, I related the incident to a person who dabbled in such matters. He told me the clay doll with human hair was made to represent me. The nail driven through the head signified that the mantra had been made against my mind, my powers of reason. If the curse had not been removed by the seer telling me where to find the doll, I would assuredly have become insane within a short time!

This occurrence interested me so much that I made up my mind to investigate these matters more fully. As this friend was known to be a black magician, a necromancer, I began worrying him to tell me more; in fact, to initiate me into his brotherhood. But he flatly refused!

I have a trait about which some people who do not like me complain bitterly. It is stubbornness, coupled with persistence. The more my friend refused, the more I pestered him. So, at length, he initiated me as a member of the brotherhood of the Silver Armlet!

I have my silver armlet which I wear on certain occasions, and nobody else is allowed to touch it. Nor can I tell you all the mystic rites of the society as I am under oath not to reveal them; but I can give you the outline of the initiation ceremonies.

The first entails a visit to any old cemetery—the older it is the better—on the night of the amavasa , which is the night before the new moon. The neophyte must go alone, after midnight, carrying either a live black cock and a knife with which to cut its throat, or if he feels squeamish about cutting the creature's throat, a couple of pounds of pig's entrails and liver instead.

He must enter the cemetery, and after a brief pooja by lighting camphor, etc., he should cut the cock's throat and then proceed to cut up the whole bird, feather and all, into finger-long pieces. Or, if he has brought pig's liver and entrails instead, cut that up into pieces. Next he must walk through the cemetery without looking back, throwing these pieces over his left and right shoulders one by one while using the most foul language he can think of, in whichever dialect he wishes. 'Take this, you—and eat it,' and so forth. This attracts the spirit or the disembodied entity, to him.

The neophyte then goes home and performs another ceremony which makes this spirit a servant to him.

You may have heard and read of miracles performed by holy men in India who can produce from the air articles like fruit of any kind, money, sweetmeats and even certain medicines. These things are made possible by the services of a species of small genii known as kutty shaitan, one of which becomes attached to the individual on a sort of fifty-fifty contract basis. They each become a servant of the other and are bound together for life. The word kutty in Tamil and Malayalam signifies 'small;' while the word shaitan in Urdu and Hindi means 'devil'—a curious combination of four languages. This spirit belongs to the category of 'elementals,' but assumes the form of a miniature negro, not more than three to four inches tall, in order to make itself visible.

After midnight on any night, but particularly on amavasa night, when it becomes perceptible, a curious movement can be seen by a watcher concealed in a pen with a herd of buffaloes. He notices something flicking from the back of one animal to another. It looks like a large moth, or maybe a small bat, but apparently has no wings! It dances on one back, leaps to another, sways, disappears and reappears on the back of another buffalo. But the animals do not appear to see it, or notice or feel its presence.

This is a kutty shaitan in its natural habitat and condition. If the watcher sees this much and is satisfied, all is still well. But if he wants to become like the other great men who can pick up anything they want 'out of the air,' so to speak, he is playing with fire! For to do this, he has to get the kutty shaitan into himself. He has to make a 'deal,' a bargain, with the elemental spirit: a promise that they will serve each other for life. To make the deal is simple; but to get out of it is practically impossible.

What he has to do, to make the deal, is to approach the buffaloes and go through the motions of trying to snatch and capture the little sprite—although of course he can never do this in fact—while in his mind he concentrates on the thought that he desires the services of the kutty shaitan. He will receive a message, sometimes at the first attempt and sometimes after two or three failures—which is generally a telepathic message to his subconscious and thence to his conscious mind—as to what to do next. Generally the message instructs him to carve, (or even purchase) a small black doll, of wood, ivory, bone or any substance, which he must keep on a table or shelf in his house, and perform a daily pooja to it with lighted candles, incense, camphor and other things. This little image represents the kutty shaitan, and this ceremony seals the bond whereby the sprite agrees to serve him.

The man can then ask for and get anything he wants, provided he agrees to return it within a fixed time, say a month or two. But he cannot get something for nothing. The little sprite will bring him money, an apple, balm for a headache, a cooked meal, even petrol for a stalled car. But everything has to be returned at the time promised. Otherwise, the individual, whoever he may be, has had it!

The sprite does only one free service for its patron. It warns him of approaching danger and contrives to get him out of it. But the wages demanded by this sprite are costly. The life-span of its patron is shortened; he can have no dealings with a woman; he is hardly allowed to sleep at night; he can never accumulate wealth, although he is permitted enough for his actual needs; he will not be on good terms with his family; he will always be a wanderer, restless, unable ever to settle down.

As a member of the brotherhood of the Silver Armlet, I can assure you that black magic is a fascinating subject to study—but a hard and ruthless taskmaster if embraced!

I have another good friend, a retired army doctor who was a colonel in the India Medical Service during World War II. He told me a story which he assures me is perfectly true. While stationed at Madras, he happened to meet two brothers, Mohammed Bey and Ali Bey, who were Egyptians. He became friendly with the former, but did not know for a long time that both brothers were necromancers who had been trained in Egypt under an adept.

When he learned this, the colonel jokingly told his friend. 'Oh, then you will be able to show me a spirit. I am longing to see one and have been trying for years, without success.'

'Not only will I show you a spirit,' replied Mohammed Bey gravely, 'but I will make him your servant for your lifetime, to help you in anything you want and to bring good fortune to you. But there is one firm condition. Never, at any time, must your employ this spirit servant to do harm to another, or for any sort of evil purpose whatever. If you do, he will turn upon you and you will surely die, and most painfully too. Do you agree?'

'You have my word,' the doctor said with a laugh. 'The proposition is very attractive and I'm extremely interested.'

Mohammed Bey then asked for a writingpad and a pencil, and when he had been given these materials was busy for a while. The colonel has very kindly lent me the sheet of paper on which the Egyptian made his drawing more than twenty years ago, and I have faithfully copied it and reproduced it on pages 129 and 130.

The mantra, or words for summoning spirits, as told by the Egyptian necromancer

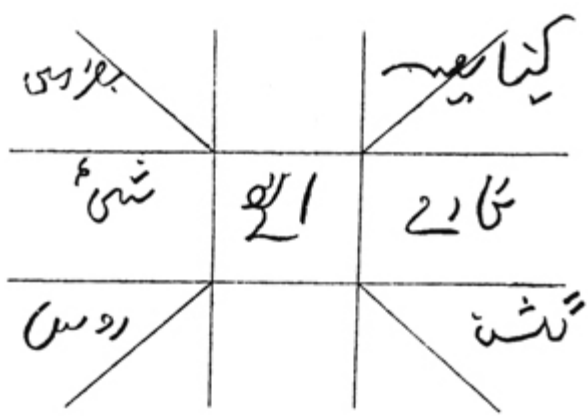
Ah, Ah, Sharheel wa burrhoode wa noodaju wa askeerah if alue aywhel kadhamu ma amuro bi hi mitt shain hathal kagadi bi hyqi sharheel us Fur Ya rooh (three times) Tha-al (three times) bill amruho (seven times).

Begin by facing the north. Then turn to the right or east, and read the above words seven times. Then turn back again to the north. Then turn to the left or west side and read the words seven times. Then turn back to the north. Next turn right around to face in the opposite or southern direction, and read the words seven times. Then turn back again to the north, where the words should be read once more seven times. After having finished the four points of the compass, turn in the direction of the cemetery you have selected for your visit and read the words twenty-one times. Lastly, breathe in slowly, hold your breath a little and then exhale slowly three times, each time concentrating upon a good manifestation of the spirit desired by the person teaching this, or that you would like to see yourself.

This procedure is to be followed for twenty-two days, beginning in such a fashion that the twenty-third day falls on a Tuesday or a Friday. That twenty-third day is the day on which to go to the cemetery. In other words, carry out the directions for twenty-two days, ending on a Monday or a Thursday. The next day (Tuesday or Friday) is the day on which to visit the cemetery.

The following drawing may be traced on a piece of paper, folded and kept in a locket or wallet for good luck:



'I have written in Roman-Arabic so that you may be able to read it,' Mohammed Bey explained (Roman-Arabic is Arabic written phonetically in Roman characters). 'Next come the instructions in English. Carry these out faithfully and to the letter.'

'Order a large garland of roses to be prepared by the evening of the final day, and ninety minutes before midnight that day have a bath and dress in a clean white shirt and suit. I will call for you at 11.30 and show you what to do next. One more thing. You must fast on that last day, but you may drink a cup of milk in the morning and another in the evening. Nothing more.'

'Now let us start calculating which is the twenty-third day.'

Thereupon the Egyptian turned to a large calendar hanging on the wall, made some calculations while counting the days on the calendar with the tip of a pencil, and finally named a day and a date.

'Be ready,' he added cryptically, and the doctor agreed.

The instructions were carried out to the letter, but during the interval the colonel never met Mohammed Bey. At the end of the third week he had the feeling that his friend was deliberately avoiding him. He wondered if it was all a joke.

The final day came. The garland of roses which the colonel had ordered was ready by evening. At 10.30 p.m. he had a bath and then dressed in clean white clothes. He tells me he felt himself a fool.

At exactly 11.30 p.m., a car drew up beneath the portico of his old-fashioned residence and the Egyptian alighted. He, too, was dressed in white clothes.

'Bring the garland, doctor,' he said in a matter-of-fact voice, 'we must be there by midnight.'

Wondering where they were going, the doctor did as he was told. They reached the cemetery in fifteen minutes and, carrying the garland of roses, the doctor followed his companion through the wicket-gate. It was pitch-dark, except for a faint glow cast by the stars. Indside the cemetery the Egyptian stopped for a moment. Then he moved among the graves for some distance, as if in search of a particular one, while the doctor followed him. They found it at last. A grave with a granite slab and a rounded headstone. It was too dark to see more.

'Place the garland around the headstone, doctor,' Mohammed Bey directed, 'and stand at the foot of the grave with your arms folded across your chest. I will stand at the side. Now, whatever happens, do not be afraid. I am here; have confidence in me. We must wait for midnight.'

A few minutes later a distant clock chimed and then struck the hour of twelve. But Mohammed Bey did nothing for a few minutes more. Then he started intoning something in a language the doctor could not understand, but thought to be Arabic. The words came in a singsong voice and the Egyptian appeared to be in a trance.

This continued for a while, and then something seemed to go wrong with the proceedings. The chanting came to an end abruptly, and was followed by angry words from the Egyptian, with an interval, and then more angry words followed. It seemed as if he was having a heated argument with some invisible person, whose voice could not be heard.

The Egyptian grew more excited. He waved his arms. He appeared to be using abusive language. Then he spat upon the grave. The next instant he fell as if pole-axed across the granite slab. His body twitched in the faint gloom, while horrible, gurgling sounds came from his throat. The doctor panicked and was on the verge of bolting, his only thought being to save himself by running for dear life.

At that moment his professional training came to his aid. He was a doctor after all. The Egyptian might be having an epileptic fit, a heart attack or a seizure of some kind. It was his medical duty to stay. Also came the paralysing thought that the Egyptain might die if left alone. When his body was found, if it was ever discovered that the doctor had been with him in the cemetery, he might be accused of murder.

So he ran forward, grasped the body of his companion that was still thrashing about and from which came dreadful gasps and groans, and attempted to raise him.

The doctor swears he encountered a force stronger than his own that was keeping the man down. A struggle followed, then the Egyptian gasped: 'Roses—the garland— give it to me.'

The doctor let go of his companion, removed the garland from the tombstone, and threw it to the prostrate man. While he still grovelled on the granite slab as if in an epileptic fit, Mohammed Bey tore the garland to shreds. And as the garland disintegrated, the black magician appeared to be gaining mastery over the situation.

Eventually he stood up, dishevelled and breathing hard. Blood trickled down his face from a gash across his forehead, where he had struck it against the granite slab.

'It's all right now, doctor,' he gasped, 'but let's get out of here. I'll tell you in the car.'

The two men hurried out to the car and began to drive back to the doctor's house. The colonel waited till his companion regained his composure. At last the Egyptian spoke.

'The spirit came all right. In fact, there were several. But they were in grotesque forms, resembling strange animals. They all volunteered to serve you. But I insisted there should be only one, and that one should adopt a human form. They refused, and were adamant that all should attach themselves to you and in their present strange forms. I would not allow it. There was an argument and suddenly the leader struck me down and they all set upon me, choking me. If you had not thrown me the garland to break the spell, I would have been killed.'

A clever piece of acting by the Egyptian, put on to deceive the doctor, you will say. The cut across his forehead against the tombstone was, of course, an unforeseen accident. Perhaps it was not blood after all, but something surreptitiously applied!

Quite possible I do agree, and a reasonable explanation. But remember, the Egyptian never asked his friend for money, or a favour at any time. Then why did he go through all this trouble?

Many Indian families, particularly on the west coast of India, believe they are guarded by what they call 'deities.' These are not evil spirits or jinns or even gods. They are thought to be superior spiritual beings. Each is distinguished from the other by the scent of a particular fragrant flower which comes from nowhere. Some bring with them the scent of jasmine; this is very common and I have smelt it myself many times in rooms and in places where flowers of any kind certainly did not exist. Superior orders are said to bring the scent of roses, or other fragrances.

Amavasa night—the night before the new moon, the darkest night of the month—is the time generally chosen for practising all kinds of black magic, and it is on such nights that many Indian families feel and hear the presence of their guardian spirits. These evidence themselves by the sound of a heavy chain being dragged or jingled, or in the case of a female spirit, by the subtle clicking of bracelets against each other. The major guardian announces his presence by making a noise as if a man were walking around the house snapping his thumb against his fingers every once in a while, or by measured, heavy footsteps.

Belief in the existence of spirits and in the occult has found its way into all religions in India. In my own opinion, all creeds, as originally preached and believed, were of pure and divine origin: Hinduism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism and Christianity all pointed the way to the Supreme Being. But priestcraft on the one hand, and superstition and occultism on the other, have become so intermingled with these doctrines that many of their followers practise a religion very different, and in certain cases quite opposed, to the doctrines of the original parent order.

The beliefs and practices of many Christian converts in India, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, are indeed a queer mixture of religion, superstition and occultism. Very properly, these people are the despair of most right-thinking priests of all faiths, although unfortunately here and there are some who encourage distorted beliefs to the point of malpractice in order to drive home that fear of hellfire by which they hold their congregations in submission.

Saint Anthony, who is regarded everywhere as a most beneficent man while alive, has come to be looked upon by many in India as an infallible means of effecting revenge upon others as well as acquiring benefits by prayer. Horrible acts of revenge and the defeat of enemies by fair means or foul, including painful illness and lingering death, are sought through him. Saint Anthony is also regarded as the main means for the recovery of lost or stolen property and for inflicting punishment, by many kinds of violence, upon the thief responsible. Some of the forms of punishment which Saint Anthony is asked to inflict upon the culprit or the enemy are of a revolting character and out of all proportion to the crimes committed. For example, in retribution for stealing a pound of rice, Saint Anthony is asked to inflict upon the thief, known or unknown, such appalling diseases as cholera and plague.

My servant is a Roman Catholic convert, but here is her procedure for recovering lost property through Saint Anthony. To find the thief, the supplicant must first take a bath. Then he must wash the statue of the saint, or (if he does not possess a statue) the glass covering the saint's photograph. To bathe the saint's likeness in milk, rather than in water, is considered more efficacious. The ceremony should be performed at sunset on a Tuesday. After this, four candles are lighted at the foot of the statue or photograph, before which an offering of flowers is made and incense burned. A small coin is tied in a cloth to the top of the frame of the photograph or placed at the foot of the statue.

A prayer is then offered to the saint to grant the favour of finding the thief, restoring the money or property, or severely punishing the offender, as the case may be. This is accompanied by a vow that, if the petition be granted, charity in some form or another will be given to thirteen beggars in the name of the saint. This charity may be in the shape of a small gift of money, or a garment, or a meal. Such prayers to the saint are offered every evening at sundown for thirteen days. It is thought certain favours of a minor kind will be granted within eight days, whereas major favours, in respect of articles of greater value, may take longer, but action by the saint will surely be evident within a month.

The recovery of lost property purchased by hard-earned money, or of stolen money, is assured by the lighting of a single candle, accompanied by incense, for thirteen consecutive evenings before the statue or picture of Saint Anthony.

In some parts of India, particularly old Hyderabad state, these supplications to Saint Anthony assume a more forceful character. The feet of the saint's statue are bound with cord, signifying that the supplicant is not prepared to release him until or unless the favour is granted. The most drastic—and amusing—instance that I have met is the procedure followed by an old Anglo-Indian living at a place called Kazipet. He was an old army man and possibly thought Saint Anthony needed a spot of disciplining now and again. For should the favour not be granted within the stipulated time, the statue of the saint was subjected to rough treatment. It was tied to a tamarind tree out in the garden and smeared with a mixture of chili-powder and other ingredients that are known to be extremely pungent. The idea was by torture to force the poor saint into granting the favour, and once that happened the old soldier brought the statue indoors again, washed it, bathed it in milk and restored it to its pedestal.

Statues and photographs of the Virgin Mary were similarly appealed to for general favours. Thursday was considered the right day for the first supplication, to be repeated for eight days in succession.

The old English method of tying up a pair of scissors, so that the two loops of the scissors rest on the fingertips of two persons and rotate at the mention of the name of the guilty party, is very widely practised in India. So is the custom of suspending a rosary over a pot of incense, so that the cross is immediately above the fire; it is then said to oscillate at the name of the guilty party.

In cemeteries in which Indian Christians are buried, it is common to see the relatives of the dead come to the grave on certain days with offerings of milk and food, presumably to sustain the departed spirit on its long journey to higher realms.

My purpose in mentioning these things is to emphasize the extent to which superstition and ancient customs have become inextricably involved with Christianity in India. Superstition and belief and fear of the unknown are rife in all walks of life in all communities and all religions. Among the upper-class Hindus it takes a higher form but is nevertheless powerful. From birth, a child's horoscope is all-important and plays a primary part in the arrangement of a marriage—the boy and girl rarely see each other before the ceremony—and the stars continue to have a major role throughout the man's life. Conspicuously marked on calendars, for every day of the month, are two lists of timings, headed respectively rahukalam and guligaikalam, meaning 'bad time' and 'good time', and no Hindu, and many who are not Hindus, will dream of leaving home at a time, or embarking on a business venture or journey at an hour which falls within the rahukalam or 'bad time' period. He will patiently wait till that time had passed and the guligaikalam or 'good time' has come. Then he will set out on his venture, very confident and assured of success. A ring that has very magical properties in attracting the fair sex, sometimes to their great embarrassment, can be made in the following way. I took great pains to write down the formula, or whatever you care to call it. The only snag is that the mantras involved have to be acquired and learned. The secret is so valuable, presumably because the reward is so great, that so far nobody seems willing to tell me these mantras, so that I may learn and repeat them. But I am still trying to find somebody who will part with the secret.

However, you must procure a live fresh-water turtle of the dark variety of medium size. This is not very difficult. For about a rupee someone will bring one to you. They abound in fresh-water wells throughout the countryside.

Having procured the live turtle, get some dried pumpkin seeds that will germinate easily. These may be obtained readily from any seedsmen, or from any pumpkin purchased in the market, though in the latter event they should be well dried.

Next, tempt the unfortunate turtle with some food such as earthworms or a small frog. When he sticks his neck out of his shell to eat, decapitate him with a deft stroke of a sharp knife, delivering the blow just behind the back of his head and high up the neck; that is, be sure to leave a good bit of stump protruding. After all movement has ceased insert about half a dozen of the dried pumpkin seeds well into the raw stump of the neck. Then bury the turtle in an upright position in the ground, so that the neck-stump, with the seeds in it, is rather less than a couple of inches below the surface of the ground. Then water the spot sparingly every day.

The pumpkin seeds, or some of them, will sprout. Select the best and healthiest. Wait till the second shoot appears, and then carefully pluck the whole seedling, along with its roots, from the decaying neck-stump of the turtle. Clean away the mess from the roots, and cram the seedling tightly, roots and all, through the groove on the underside into the hollow of a ring, which you should have prepared in advance.

Any ring will do, but one of silver or copper is best. A hollow groove, as deep as possible, should have been cut around the ring.

After you have pushed as much as is possible of the seedling with its roots into this hollow groove, seal up the same with sealing-wax or any form of lacquer or gummy substance that will dry and harden. The ring should not be sent to a jeweller for sealing, as the heat he will apply to melt the metal to seal the ring will burn up the seedling inside.

The ring, having thus been made ready and sealed, must not be used till the next new-moon day. At midnight on the night before, that is that night of amavasa, a mantra has to be repeated over the ring eleven times, and it is then ready for use. Its efficacy in attracting and embarrassing females is said to last for a lifetime.

This topic will not be complete unless I tell you of an adventure that befell me near a town called Chitaldroog, in a jungle once renowned for tigers, situated to the east of the district of Shimoga in Mysore state. The village of Sampigehalli, a few miles from Chitaldroog, is surrounded by thick forest. About four miles from this village, along a track leading to another village named Budhalli, in the midst of the jungle, stands a ruined temple with a very deep well. The temple and the well are reputed to be haunted, for which reason hardly a soul will approach within a furlong of them in broad daylight, while the area is of course absolutely taboo after sunset.

Because of its isolation, a sloth bear or two invariably lived in or close to the ruins, while quite frequently a panther could shelter in the old temple close to the bears, but without having anything to do with them. Now and again a tiger decided to take up residence there for a few weeks, and when that happened the bears and the panther temporarily took themselves off to safer abodes. For either of them to dare to share the same abode with the king of the jungle might prove a costly experiment. But eventually the tiger would move on, and then the bears and the panther would come back and things return to normal.

Some time ago a villager disappeared from Sampigehalli, and a month later another disappeared from Budhalli. Nobody knew what happened to them, nor was there any sign of the remains. As villagers in India rarely leave their birthplaces voluntarily, the disappearance of these men, one after the other, left food for thought. It suggested that a tragedy of some sort had taken place.

About this time an unusually large tiger, said by the villagers to be exceptionally fierce because of the manner in which it boldly attacked their herds of cattle and never failed to make a kill, took up its abode in the locality, or even in the old temple itself. This was established by its pug-marks, to be seen early in the morning returning to the temple, superimposed upon the pug-marks it had left in the dust of the trail when it had gone forth the previous evening. The villagers felt that this tiger had devoured their two companions, one after the other, so they appealed to the authorities for help against the man-eater that they were convinced dwelt in the ruins of the old temple.

Sampigehalli was at one time a favourite haunt of mine and several of my village friends wrote to me to come to their aid. When I reached the village a fortnight later I made painstaking inquiries regarding the last movements of the two missing men, but everything seemed to be shrouded in mystery. A village girl was mixed up in the affair and it was said that both the men were her suitors. The girl was poor, whereas both the men were comparatively well-to-do, owning land in their own villages. They were married and had families, but no member of either family had the least knowledge of the large sum of money each of these individuals was reported to be carrying on his person just prior to his disappearance, nor did they know why their relative had been carrying the money about with him. All this came to light only afterwards. For India is one of the few places left in the world today where wives do not dare to question their husbands' movements or authority.

The man's word is law and women are content to confine their activities to the kitchen.

Meanwhile, there was no evidence whatever to connect the tiger with the disappearance of the two men. Casually, in the course of inquiries, I spoke about the missing men to the girl concerned and came away feeling that she knew much more about the matter than she would say. To my mind, she was much more dangerous than any man-eating tiger and far more astute; but not being a policeman, I did not feel obliged to act as an informer or a detective. I was much more interested in the tiger than in the girl's motives and movements and what had happened to her suitors.

I therefore decided to go to the old temple immediately after lunch that day, select a suitable hiding place and remain there all night in the hope of seeing the suspected man-eater. I had not made up my mind whether to shoot the creature if I did happen to see it, for something told me that it was not the culprit. In any case it was summer time, far better known in India as the 'hot weather,' and it was only a day or two until the full moon. The moonlight and the open air would be much more pleasant than spending the night in some little mudhouse, where the heat would be intense, or even in the forest department's bungalow.

After a good lunch I got together the few things I would require for the night: my rifle, ammunition, flask of tea, water-bottle, electric torch and some biscuits in a cloth bag, that would not crackle as a paper wrapper would, and set out for the old temple. In a little over an hour I reached my destination. I knew the place well enough, although I had never spent a night there. It consisted of a small central structure built of solid, irregular blocks of granite, surrounded by what had once been a fairly high stone wall. The well, which was indeed very deep, still held water and was in the courtyard to the front of the temple.

I do not know how much water was in the well, but the surface glinted down below, far beneath the level of the ground. The well itself was not more than fifteen feet in diameter, ringed at the top by a low stone parapet about a yard high. Many of the granite blocks forming the main temple, the four walls of the courtyard and the parapet of the well, had become loose and had fallen away from their original positions, while gnarled or dwarfed trees, principally the jungle fig, had been able to take root wherever the lantana shrub had not already taken possession. The scene in general was bleak and dreary, and it was clear that with time the few remaining traces of the temple and its environs would be swallowed up by the advancing jungle.

But at the moment I was not interested in the temple as a structure, historical or otherwise. What I was interested in was the hiding place of the tiger, and that did not take me long to find. The only possible place was the main temple building itself. The earth was mostly hard, but here and there were sandy patches and clearly imprinted in the soft ground, both coming and going, were the pug-marks of a large tiger, leading to and from the old ruins.

I knew that if the animal were at home at that moment it would probably be sound asleep inside. I had never been inside this structure myself, but felt safe in conjecturing that it followed the general pattern of such buildings, with a sanctuary in the form of a small separate room at the farther end of what would be the one and only prayer-room of the temple proper. This small inner room would house a Nandi or two, stone images of varying sizes of the sacred bull that is universally respected by the Hindus in India, or perhaps an image or several images of one of the many gods and goddesses.

To approach this opening would, in the circumstances, be to invite disaster. If the tiger were at home, man-eater or not, it would definitely resent such blatant violation of its privacy and would probably decide to get rid of the invader with the utmost dispatch. It was one of those occasions when brain rather than brawn was indicated, so I stood still to take stock of the situation and decide upon a plan.

And the solution lay right there before me in the broken parapet of the old well. All I had to do was to sit comfortably behind it, facing the opening leading to the main temple. If the tiger were inside, as I felt sure it was, then sooner or later it would have to come out, and this it could only do by using the entrance. I would have this entrance covered in the sights of my rifle, so that it did not matter at what angle the tiger decided to emerge. The whole thing seemed 'a piece of cake.'

The sun blazed down upon me when I took up my position behind the parapet, directly facing the temple entrance. I realized my head was above the top of the parapet, so I picked up some of the fallen stone blocks and arranged them before me, leaving a space about six inches square through which to peer. If the tiger showed up, and if I had decided to shoot him by then, I could fire through this loophole.

The only other requirement was that I should sit absolutely still. Fortunately I am well practised in that sort of thing, so that neither the heat nor the winged insects that came as if from nowhere, not even the occasional slate-black lizard with its brilliant orange and yellow back worried me when the sweat trickled down my face and the insects settled on my lips and lizards crawled over my body.

Then came the evening. The calls of roosting birds preceded the squeaking of early bats and the buzz of a passing mosquito. It was almost dark when the moon, that was not yet at the full, began to rise. Soon its glow outlined the dark shadow that was the entrance to the temple through which the tiger might, at any moment now, if he was at home, be expected to emerge. What was left of daylight faded rapidly, but moonlight took its place, so that even before I appreciated the passage of time, it was night. I shivered a little, for in those few minutes it had become distinctly chill.

That was when I heard the sound for the first time. Three distinct, sharp whistles that seemed to come from the well right in front of me. The first whistle was low, the second higher, the third shorter, sharper, louder and pitched yet higher than its two predecessors.

Who the hell could be hiding in the old well? To say the least, I was very annoyed. After all the time I had spent sitting motionless in the sweltering heat of the sun, must this so-and-so start whistling at this critical moment and frighten away the tiger that might be expected to emerge from the temple? Was it worth hiding any longer? The tiger would have heard that whistling even more clearly than I had done, and it would never show up with a human being just outside its shelter. Or would it? If it really was a man-eater it might think some victim was within striking distance.

Quite ten to fifteen minutes must have elapsed when I heard the whistling again, loud and clear, in three sharp blasts. The first low and rather long-drawn; the second louder, shorter and higher pitched; the third loudest, shortest and on a yet higher note. Then there was complete silence.

I was in the act of getting up to peer down the well and curse the intruder when a slight movement in the oblong blackness of the temple entrance caught my eye. A greyish blur seemed to pass against that blackness. It vanished, came again, and disappeared once more. A moment later, clearly outlined, sideways on the moonlight, stood the tiger!

It was obvious that it never suspected my presence for a moment, as it never even glanced in my direction. It was looking directly ahead when I first saw it, but stopped at that moment to bend its neck and lick its right foreleg. I could clearly see the movement of its head, and hear the rasping of its rough tongue over its coat each time that it licked itself. And then, for the third time, came those three loud whistles in rising crescendo.

That has done it, I thought. The tiger must surely hear them now. It would crouch, growl, spring back into the shelter of the temple, or rush away, according to its disposition or the state of its nerves. But nothing happened! The tiger continued to lick itself, unperturbed. Evidently it had not heard the whistling, and for this there could be only two explanations. Either the tiger was stone deaf, or the whistling did not register upon its hearing.

The tiger stopped licking itself and began to move forward. At the same time I heard what appeared to be the flapping of wings from the depths of the well before me. The sound was heavy, slow and distinct. It must have been made by some large and heavy bird, I decided, or a bat not much smaller than the familiar Indian flying-fox or fruit-bat.

Then for the fourth time that evening came the whistle, louder and closer than ever before. My decision whether or not to shoot the tiger was quite forgotten in this mystery. Indeed, I did not even watch it, but stared at the top of the old well, waiting for I know not what to come out.

The heavy, slow flapping was continuous now. The large bird or bat, or whatever it was, drew nearer every instant to the top and would show itself in a moment or two. A strange fascination came over me as I stared at the opening. Once again came the three whistles, and then what seemed a large, dark shadow of indefinite shape issued from the well.

The moonlight was bright and clear and I was staring at the spot. There was no mistaking that I saw something, but it had no real form or shape: a small cloud of what seemed to be dark smoke came out of the well. It might have been six feet in diameter by about the same height.

A great lassitude seemed to come over me; a sort of strange, morbid despair. Did it matter what came out of the well? Was life worth living with all its troubles? Why not jump into the well and forget about everything?

I shook myself and stared, and as I watched the cloud hovered for a moment above the mouth of the well and in the next second was gone. The moonlight shone clearly through the spot which, a moment before, had been clouded by the indefinable shape. I had started perspiring with excitement when the tiger made its appearance, which is something I still do to this day when I see a tiger in the wild. Now I felt cold and clammy.

Meanwhile the tiger, which at least was of flesh and bone, wandered away. I knew that in all likelihood it would not return till the early hours of the morning, unless it found something to kill and eat sooner. I would therefore, in all probability, have to wait for a long time if I still wanted to shoot it when it came back. But somehow I did not want to shoot this tiger; the strange whistling, and the still stranger shadow that had emerged from the well, interested me much more. In any case, it was far better to sit there in the moonlight and the open air, than to be in the stuffy shelter I was occupying four miles away at Sampigehalli.

I forgot everything but the whistling and the shadow, and fell to conjecturing what on earth could have been the cause of what I had seen. The whistling had not resembled the call of any bird with which I was familiar. Rather, it was distinctly human in timbre. The flapping of wings I had heard could have been caused by some large bird, or the Indian flying-fox that I have already mentioned. But neither bird nor bat had emerged from the well, and I had never for a moment removed my gaze from its mouth. What had come out had been something far different and quite unexpected: a smokey shape of indefinable nature. In plain words, a small cloud. And that cloud had vanished before my eyes!

So absorbed was I in the problem that I lost all count of time and became oblivious to my surroundings till a low growl, somewhere behind me, brought me back to earth with a jolt. The tiger was standing there! It had returned from another direction and had discovered my presence. It was reputed to be a man-eater that had killed and devoured two men already.

I swung around in alarm, instinctively raising the .405 to my shoulder. About forty yards away this tiger sat on his haunches in the moonlight, staring hard at me. Then it inclined its head slightly and snarled in mild protest. As clearly as if it had spoken the words, this animal was saying, 'Can't you get the hell out of here?' That satisfied me entirely. It had had me at its mercy and could have killed me before I was even aware of its presence. This tiger was no man-eater!

I try to be grateful when a good turn is done to me and I was definitely grateful to this animal. It had spared my life and I would return the courtesy. I got to my feet, whereupon the tiger disappeared from sight.

Keeping the rifle in the crook of my arm to guard against a sudden change of mind on the beast's part, I shone the beam of my torch down the well, expecting to discover the mysterious whistler who must be hiding there. But only the water, deep down, reflected the light. There was certainly nobody in hiding, for I searched every inch of the interior. Then I turned and started to walk away from the place, thinking furiously. The tiger was nowhere to be seen.

I decided to spend the rest of that night on the veranda of the forest rest house, so I walked to the little bungalow that stood about a mile from the village and called aloud to the watchman who should have been sleeping inside. Nobody answered, although I called again and again and again. Obviously, the watchman was not on watch, but snugly asleep in some hut in the village.

This was no surprise. Those who have lived in India will know that invariably watchmen do not watch. They sleep soundly instead; perhaps even more soundly than you or I, for their minds are quite clear that night is the time when people must sleep.

So I climbed the stone leading up to the veranda which stretched around three sides of the little rectangular bungalow. The caretaker had been careless enough to leave an armchair out on one of these extensions, knowing well enough that nobody would steal such a rickety article, even if there had been a thief in so desolate a place; so into the armchair I sank to snatch a few hours' sleep.

My intention was to tell my friends as Sampigehalli the next morning that I was convinced the tiger was no man-eater, and that if they really wanted to solve the mystery of the missing men, they should suggest to the police that they question the lissom lass who was so intimately connected with both of them; particularly as to what had become of their money. Then I would head for home in the Studebaker.

But sleep eluded me for the rest of that night. Those mysterious whistles, the sound of flapping wings, the peculiar lethargy that had come over me, and above all that strange cloudy shape that had come out of the well, demanded a sane explanation. Wrestling with the problem, tired, nature finally asserted herself and I fell asleep after dawn had broken. It was late when I awoke that morning, but the caretaker of the bungalow had not yet returned.

I went to the village, where I told my friends that I had seen the tiger and that it had seen me. I explained it was no man-eater. I did not tell them about the whistling sounds I had heard nor the cloudy form I had seen, for there appeared to be no point in complicating my story unnecessarily and making myself ridiculous.

Then one of my friends inquired where I had concealed myself, and I told him that I had hidden behind the parapet of the old well. At the mention of that word, he looked at me strangely.

'Did you see anything other than the tiger?' he inquired. 'Did you hear anything?'

I did not answer for a while. Then I countered. 'Why do you ask?'

'Did you see, or hear, a huge bat? The sound of beating wings?'

The sound of beating wings! Most certainly I had heard that sound: the sound of heavy, flapping wings issuing from the depths of the well. In fact I had heard that sound several times, each time coming higher and closer to the mouth of the well, and it had ceased only after that strange smoky shape had emerged. What a fool I had been not to shine the light of my torch down the well the first time I had heard it! I might have been able to see something. Then I remembered I had been waiting for the tiger and so had not wanted to show myself.

My friend had noticed the delay in my reply. His face took on a knowing smile. So I told him everything.

He appeared horrified when I mentioned the hazy form that had emerged from the well. Evidently others had heard the whistling and the sound of flapping wings, but nobody seemed to have seen anything, because no one had waited to see.

Then my friend came up with a strange tale. According to him, a couple of hundred or more years ago—he did not exactly know when—the temple flourished and was a centre of widespread veneration, while the surrounding area was ruled by a petty chieftain who had made himself independent of the rajah whose capital was far away. In the court of this petty chieftain was an individual who played the dual role of adviser and jester, and for whom the chieftain evidently had considerable regard.

The temple itself was in charge of a number of priests— all Brahmins—governed by a high priest who was of strong character. As always happens when people of strong minds come into contact with each other, there was a clash of interests between the chieftain, his adviser the jester, and the Brahmin high priest.

Of course, all the details had been long forgotten, but it appeared that the high priest had contrived to trump up charges against his rival, the jester, who had been accused of treachery towards the ruling house. The result was that the unfortunate adviser had been publicly tried, condemned to death for treason, and forthwith thrown down the well alive, but not before he had screamed threats of vengeance against the high priest and all the temple monks.

The sequel to this story was that within a week the high priest was missing, and a couple of days later his body was found floating in the well. The jester had claimed his first victim. Thereafter, at intervals, the other priests disappeared one by one, and their corpses would show up, floating face downwards in the well just like that of their high priest. Other priests came to the temple, but each and everyone of them met the same fate.

Elaborate ceremonies were held from time to time to exorcise the spirit of the avenging jester, but to no avail, as slowly but surely priest after priest vanished and his drowned body was later found floating on the surface of the water in the well. It took perhaps a hundred years for the avenging spirit of the jester to accomplish its task, but the time came when no priest, however holy he might be, or appear to be, would risk his life by volunteering to officiate in the temple. And that was how the temple and the well came to be deserted and eventually fell into ruin.

The narrator closed his strange tale with a very significant sentence: 'Consider yourself very lucky indeed, sir, that you are alive this morning. That evil spirit could easily have thrown you down the well, as easily as it has destroyed at least a hundred priests in the past!'

Because I'm not a Brahmin priest, I retorted sarcastically, adding, 'Stuff and nonsense. Damned rot!' The words came from me violently, explosively. To say the least, I was annoyed! Did this silly fellow think he could frighten me with such old wives' tales? I fear I was very rude to my unfortunate acquaintance for the next few minutes, for I told him exactly what I thought of his story, and of him for relating it.

The poor fellow's face fell and he walked away abashed. Unabashed, I scowled after him. Then I started packing the Studebaker preparatory to returning home, which did not take me long. I wished my friends goodbye, half-heartedly and rather abruptly, noticing that the man who had told me about the temple was not among them. In the usual hospitable Indian fashion, they pressed me even at that last moment to extend my stay. In answer I pressed the self-starter, shifted the car into gear, and drove away.

I had travelled quite six miles from Sampigehalli when I stopped the Studebaker, switched off the ignition and started to think clearly. I had behaved churlishly for no valid reason. After all, the man had only told me the story as he had heard it from others. It was I who had heard the whistling, had listened to the flapping of wings and seen the strange shadow. It was up to me to believe the tale, or reject it if I could find some better explanation. The sensible thing for me to do would be to try to make further investigation into the matter by talking to more people about it. Most sensible of all would be for me to spend another night at the well to see if the phenomenon was repeated. Instead of doing either of these things, I had acted like a child and cleared off in a huff.

So I turned the car and drove back to the village, where the first thing I did was to seek out my friend and apologize. He readily forgave me saying he understood how I had felt, and was all smiles again. In fact everybody smiled at my return till I told them that this time I had not come to hunt a tiger but a ghost—the evil spirit who lived down the well at the old temple.

At these words everybody stopped smiling. Then my friend said: 'Sir, I don't want to be rude, but please go back to Bangalore at once rather than do this foolish thing. You might escape from the tiger but not from the evil one.'

That evening, having nothing to fear from the tiger, I did not go to the old temple as early as I had done the previous afternoon. It was nearly six o'clock when I settled down in the place I had earlier occupied behind the parapet of the well. I had brought my rifle along with me in case the tiger should prove to be difficult, but as there was no particular need to keep silent on this occasion, I had allowed myself a large flask of tea, bread, butter and a tin of corned mutton and even some oranges to wind up with, not to mention my battered briar pipe.

There was no sign of the tiger as I settled myself, as quickly and as comfortably as possible, in my old position, arranging the torch, flask, water-bottle and other articles to right and left of me. He might have come out of his hiding place in the holy-of-holies of the temple before my arrival, although I did not think that was likely. In this conjecture I proved to be right. The time was a few minutes after seven and it was growing very cold. The nightjars had begun to call when a stone was dislodged inside the dark opening of the sanctuary and rolled loosely down the bank outside.

I knew the tiger was standing at the opening, looking out to see if it was safe enough to emerge. It might see me now, or might already have seen me; perhaps it remembered my presence at the parapet of the well the evening before. Precisely at that moment I heard the first whistle, loud, rather low and rather long-drawn-out, followed in quick succession by a louder, far higher and shorter whistle. After that there was absolute silence.

I remembered with a sense of shock that on the evening before, the whistling had begun just before the appearance of the tiger. The same thing had happened again. The thought came to me: could it be that the thing that whistled was trying to warn the tiger of my presence?

This notion was dispelled a moment later when the tiger emerged from the dark outline of the temple's entrance, first as an indistinct shape and then as an animal of immense proportions in the early light of the newly-risen moon.

As I had observed the evening before, for some unaccountable reason these loud whistles did not register on the tiger's hearing, although they were very clear to me. The fact was uncanny and was confirmed the next moment when the three successive whistles were repeated, more insistent and louder than ever. But the tiger took no notice of them. Then I began to hear the flapping of wings again, faintly and as from a distance. The source of the sound was at first difficult to place, till it was brought home to me, with an unpleasant shock, that it came from the bottom of the deep well in front of me.

Meanwhile the tiger was standing still, clearly visible in the early moonlight. It was staring fixedly in my direction. It was evident that the tiger now remembered having seen me there the previous night. I wanted to flash my torch down the well to discover the cause of the flapping sound, but this meant taking my eyes off the tiger, something I was rather reluctant to do. The rumour that this was a man-eater came to my mind once more with renewed force. Supposing this was a fact: I would be at its mercy if it should decide to attack me while I was looking down the well.

The three whistles, coming for the third time, with the closer approach of the flapping sound, got the better of my caution. A quick glance showed the tiger was still looking in my direction when I raised myself to my knees, thrust my head and shoulders over the parapet of the well, extended my right arm with the torch grasped in my hand as far as possible down the well and pressed the button. The bright beam cut into the inky depths, then lost itself in what looked to be a cloud of thick black smoke or vapour that was heaving some distance down the well.

Forgetful of the tiger I stared down the well, transfixed with curiosity, while the cloud that appeared to be issuing from the bottom, and was dense enough to prevent my torch-beam from penetrating it, rose inexorably towards me. It would not take long to reach the surface where I was crouching.

A loud snarl brought me back to an awareness of the danger I was in from the tiger. Quickly I shone the torch in the direction where it had been standing, while I groped for my rifle with the other. But the tiger was not there! Gratefully, I realized it had seen me and bounded away, the snarl I had heard being its protest at my intrusion. In a strange way I missed the tiger, for now I did not have a material antagonist to deal with, but something intangible with which I did not know how to cope. And I can tell you the thought was most unnerving.

The flapping came again; loud, heavy and near. The torchlight, which I directed into the well, showed that the eddying billows of the smoke-cloud were now scarcely five feet from the mouth of the well and that the rays of the torch could not penetrate them. They rose rapidly upwards and soon reached the face of my torch as I held it pointing downwards. My hand began to tremble violently so that the light danced crazily.

There seemed something indescribably evil about this vapour, and it brought a reaction I had never experienced before. Unlike normal smoke this mist eddied in dense, ribbon-like trails, resembling the coils of a giant snake of interminable length that twisted and wound around and around, in and out and about itself in a seething, restless, engulfing, devouring, never-ending movement.

Soon, it had reached my head and shoulders and engulfed me as I craned myself forward to look down the well. The cloud was far more dense than it had been the previous night, rather like a pea-soup fog that could almost be felt. I am by no means a squeamish person, but for the next few moments I did not know what was happening. The feeling is hard to describe. Perhaps to say that I was taken out of myself would be nearest to the mark, although I realize that such words hardly convey any meaning.

Once again I felt unutterably tired, forlorn, depressed, altogether without hope. A deep and urgent yearning came over me to jump over the parapet and into the well, once and for all to end my misery and unhappiness. It would be such an easy, such a pleasant ending, to the tortures and troubles and trials of living. Such an easy way out! So comfortable and soothing! So Soothing! So Soothing!

And then the gas, or smoke, or whatever it was, lifted. Rather, it cleared the parapet of the well and rose above my head as a dense, heavy, whirling cloud. With its lifting my mind cleared too and I was back to earth once more, remembering in amazement my recent dismal thoughts of throwing myself into the well. The cloud rose higher and higher and thinned out as it mixed with the air. I watched it in my torchlight for a full ten minutes, by which time it must have risen to perhaps fifty feet or more, when it dispersed and I could see it no more.

I put out the torch and sat back to ponder the strange phenomenon. The words of my friend and the story he had told me came back in forceful recollection. I pondered again upon the tale of evil and vengeance, and I remembered with dismay the odd feeling of careless lassitude that had overcome me as the vapour engulfed me and passed over my head: the feeling of despair, and the comforting temptation to end all my troubles merely by jumping down the well into oblivion. I had almost, in fact, fallen a victim to the age-old curse myself. It gave me quite a jolt, I can assure you, to realize that but a few moments earlier I was dispassionately contemplating suicide.

Then there were other aspects of the occurrence that defied explanation. The three strange whistles in quick succession; the unaccountable sound of flapping wings; the fact that the tiger could not hear these sounds; and strangest of all, that the weird thing, or whatever it was that came from the well, assumed the appearance of a dark cloud.

I walked back to the forest bungalow for the second time, to seek the solace of the battered old armchair, more puzzled, more vexed in mind, more dissatisfied with myself than I had ever been before.

It was in this frame of mind that I finally drove away from Sampigehalli the next morning, after recounting my latest adventure to my village friends. All of them, without exception, had nodded and wagged their heads and repeated in varying phrases the same words, 'We told you so.' The man who had annoyed me the day before said in exultation, 'You were angry with me yesterday. Today you are indeed lucky to be alive. Fate spared you a second time from joining the others who have been drowned in that well. That was because your time had not yet come. But do not sit there for a third night, Sir. For then it might be your time and you will surely jump into the well.'

I might have argued with him and pointed out that, if indeed it was my fate to throw myself into the well on the third night, I would have been compelled to remain at Sampigehalli, whether he or I or anybody else wanted me to leave or not.

The Strange Case of The Gerhetti Leopard

Gerhetti is a tiny village of not even a dozen huts, lying A mile or so from the forest track that wandered in an almost southerly direction from Anchetty to the larger village of Pennagram in the Salem district of Madras state.

It is only seven miles from Anchetty, but to reach Gerhetti your car has to descend the winding track at an almost impossible angle, guaranteed to impose a severe strain upon the best of braking systems, bump across a couple of very rocky streambeds that hold no water for over nine months in the year, and then clamber up an equally winding and impossible gradient. In the old days of the Model T Ford, which were my young days, it would give me childish and utter delight to sit at the steering wheel of my beloved 'Lissom Lizzie', the name painted in large letters upon her rear, press hard upon the left of the three pedals that controlled her, and attain the summit in clouds of steam, billowing from a red-hot engine and a boiling radiator.

On one occasion Lissom Lizzie climbed half-way up that gradient but could not climb any more. I was bound for the forest lodges of Muttur, a dozen miles beyond Gerhetti, where I had arranged with Byra, my aboriginal poojaree friend, to help to catch a crocodile that had become stranded in the Forest department well situated upon the banks of the Chinnar river, and I had to keep that appointment. What was I to do? Praise be to Henry Ford and the wonderful adaptability of the Model T. I turned the car round, placed the hand-lever to my right in a neutral position, pressed upon the centre pedal of the three (which was the reverse pedal in the Model T) and climbed that fearful gradient backwards with ease! The car was strained and so was my neck, but we made it.

A mile or so after reaching the top of the gradient, a narrower track veers to the right, the jungle crowding in upon both sides. Another mile along this track brings one to a water hole on the right side, immediately opposite the driveway leading to the Gerhetti Forest Lodge on the left. This is a delightful little bungalow which, in those days, had but one snag. It was always locked, the reason being that the caretaker, who was also carefree and careless, and did not give a damn anyway, was away on holiday, sometimes at Anchetty but more generally at Pennagram which, although poor of soil, was rich in girls.

And thereby hangs a tale.

In the old British days there was a district Forest Officer (D.F.O.) of the old school type in charge of this area. He had a double-barrelled name, was stickler for rules, and did not like me anyway. The cause of this dislike I could never fathom. Perhaps he disapproved of my wandering about the forests of which he had charge as if they were my own, and he showed his disdain, upon the few occasions I was unfortunate enough to have speak to him, by looking at me distantly, as if I were something the cat had left on the doorstep. This gentleman insisted that before occupying any of the Forest department bungalows in his area, I should apply for his permission and obtain the same in writing. As a matter of fact, this was the rule and still is. But ask anyone who has lived in India and he will agree with me that rules are made only to be broken. Everyone breaks them and enjoys the process. The stricter the rule, the more it has to be broken. At least, everyone seems to feel this way in India; and that being the case, why not I?

However, to avoid coming to grips unnecessarily with this man, I gave him on one occasion a full month's notice in advance, with my request for permission to occupy the Gerhetti Forest Lodge. As I possessed a shooting licence for the area, he could not very well refuse. Back came his written permission in due course, but along with it quite a substantial paragraph warning me not to try to break the rules and regulations in any way, not to cause a forest fire by throwing matches about, not to fail to pay the prescribed rent for the days I was in occupation and so forth.

The glad day dawned at last and I set forth in my Model T for Gerhetti. Fortunately, I had just reached the top of the ghat, when down came the rain in torrents. Model T's never worried about bad weather, and it took more than raindrops to stop a vehicle of that sturdy vintage. By the same standards they expected a passenger to care nothing too, for they were without adequate protection of the sides.

So I was soaking wet when I arrived at the front door of the Gerhetti lodge, to find it fast closed with a lock of outstanding size. And the carefree caretaker was away on his revels.

I had the written permission of the nasty D.F.O. to occupy the place. I had given him a month's notice. His office should have notified the caretaker to welcome me with open doors. Nevertheless, I was locked out. This old bounder, who was so hot upon other people keeping to the rules, had himself foundered! Besides, the rain was coming down in buckets, saturating me and my equipment.

So I staggered around the building and discovered that the bathroom door at the back was weak on its hinges. I put my shoulder to it and heaved it off its hinges. The door burst open, and that was how I got into the bungalow.

I camped at Gerhetti for the full week for which I had come, but in all that time the caretaker never showed up. Apparently his dates at Pennagram were more important. Then the time came for me to leave. The bathroom door, which had left its hinges 'by accident', could only be pulled to and closed. And there was no one present to receive the rent.

From Bangalore, I sent the rent by post to the D.F.O. and made out a strong case against his carefree caretaker. The storm, I claimed, had 'caused me, in seeking shelter, to slip and fall in the mud, whereupon in an effort to save myself my hand contacted the bathroom door. Unfortunately this mere pressure had caused the hinges, which were of ancient vintage, to give way and the door had opened'. The implication was that the security of this government building was not all it should be.

But the careless caretaker turned out to be less carefree than I had thought. He and his boss worked out as foul a plot as ever was hatched against an innocent, upright, law-abiding, Christian gentleman! The teak armchair from the bungalow and the zinc bathtub in the bathroom were missing. They had been stolen! Either I had stolen them, in which case I was liable under the rules to be prosecuted and jailed for breaking into a government building and stealing part of its furniture. Or my irresponsible action in breaking into the building had rendered it insecure and unsafe, whereafter theft of government property had inevitably ensued, for which I was entirely responsible. I was called upon to reply within seven days, whereafter very severe action was proposed to be taken against me. Not a word was said about the caretaker's absence.

I thought fast. Had the D.F.O. been a less unpleasant individual I would have offered to pay for the missing articles. As matters stood, any such offer would be pounced upon as a clear admission of guilt. Furthermore, no thief in India would go to such a benighted spot to steal an ancient armchair and leaky bathtub, both of which would be of no value, either for his own use or for sale to any villager.

Obviously, the articles had been removed by the carefree but crafty caretaker, or by order of the D.F.O. himself, in order to 'fix' me. I could hardly believe that an English officer would do this kind of thing, however much he disliked me. So the culprit was obviously the caretaker himself. He had done this as a retaliatory act against me, when called upon to explain his absence, as reported by me. But where could the articles be? He would not have tried to sell them, because that would have left a trail. So he must have hidden them.

The obvious answer was that he had hidden them in his girlfriend's house. So off I went to Pennagram and arrived after midnight, when all were asleep. I aroused my henchaman Ranga, put the case to him and asked him where we should start searching. The question also arose as to how the caretaker could have brought the two cumbersome articles from Gerhetti to Pennagram, a distance of twelve miles. Ranga offered the answer without hesitation. In a bullock-cart, carrying felled bamboos!

From the forest around Gerhetti there was a constant flow of bamboos to Pennagaram, where the Forest department had a timber depot. As an official of the service, although a very minor one, it would be easy for this caretaker to persuade a cartman or two to convey the articles, concealed under the bamboos in a cart, to Pennagram.

More fortunately, Ranga, who had once been a cartman himself, was well acquainted with his confreres. Late though the hour was, he set out to question those that were in town and returned by 4 a.m. to give me the good news that not only had he succeeded in finding two cart-drivers, each of whom had brought one of the articles in his conveyance, but had also found out where they were hidden.

This was an ungodly hour to awaken any solitary sentry, snugly asleep in a police station, but that is exactly what we did soon after. The constable was very indignant. Moreover, claiming to be alone in charge, he declared that he could not leave his post. But when a certain exchange had been made his conscience was softened. Leaving us in charge of the station, he hastened to the police lines and shortly returned with a confederate, who had dressed himself in full uniform as befitted the occasion. This policeman accompanied Ranga and myself to the tiny house occupied, I do admit, by an exceedingly becoming lass. I was obliged to admire the taste in women of the careless but carefree caretaker. But, more important at that moment, there was the old teak armchair and the zinc bathtub, as large as life in a corner of her tiny abode.

The poor girl was arrested and the two articles removed to the police station. Later that morning the sub-inspector (S.I.) arrived, and to him I submitted two written documents. The first was a letter of complaint regarding the theft, backdated by a few days. The second a letter of appreciation, commending and congratulating the S.I. He was delighted. I asked him, as a favour, to release the girl and capture the caretaker; but looking at me with disapproving eyes, he said he could not do that, for the girl was 'an accessory after the fact', even if she was a comely wench.

To the D.F.O. my lawyer sent a notice for defamation claiming a fabulous sum as damages, with a copy to the Chief Conservator of Forests at Madras. But time was kind to the poor fellow. He was on the verge of retirement anyhow and he disappeared overnight on furlough, from which he never returned. What gave me the greatest satisfaction, however, was the 'armchair' detection I had displayed in identifying the culprit.

You must forgive me for this digression, but my excuse is the need to let you know that even in the jungles we have our problems. India is a country that demands of its inhabitants a sharpness of wit. And this brings me to another tale.

Ticketless train-travel in India is rife. To try to combat it, the authorities institute many checks, so that in the course of even a short journey one my be required to show one's ticket to 'travelling ticket inspectors' a number of times. Now, an acquaintance of mine who emigrated from India to the U.K. was agreeably surprised to find that there were no ticket-checks on the suburban line on which he travelled to work daily. So he bought no ticket and travelled free for some months until one day he was caught.

All this, however, has nothing whatever to do with the strange leopard I meant to tell you about.

About two furlongs behind the forest lodge at Gerhetti is the small hamlet of the same name, consisting of half a dozen huts. The occupants are woodcutters, who earn a supplementary wage by working as coolies for the Forest department, repairing the road, stealing sandalwood and timber when they can, and poaching deer in the summer months when there is no water in the jungle and the animals come late at night to drink at the water hole which, I have already told you, stands a short distance in front of the lodge at the point where the 'driven-in' turns away from the main track.

The people in this hamlet had a few sheep—keeping goats in a forest area was strictly forbidden in British days, due to the destruction wrought by these animals upon seedlings— and a few fowl. There had been some cattle, but tigers and panthers had wiped them out.

The leopard in this story, being an animal of only average size, had begun its depredations by stealing a fowl here and there when they wandered from the huts to feed among the fallen leaves at the edge of the jungle. The next stage was reached when the leopard decided to go further, raiding the hut in which the fowls were kept by creeping through the wall of thorns and eating up as many as possible, killing or severely injuring the rest of the birds just for fun. It now had to turn to the sheep, there being nothing else to eat, and these it started killing one by one, whenever opportunity offered. I had been told about this leopard, but as it was reported to be quite a harmless beast—indeed, almost friendly in its habits—I had thought no more about it.

The first time I laid eyes on this animal was about 4-30 one evening. I was reclining in the armchair on the veranda of the lodge, sipping tea, when a movement at the water hole, the farther bank of which was visible from where I was sitting, caught my attention. The sun was shining brightly and the day had been a hot one. Normally, no wild animal would be afoot. The movement came again and some yellow object thrust itself out from the wall of reeds that bordered the pool. I could not make out what it was.

Perhaps a minute later, without perceptible further movement, the object turned into a panther as it emerged fully from behind the reeds. It was gazing fixedly towards the forest bungalow, knowing no doubt that if there was any danger about, it would be in this direction. I did not move in my chair. After a close scrutiny that lasted perhaps three minutes, the leopard decided all was safe. It stooped to drink, but stopped twice to look up at the bungalow to make sure that all was well.

The second time I saw this animal was when it chased a junglecock into a tree. I was returning from an early-morning prowl when the junglecock emitted its shrill alarm cry a few yards ahead and flapped heavily upwards.

'Cekh! Cekh! Cekh! Cekh!' screeched the cock, and I halted in my tracks. No doubt it had seen or heard me. But I was wrong, for an instant later a panther bounded out of the undergrowth and raced after the bird, to clamber quickly but futilely up the tree on which it had settled. The junglecock screeched again and this time flew far away, while the leopard, warned that all was not well, turned its head to look back sharply.

That was when it saw me. Releasing its hold, the panther fell back lightly to the ground, arched its back for a moment while curling its tail high above, for all the world like a friendly tabby, then turned and padded silently away, disappearing in the bushes.

The third time I saw this animal under peaceful circumstances was when I was chugging along in my Model T. I had passed the Gerhetti bungalow and the water hole, and was continuing along the track which, it will be remembered, branches off from the main route to Muttur and Pennagram.

No cars came that way in those days and bullockcarts were few. Cattle passed now and again, in the hot weather when the forest had dried up, on their way to the village of Natrapalayam and the Cauvery river, seven or eight miles away, where there was still some grazing to be had. The few people living in this area carried their loads on their heads or, when these were too heavy, on the backs of ponies or donkeys, the latter for preference because they were cheaper. The branches of the trees met above the narrow trail, for which reason the already tattered hood of the Model T had to be put down and the windshield lowered. Nevertheless, it was often needful to lie sideways on the front seat to allow a bough to scrape over the steering wheel.

Turning a sharp corner, I saw close ahead a fairly stout branch extending across the track, and lying along this bough was a panther that had evidently taken up this position in the hope of being able to ambush any animal passing beneath. It had not heard the car as I had been coursing downhill, semidepressing the left-hand pedal of Lissom Lizzie that served as gear-cum-clutch.

The panther rose on the branch when I was almost beneath it, then panicked and sprang clumsily, clearing the rear seat but landing on the back of the car, from where it took off again into the bushes, but not before the claws of its hind feet, in finding a purchase to make that second leap, tore a gaping hole in the already tattered upholstery.

There is a village along this track named Jungalpalayam. It is about half-way between Gerhetti and Natrapalayam, being two and a half miles from each. I knew it as the 'happy village', for the folks living in this hamlet, although far from civilization, medical help, schools, places of amusement and so-called cooperative centres that never seem to cooperate in anything, were always contented and laughing. It did one good to visit this little place and chat with its inhabitants. They seemed singularly free from the political consciousness that is such a dominating factor in India.

Each month, when the moon is at its full, and on two days before and two days after, the villagers would play games in the moonlight, commencing an hour or so after their evening meal, which might be at about eight o'clock, and continuing till midnight. Modesty forbade that the men and women should play together, so the women would form a circle in the centre of the village, while the men would go to the village threshing floor, a cleared space about fifty yards to one side of the hamlet. The women would mostly sing and dance, while the men played a variety of games, the most popular of which was balchik or kabbaddee, although in this particular hamlet it was known as goddoogoddoo, a form of the popular game of salts, played widely throughout India.

The rules of this game are simple. A straight line is drawn with charcoal on the ground, and two teams of from five to seven members each assemble on either side. Play starts when by a member from, let us say, Team A (although the villagers call the teams by such names as 'frogs', grasshoppers', or even less complimentary ones like 'illegitimates' or 'bastards') approaches the base line, muttering repeatedly and rapidly the word kabbaddee (or goddoogoddoo), crosses it while still muttering incessantly, audibly, and with his fingertips lightly touches a member of Team B (perhaps called the 'impotents' or 'eunuchs' or some other rude name), then springs back to the charcoal base line before any of the members of Team B can hold him down.

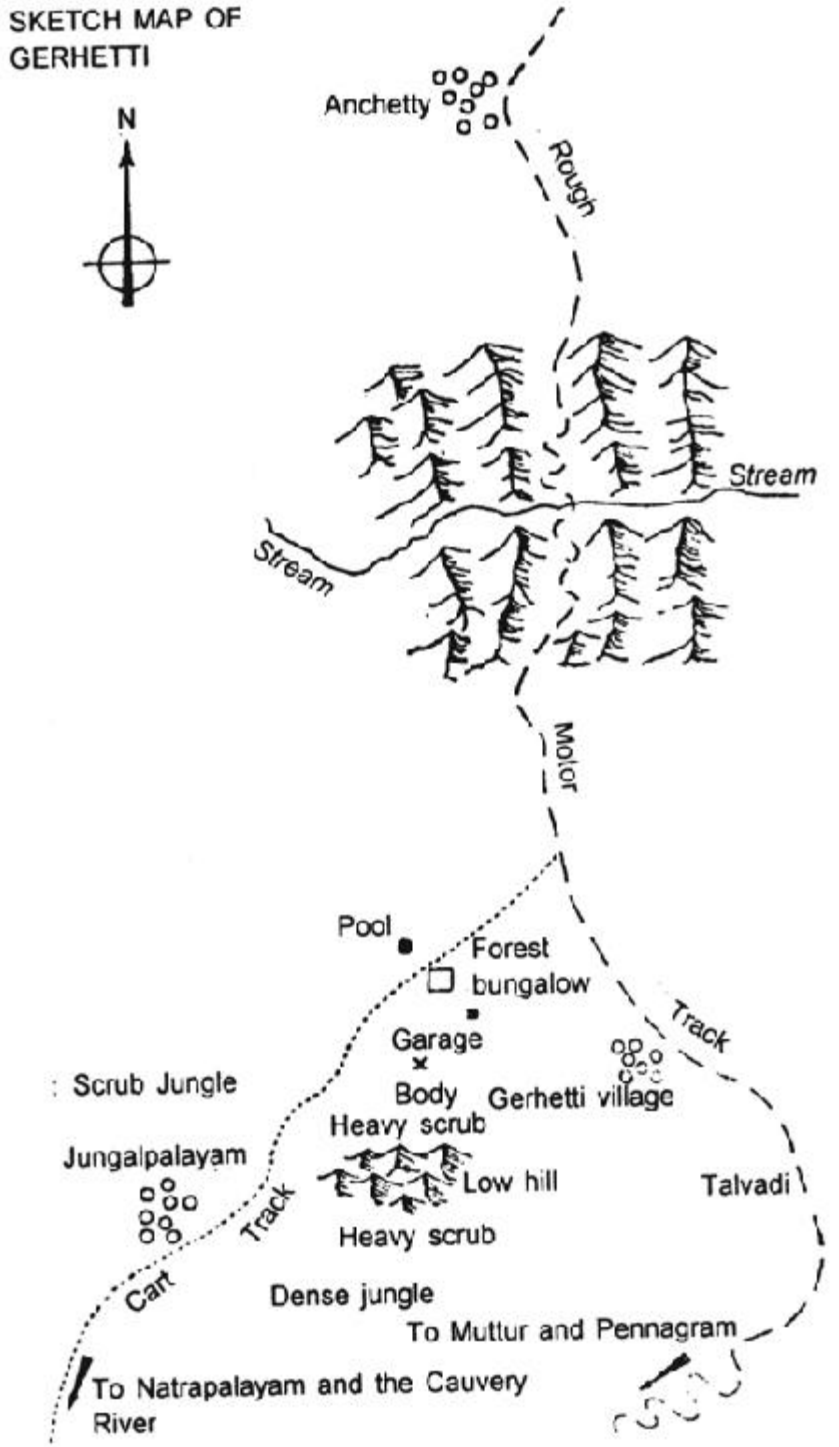
The point is that the man from Team A must keep on muttering kabbaddee (or goddoogoddoo) loudly and without ceasing. Should a member or more of Team B succeed in grabbing him and holding him down, so that he cannot get back to the charcoal base line, a point is lost to his team also.

After the man from Team A has scored a success or failure, as the case may be, the turn of approaching the line falls to a man from Team B, and so on. The winning side is that which first attains a predetermined number of points, usually twenty-one. Sometimes a small bet is attached to the result, each member of a side ending up by winning—or losing— half a rupee in the course of the evening, somewhat less than a shilling.



On many a moonlight night have I joined the villagers of Jungalpalayam in a game of goddoogoddoo. I was a young man in those days and as hard as nails. Nevertheless, muttering goddoogoddoo aloud without stop, while dodging to avoid eager, agile, clutching village youths, would leave my lungs at bursting point. The women would cease their singing and dancing to gather around and witness the discomfiture of the dorai, which invariably happened, although the side on which I played would claim I was no liability to them, in order to make me feel at home. I would walk or motor back to Gerhetti in the early hours of the morning with the moon setting behind the jungleclad hills to the west, often horrified to find myself muttering ' goddoogoddoo—goddoogoddoo' automatically.

It was then the leopard struck! Evidently the branch overhanging the track from Gerhetti to Jungalpalayam, on which I had surprised it, was a favourite ambush for this animal, for it launched itself one day from this very bough upon a donkey laden with tamarind-fruit packed into two sacks, one on each side, which the donkey's owner was taking to market at Pennagram. The man had stopped to pluck and munch a wild wood-apple nut and the donkey had turned the bend in the track fifty yards ahead, when the thud of a falling body and a hoarse gurgling sound were heard.

Not associating the noise with any calamity to his donkey, the man feared an elephant might be ahead of him. For this reason, he approached the corner slowly, while keeping a sharp lookout all round. But to his horror he saw his poor donkey dead and dragged to one side of the track, with the panther crouched against its belly, its fangs still buried in the donkey's throat, enjoying the warm blood that trickled from the severed vein.

Then the man, who ordinarily would have run away and indeed was already prepared to run from the elephant he expected to see, lost his temper and rushed at the panther whirling the stave he held in his hand. The leopard, excited by the kill it had just made, with the warmth of its victim against him and the warmer blood trickling through its jaws, was in no mood to relinquish his feast. In fact, I suppose it actually had no opportunity to do so before the angry man was upon him.

The stave thudded down across the panther's back and the panther leapt upon the man seeking for his throat, but being diverted by the long black beard this villager had grown, bit the man's chest instead. The man lost his balance, toppled backwards, and began to scream.

I happened to have come to Gerhetti at that time, but was far away at the moment, on the slopes of a hillside behind the hamlet, searching for a particular kind of beetle for my cousin who is an ardent collector. I heard those screams faintly, and thinking some man was being done to death by an elephant, ran in their direction. Most regrettably, I had left my rifle in the forest lodge. People who go catching beetles do not ordinarily carry firearms, and there was no danger to be envisaged in the area at the time from a man-eater or rogue elephant.

The screams I had heard so faintly had stopped by now, so that I was left guessing as to the point of their origin; but working on the belief that an elephant had attacked a man, I guessed that whatever had happened had taken place somewhere along the track to Jungalpalayam. So I ran in its general direction, stumbling through undergrowth and between bushes and trees till at last I reached the track.

There was nothing to be seen. Should I turn right or left? The sound had seemed so far away that I decided to turn towards Jungalpalayam and veered left, padding along as noiselessly as possible and expecting to come upon an enraged elephant at any moment.

Calling aloud but receiving no answer, I had traversed the better part of a furlong when I came upon the victim lying beside his dead donkey. The panther had left him; perhaps his screams had frightened the animal away, or may be at this, its first encounter with one of the human race, the leopard still felt some of its inherent fear of man. The man's eyes flickered open when I called to him and he managed to tell me his name was Subramaniam, that he had come from Pennagram for tamarind, and of how the panther had come to attack him. Then he lost consciousness. I lifted him over my shoulder with the intention of carrying him to the forest lodge, from whence I could take him in my car to hospital at Bangalore.

Alas, I had just reached the bungalow and laid him on the floor of the veranda, when he began to show signs of imminent death, while blood began to pour from his mouth and the terrible wounds in his chest. It was clear that his lungs had been punctured, and as I picked him up again to put him in my car he died. I will not dwell on the trouble I had in telling the authorities all that had happened, but while proceedings were still going on I returned to warn the people of Gerhetti, Jungalpalayam and Natrapalayam that the leopard might possibly turn dangerous.

Surprisingly enough, nothing happened for some months. Then the dreaded epidemic of cholera came to Pennagram and from there spread far and wide, even as far as Natrapalayam. Two or three persons died in this remote village, and because they had died of an infectious disease the villagers threw the bodies into the jungle to rot instead of burying or burning the corpses as in the normal way.

Perhaps the panther ate some of this flesh, although no one knew for certain, as no one would be bold enough to go near such a corpse. Otherwise the advent of the man-eater and the reason for the animal becoming one are shrouded in mystery.

The trouble began when a boy who had gone to the water hole at Gerhetti with his pitcher did not return. There was no reason for his absence other than supposed idleness, so his father went to look for him in the evening, carrying a stout stick to lay across the boy's back while he was still asleep. The father found his son's broken water-pot, dropped when it was full and therefore upon the return journey. He saw the boy's blood on the grass and the imprint of a panther's pugs where it had been walking down the main track before it saw the boy and pounced upon him from the wayside. A drag-mark indicated in which direction the body had been taken.

Panthers being far smaller, shorter and weaker than tiger, are unable to carry away their kills clear of the ground. They have to drag their dead victims along, for which reason they do not go far before starting to eat. Tigers, which are not only taller but immeasurably stronger, are able to lift a victim as heavy as a buffalo clear of the ground. Moreover, when a tiger intends to take its kill to some distant spot before starting to eat, it seizes its prey by the neck and, with a quick turn of its head, throws the dead body over its back, thereby supporting the weight evenly on all four legs. In this manner, tigers have been known to carry their kills for great distances, so that in the case of a man-eating tiger, their human kills, as often as not, cannot be found.

Returning to my story: the father hastened back to Gerhetti hamlet, called on its few inhabitants for help and, armed with sticks and stones, the small party followed the drag-mark. They had not far to go. What was left of the boy lay under a bush just on the other side of the water hole.

From that day nobody would move alone in the jungle. At least four men would form a party, arming themselves with wood-choppers, axes or stout staves. The news spread to Jungalpalayam, Natrapalayam, Pennagram and Anchetty. Everyone was on the lookout for the panther.

Strangely enough, the theft of an occasional fowl or sheep by a leopard still went on. Most of the people in the area had, at one time or the other, seen the harmless panther I had myself encountered upon three occasions, so nobody associated it with the animal that had struck the tamarind-merchant down and had later devoured the boy. The man-eater was thought to be some passing beast, or a leopard that had become inordinately hungry to the verge of starvation, due to sickness or wounds. A few even subscribed to the notion that the panther was mad, having eaten of the cholera corpses. For man-eaters in this region were practically unknown; there had been a couple of man-eating tigers in the past, but they had operated far away, in the region of Kempekerai. As for a man-eating panther, nobody could remember having heard of one.

A third victim followed the boy, this time a woman who was returning from the well after bathing her two-year-old child. The water in this well was very brackish and could not be used for drinking or cooking; it could be used only for washing purposes. Unaccountably the leopard did not touch the child, contenting itself with killing the mother and dragging her corpse into a nullah a few yards beyond the well. The wails of the infant attracted the villagers, who went to investigate.

With this tragedy, the alarm spread in right earnest far and wide. Woodcutting and all traffic in the jungle came to a dead stop, and the poachers who by night haunted the few water-holes in the forest put away their muskets and vintage muzzle-loaders until the advent of more propitious times.

My tenant at Anchetty, a young man named Narayan who cultivated the small plot of land I own there but has never bothered to pay rent, brought me the news, with a request from the patel of Anchetty, who was also nominally the head of the Gerhetti hamlet, to come and shoot the panther. I was tied up with urgent work at Bangalore just then and told Narayan I would come in a week, sending him back with a message to the patel to this effect, and an additional word of warning to the people of Gerhetti to move about only in groups and never alone. Man-eating panthers as a rule, being inherently cowardly, attack only under cover of darkness, unlike the man-eating tiger, which is braver and bolder and attacks at any time. In this respect the Gerhetti leopard was different; it had taken all its three victims in broad daylight.

On the day before I arrived at Gerhetti the panther struck for the fourth time, and the victim turned out to be the son of the bungalow-watcher, that carefree character who had tried to frame me with the armchair and bathtub. The panther took its victim in the early hours of the morning.

After the affair of the bathtub and armchair, the father had lost his job with the Forest department and had become a minor forest contractor, purchasing at public auction the right to gather fruit, various medicinal seeds and leaves, henna, honey, deers' horns that had been shed, and other lesser items. In this business the son played an active part, and at the time of his death the lad had come to Gerhetti to induce some of the poojarees living there to help him to raid the combs of the wild rock-bees that had hung their hives on the higher rock-faces of a low mountain named Periyamalai, some four miles from Gerhetti.

The lad, whose name was Nataraj, had successfully accomplished his mission and had succeeded in gathering some four or five kerosene tins of this wild honey. On an average, each of these tins held the equivalent of twenty-four bottles of honey, each of which in turn would sell for three rupees. The trip would thus earn him about three hundred rupees.

Well satisfied, he returned with the tins to Gerhetti, where he decided to spend the night, as rumours had reached the hamlet that a herd of wild elephants had recently come up from the Cauvery river and were roaming in the ravines of Talvadi, through which the road to the market at Pennagram passed. Nataraj had no intention of risking his precious honey by exposing it to wild elephants.

The forest lodge (the one from which his father had taken the furniture) was locked, but the garage was open: in fact, it had no doors! So Nataraj decided to spend the night in the garage, along with his tins of honey.

In the early hours of the morning, the people in the hamlet of Gerhetti said they heard his screams for help, but being few in number and moreover unarmed, they fastened the doorways of their huts more securely and waited for dawn. With daylight, a number of them eventually came to the garage to see what had happened. Nataraj was nowhere to be seen. Signs of a struggle were evident. There was blood on the earthen floor and one of the tins of honey had been overturned, attracting thousands of ants. There was also the impression of something heavy having been dragged across the ground and out of the open door into the jungle, which began ten yards behind.

The panther had not bothered to take him very far. His head, arms and legs, the portions that a panther, and even a man-eating tiger, is rather fastidious about and leaves for a later meal, lay scattered about in mute testimony of the panther's appetite. Rather small, as the pugs indicated the marauder to be, it had eaten a lot of meat.

I arrived at Gerhetti at ten that morning and was in time to see the remains before the police turned up from Anchetty and began their tedious and fruitless questioning. Why had I come? they asked. Had I an arms licence? A gun licence? A car licence? A driver's licence? Any question but those that concerned the panther.

I asked them to leave the remains where they were and go away as soon as possible, since this would give me a chance of sitting over what was left of Nataraj and perhaps shooting the man-eater. There was a possibility that it might return in the afternoon, and there was also the probability that it would return after dark.

The daffedar (head-constable or sergeant), who represented the party in the absence of his Sub-Inspector, flatly refused. He said the remains would have to stay where they were till his boss could see them for himself. And as he had to return to Anchetty, he would leave the two constables who had accompanied him to watch over these remains till the Sub-Inspector turned up, later in the evening perhaps, more probably the next morning.

At hearing the daffedar's words, there was unanimous disapproval of his scheme by his subordinates. One of them stated with some heat that he had not eaten his breakfast that morning, and certainly could not wait for it till next day. The other man pleaded that he was suffering from a servere cold. To this the daffedar rejoined that he had not heard him cough even once that day. Whereupon the constable coughed prolongedly!

Orders are orders, the daffedar affirmed sternly, and stalked away, to mount his bicycle and ride away to Anchetty. The two policemen stared at each other and at me, till I made them a sign in unspoken, but otherwise universally known language, that gave them the general idea; 'chins up, boys; every cloud has a silver lining'. At least this one did for them, and in a very literal sense, for with the daffedar's departure the two policemen were only too willing themselves to depart even if it was only as far as the nearby hamlet. Anything to get out of this dreadful place, away from those blank, staring eyes in the dead, accusing face. I was left to my own devices and the immediate problem of finding somewhere to hide and await the killer's possible return.

As so frequently happens there was no place that offered concealment. This is understandable as man-eaters—both tigers and panthers—carry or drag their kills into sheltered, dense undergrowth in order that they may enjoy their meal undisturbed. They do not leave their kills under some convenient tree from which they can be shot! There was a thick growth of lantana bushes and the panther had dragged the body of its victim between two of these bushes, where it had eaten most of it. Any attempt at constructing a hide in the vicinity would stick out like a sore thumb, and the panther would never put in an appearance. All said and done, my contemplated ambush seemed out of the question.

I thought and thought, and finally came up with an idea. It is rather difficult to describe, so I have produced a sketch which I hope may convey some notion of my scheme.

To the north of the spot where lay what was left of Nataraj was the forest lodge and the garage. To the east, not very far away, stood the hamlet and more or less open ground. To the west was light scrub, through which led the path from Gerhetti to Jungalpalayam. To the south was heavier scrub, flanked by a low hill. I had already walked along the path to the western side. No tracks of the panther coming or going showed on the sandy surface. So the man-eater had come from the hillock to the south and had returned that way.

My plan was to hide in the garage till I could hear it eating—at least I hoped I would be able to hear it. Then I would tiptoe out of the garage to the front of the bungalow, down the pathway to Jungalpalayam, and cut back from it to get between the panther and the hillock, in which direction I was sure the feline would beat its retreat.

Finally, when in a satisfactory position, I would throw some stones (previously gathered and kept ready in my pocket) as hard as possible in the direction of the garage, hoping the missile would sail over the feasting feline and fall beyond it. This would frighten it and cause it to come bounding blindly towards its only line of retreat, southwards towards the hillock, where I would be in hiding and awaiting it. Panthers have no sense of smell, so it would not be able to scent me while I tiptoed down the pathway. But they have acute hearing and it might hear me if I made the slightest sound. That was a risk I would have to take.

As an afterthought, I decided to tear up the khaki shirt I was wearing and hang strips of it on the bushes bordering the pathway, so that if the leopard did happen to break in that direction (towards the west), the sight of these strips of cloth fluttering in the breeze might turn it back again towards the south, the hillock—and me! It would not break towards the east because of the hamlet, or towards the north, as the bungalow stood there.

I do not usually tear up my shirts, particularly when wearing nothing underneath, but there was no alternative, as I was carrying no rags of any kind and the spare shirt I had brought in the car was a shade better than the one upon my back. So I removed my shirt and tore it into long narrow strips. In this way, I made some eight or ten lengths which I proceeded to tie to the lantana and other bushes bordering the pathway. They were out of sight of where the panther would be eating, but it would immediately spot them if it decided to break westwards towards the pathway, when I began throwing my stones from that direction. It would have been better if the strips had been of white or coloured material, rather than khaki, but one does not wear a white shirt when hunting.

Lastly, I went to the little hamlet to the east of the bungalow and cautioned its inhabitants, including the two constables, not to stir out for the rest of the day. I could hardly tell you my advice was unnecessary. With the killing and eating of Nataraj within a few yards of their huts, the inmates had already shut themselves up as securely as they could.

So that it should not be in the view of the panther, I pushed the Model T in which I had come to the front of the forest lodge. From there it was out of sight of the garage and any panther that might show itself from behind. And I took all the things I had in the car in the form of bedding, food, water, and the shotgun that I had brought as a spare weapon, into the garage. Here I would stay till daylight the following morning, hoping against hope that the leopard would return to what was left of its meal.

All this had taken up to half an hour to noon, and the sun blazed down mercilessly on the dry forest that throbbed to the sound of the cicadas, the cooing of the lesser speckled doves, and the calls of the black-bodied and orange-winged crow-pheasant that was diligently searching for birds' eggs, lizards and caterpillars by the edge of the jungle a few paces away.

The hours dragged by and the heat grew more intense, rising from the ground in shimmering waves. Even the crow-pheasant "felt it and gave up his search, although the tireless cicadas continued to drone out their monotonous dirge.

The hours came and went while I strained my ears for the sound of crunching bones that would announce the killer's return. Not a sound did I hear other than the scream of a king vulture high in the sky. It must have spotted the remains long ago, but being those of a human being the 'king' had delayed its earthwards plunge that would be an invitation to all other vultures for miles around to foregather for a feast.

Five o'clock came, bringing a noticeable cooling of the atmosphere and a sharpening of the vulture's appetite. It delayed no longer, but plummeted to earth with the rattling rush of the wind through the tough feathers of its outstretched wings, to land with a faint thud in the vicinity of the kill. Soon other vultures would follow and nothing would be left of the panther's kill beyond cleanly-picked bones. The leopard, if it should come that night, would find nothing to eat and would wander away!

Four or five vultures joined the king at intervals, although the huge birds still hesitated to begin their meal. Nataraj's head, being left intact with its staring eyes, kept them away.

Time dragged by, and with the advent of evening the chorus of roosting birds began its tumultuous farewell to the day that is music to the ears of those who love the jungle. 'Kuck-kya-kya-khuckm!' crowed junglecocks from the foot of the hillock; 'Kee-kok! Kee-kok! Kee-kok!' challenged a partridge higher up, and 'Kee-kok-kok! Kee-kok-kok! Kee-kok-kok!' came his rival's reply from the summit of the hill. 'Wack! Wack! kuker-rawack!' growled spurfowl to each other, while far away a peacock joined the chorus 'Zank! Mia! Mia! Mia-oo-ow!'

There cames a heavy flapping of wings as the 'king' and its equally cowardly companions rose ponderously from the ground to perch on some neighbouring tree. They would wait till morning and their appetites would certainly be sharpened.

Darkness began to fall; there was a deep silence that could almost be felt. Then 'Chuck! Chuck! Chuck! Chuck-ooooo!' trilled the nightjar and 'Whooo! Whooo! Whooo!' hooted a horned owl. I fixed the two clamps that held my torch firmly to the barrel of my rifle and adjusted the beam to form a spot. Soon after that it was night. The leopard had not put in an appearance and my deeply-laid scheme appeared to be coming to naught.

I will not weary you with a description of the half-dozen hours that followed. Indeed, there is nothing to tell you, for nothing happened. The moon, that was now on the wane, had risen late, and should the panther come to its kill I would not be able to follow my plan, for the night would not be bright enough to see it when it came bounding up the hillside after being frightened by the stones I was going to throw. I would either have to let it eat, or to try creeping up on it, something that would be very difficult to accomplish and was not at all to my liking.

With these reflections I must have dozed off. Then something awoke me with a start. I could not say what it was. It was not a sound I could hear, but a feeling of deadly peril seemed to close over me. It was oppressive and heavy; it could almost be felt.

For a moment I put it down to imagination, but the sense of danger remained and became very real. It seemed to close down upon me. Without doubt something, somewhere, was threatening me.

Then I realized what it was. The man-eater was close by! That strange sixth sense that I have felt in times of extreme peril, and was to save my life so may times thereafter, was telling me as if in spoken words that the leopard was about to attack.

I closed my hands over my .405 and, without moving, I strained my eyes to look in every direction. Moonlight framed the rectangular doorway of the garage, with the rear of the forest bungalow in the centre of the scene. Then something moved ever so slightly at the bottom left-hand corner of this moonlit screen. Something black and slightly undulating. I could not quite see what it was, because it lay within the area of darkness thrown by the garage in which I was hiding and only the background of dim moonlight had drawn my attention to the faint movement near by.

The shadow moved ever so slightly and the faintest hissing sound reached my straining ears. A cobra? Or could it be the man-eater?

Luckily I had made not the least movement. Had I done so, the creature might have attacked when it realized that it had been discovered in its attempt to surprise me. But now movement—and very quick movement at that—was called for.

Springing to my feet I threw myself backwards, and was brought to an abrupt halt by the wall behind me. At the same time, I pointed the muzzle of my rifle forwards and pressed the switch of the torch. Although the beam blinded it, the man-eater launched its attack.

In describing the few moments that followed, I should write humbly and with a sense of gratitude. For it is not well to boast that 'with one shot I killed it', for any person even with a rudimentary experience of wild animals will tell you that a sambar can carry nine bullets in its body and move for miles, a bison fifteen, a wild elephant sometimes twenty-five, and a tiger or panther a great many before it falls dead. And it can tear you to pieces before it dies.

Then again the cartridge may be a dud, the cap may misfire, or the animal may turn aside just as you fire. Anything can happen. Suffice it to say that my bullet hit its mark by sheer luck and killed the leopard even while it was in midair, although to make certain I fired two more into the writhing body at my feet.

The sub-inspector arrived creditably early next morning. He was not happy to find that most of Nataraj's bones, including his head, had been taken away by the hyenas and jackals during the night.

The Lakkavalli Man-Eater

If you were to visit the township of tarikere in the western parts of Mysore state, you would find two motorable roads open to you. On these, at a distance of not more than four or five miles from the town itself, if you had the time to stop and listen, you would hear many stories from the villagers about the depredations of tigers.

The first of these roads leads roughly southwestwards from Tarikere, passing in a curve through the village of Lingadhalli, to the south of the high horseshoe range of mountains known as the Baba Budans, crossing its lower slopes at the hamlet of Santaveri, and continuing to the town of Chikmagalur, about twenty miles away.

The second road leads northwestwards, passing the eastern and northeastern slopes of those same mountains, before curving through two hamlets, named Lakkavalli and Umblebyle, to the town of Bhadravati which itself is barely ten miles from Tarikere, by a third and more direct road.

The first and second roads in this way circumvent the southern and eastern slopes of the Baba Budan range, and the tigers that cross the hump of the mountains from the deep valley to the west and north, ringed in by these mountains, find themselves either in the vicinity of the hamlet of Santaveri on the southern road, or in the area known as the Laulbagh, west of the eastern road.

These should be kept well in mind: the hamlet of Santaveri and the area known as the Laulbagh. For it was at these places and in the area between them that the adventure with the tiger, about which you are now going to hear, took place. Santaveri, at the height of 4,500 feet above sea level, is a rocky, wild and thickly forested region, while the Laulbagh, perhaps thirty to thirty-five miles away as the crow flies, although more than a thousand feet lower and far less rocky, is correspondingly more thickly forested.

I happened to be visiting my old friend, Dick Bird, who was the postmaster at Santaveri and in private life one of the most famous tiger-hunters in the district, having shot all his tigers with a .12 bore shotgun, spurning the use of a rifle.

'Jock,' he asked me, 'have you heard about the tiger that has turned up around Kemangundi?'

I should explain that Kemangundi is about half-way between Santaveri and the Laulbagh area, and that Dick always calls me 'Jock'. For I have lived in so many places and hunted in so many forests and in so many different climates, with different fauna and flora, and have done so many different things, that I have become a sort of Jekyll and Hyde with a variety of names and nicknames. Very old friends call me 'Jock', 'Scotchie', or 'Scotch', while those met more recently address me as 'Andy', 'Kenneth', 'Ken' and 'KDS'.

At school they called me 'Snake Charmer', because of my fondness for producing these reptiles from inside my shirt and releasing them in such places as Sunday school, the school chapel, the classroom, the dining and study halls, and in cinemas and other congested spots. This was long ago, of course, and I have not been addressed as 'Snake Charmer' for some years, having dropped the habit of releasing the reptiles in public.

Most embarrassing of all, young Dudhwalla, my son's friend, insists upon calling me 'Dot'. Personally, I do not see the least resemblance or slightest connection between myself and 'any small mark with a pen or sharp point', which the dictionary gives as the meaning of 'dot'. So, because of the variety of names by which I am addressed, and being somewhat absentminded, I occasionally become confused and look around for the party addressed.

But to return to Dick's question.

'No,' I replied, 'I haven't been in the area for quite a while. I used to operate a lot in Salem district, as you know, but have had to extend my wanderings to the Nilgiris and into Andhra state. Tigers are still plentiful there.'

'Well, there are quite a few still,' Dick continued. 'But ordinary ones. You know, cattle-lifters. Snatch and grab beasts that haunt the cattle-herds. The animal I have mentioned appears to be a little different, though.'

He then went on to explain that reports from herdsmen stated a very large tiger had recently formed the habit of attacking their herds even while they were still on the roads and being driven to the grazing grounds. Before their very eyes it would seize and kill the fattest and choicest cow and carry her off, slung over its shoulders. This had happened several times and but a few miles from Santaveri itself, on the road I have told you about that led from Tarikere to Chikmagalur. The same sort of thing was reported to have taken place on another, smaller road, leading to a hillock named Kemangundi, which branched off the main Tarikere-Chikmagalur road shortly after passing through the village of Lingadhalli.

Dick went on to relate that two or three herdsmen had attempted to defend their charges by trying to frighten the tiger into relinquishing the carcase of the victim as it was carrying it away, by shouting and throwing stones.

They had soon desisted, however, when this tiger, instead of leaving the carcase and running away, had dropped the cow and charged in their direction—whereupon they had fled. Investigations later showed that the tiger had returned after chasing the herdsmen away, picked up the cow and made off with it. This tiger seemed to favour carrying its victim sluing across its shoulders rather than holding it by the neck or throat and dragging it along the ground.

We discussed this point and agreed that the indications were that either the tiger was an exceptionally bold animal— perhaps an old male—or that it intended carrying the carcase a long way before devouring it, perhaps to some distant cave, or other lair, should it happen to be a tigress with cubs. The animal was wise enough to realize that dragging its kill for a long distance would entail getting it caught in bushes and thorns; it therefore preferred to lift the carcase bodily.

'If only I would get some leave in this damned department,' Dick complained, 'I would bag it by hook or crook. But to get even two or three days' casual leave entails a hell of a fuss. A replacement for me has to be called from Tarikere or Chikmagalur, and the superintendent acts like mad. That's what comes of being a postmaster.'

My visit over, I returned to Bangalore and forgot all about the tiger. In any case, I was not interested in cattle-lifters.

Some months passed until, one morning, I happened to go to the district Magistrate's Court in Bangalore to purchase some government stamp paper, of which I was in need, when I met an Indian gentleman at the stamp vendor's booth. He was grumbling because the particular denomination of stamp paper he wanted was not available, nor were any smaller denominations that would add up to the total amount required.

I purchased the paper I needed, which was of a much higher denomination and was available.

'What name?' the vendor asked me, preparing to enter this on the back of the stamp paper, as required by rules.

'K.D.S. Anderson,' I replied slowly, spelling out the Anderson so that he could write it correctly.

The Indian gentleman with us was staring hard at me. After entering my name and receiving payment, the vendor handed me the stamp paper, and the gentleman spoke.

'Excuse me, sir,' he asked, 'but are you the Mr. Anderson who shoots tigers?'

'Well, I suppose so,' I answered with a smile. 'At least I don't know of any other Anderson who has the bad habit.' Then, as an afterthought I added, 'Perhaps you mean my son?'

'My name is Venkatasubbarao,' the man said. 'I'm the Assistant Chief Engineer working on the Lakkavalli Dam Project, near Tarikere. You see, when the vendor asked your name and you replied that it was Anderson, I pricked up my ears. I've heard of you shooting tigers all over the place. You must really come to Lakkavalli, sir. Come as my guest. I have large quarters and can put you up conveniently. You will be quite comfortable and I will make all the needful bandobast for you to shoot the man-eater.'

'What man-eater?' I asked in surprise.

'Haven't you heard?' he answered, evidently taken aback. 'Why, it came out in the newspaper three days ago. But come along and have a coffee with me and I'll tell you all about it.'

There is a restaurant, known as 'Tiffin Room', within a stones's throw of the Magistrate's Court, and there Venkatasubbarao and I went. Over not one, but several cups of coffee, he related the following story.

A large tiger had appeared on the road from Tarikere that led past the eastern slopes of the Baba Budan mountain range, and passed through Lakkavalli before going on in a circle to Bhadravati. It had begun by killing cattle belonging to the many herds that were taken to graze in the jungle bordering the roadside. The tiger was reputed to carry off its victims across its back, and if any of the herdsmen dared to interfere, this animal chased them off with loud growls. Invariably it would disappear in a western direction, into the jungles of the 'Laulbagh'.

Time passed. Nothing happened to any herdsmen, but the tiger continued to exact its toll. Naturally, the herdsmen grew more angry with the tiger and became correspondingly bolder. Equally naturally, the tiger grew more angry with them and grew bolder itself.

The day dawned when the anger of both sides came to a head. The tiger was moving off with a particularly fat cow across its shoulders when a herdsman, more plucky than any of his companions, rushed after it and hurled his stave. As was its custom, the tiger dropped the body of the victim and, roaring and growling horribly, charged the man, no doubt expecting him to bolt as so many others had done before.

But this man did not run away. Maybe he was braver than the others. Maybe he was stricken stiff with fear. Maybe, having cast his staff away, he thought it useless to run anyhow. Of course, not being present himself, Venkatasubbarao did not know what really happened. What he did know was that the tiger killed and ate the herdsman before walking off again with its fat victim, the cow.

Word got around and the herdsmen in the Lakkavalli area stopped interfering with the tiger. When it attacked a herd, the men in charge promptly fled, and the tiger, politely, did not bother to chase them any more. But other herdsmen, farther off, had not heard of what had transpired near Lakkavalli. They continued their old tactics of trying to drive the tiger off when it attacked their animals. The tiger, having come now to realize how helpless his human victim at Lakkavalli had proved to be, and emboldened by that experience, killed two herdsmen one after the other at Kemangundi, and one other not very far from Santaveri. These three victims it was reported to have completely devoured and, most significant feature of all, after eating them it had spurned the carcases of the cattle it had killed.

The tiger had returned to Lakkavalli after that. Once again the scene was set for tragedy. A herd of cattle was being taken out to graze by two men, a middle-aged man and his son of fifteen years. They were standing together, watching their charges, when the boy saw the head of a large tiger observing them from behind a rise in the ground. He drew his father's attention to it. Both had turned to flee, leaving their animals to the tender mercies of the tiger, when that beast, instead of attacking the cattle, had come after them.

The lad, being young and fleeter of foot, was running ahead when the father saw the tiger bound past him, overhaul the boy and pounce upon him. In heedless panic, the older man had swerved to the right and continued his headlong flight. When he reached the village he collapsed in a faint, and it was a long time before he could tell what had happened.

The villagers went to Venkatasubbarao's quarters to beg his assistance. My new friend, however, did not own a gun and so could not help them at that moment. He closely questioned the father and got from him all the details, just as he related them to me.

A runner was dispatched to Tarikere, some eleven miles away, for help. Meanwhile the herd of cattle came rushing back to the village. It was intact. Not one of them had been harmed.

The next morning a mixed posse of policemen and forest guards, nine in number and armed with lathis, arrived together with two constables with rifles and a police sub-inspector carrying a revolver. Thus a dozen men, led by the father, went to the spot where the tiger had attacked. The body of the boy was not to be seen and everybody returned.

Thereafter the problem of obtaining labour for working on the dam became insurmountable. Those who lived in huts in the village refused to go out, while many went back to Tarikere. Others—and quite a large number of them—had made a practice of cycling every morning the eleven miles from Tarikere to work at the dam, returning the same distance in the evening. These refused to undertake the journey any more. And those people who brought supplies of rice, grain, bread and vegetables from Tarikere to the technical staff working on the dam declined to travel on that dreadful road. So not only had work on the dam practically ceased, but the senior staff stationed at Lakkavalli were being starved out.

My new acquaintance had taken advantage of the inactivity to come to Bangalore on short leave, where we had met at the stamp vendor's counter. He earnestly begged me to return with him to Lakkavalli to try to rid the village of the menace that had beset it.

I had work to attend to, but yielded to my companion's pressing request and said I would come for five or six days only. I could not possibly stay longer.

Venkat, by which name I shall refer to him hereafter, was very pleased. I do not think he realized that it is practically impossible to locate a man-eater in five days. It was arranged that he should return to the hotel he was occupying, gather the bedding and the few other things he had brought with him, and be at my house by 3 p.m. the same day. We would then travel in my car to Lakkavalli.

I hastened home to gather my own equipment, which is always kept ready along with some tinned provisions, when I had another surprise. The postman brought a short letter from Dick Bird.

Dear Jock,

Hurry up and come. Be here by tomorrow. That tiger I told you about has turned man-eater and swallowed quite a few cattle-men. Yesterday, it carried off my postman while he was taking the mail bag from here to Hosoor village, three mils away. I had no time to ask for leave, so reported sick and looked for the remains of the postman to sit up over them. We searched all day and only found the poor chap's cap and slippers.

And, of course, the mail bag. (Couldn't the bloody tiger have eaten that!)

Time's up and I have to return to duty tomorrow. Now, no excuses man; I'm keeping lunch for you the day after tomorrow (that is, the day after you receive this letter), provided the tiger doesn't eat the reserve postman who carries the mail today with this letter. Poor beggar, he's in a blue funk and I can't blame him.

Your pal, Dick

Dick was surprised when he had two guests for dinner that very night. Venkat and I had made the trip in record time.

We chatted till a late hour, but this did not get us anywhere. I remembered that, beginning the following morning, I had exactly five days in which to locate the man-eater and shoot it. Dick Bird could not leave his post. Venkat, with all the willingness he evinced, knew nothing about shooting and had no weapon anyway. There was no trace of the postman's body and it was not worth searching for it, as only bones would be left.

Venkat said that he had to be back at the dam by the following noon, so we decided to motor to his place that very night. By road, it was about fifty miles away, although much nearer as the crow flies. We downed a final rum and said goodbye to Dick well after midnight. I instructed Venkat how to operate the spotlight which with the headlights of the car enabled us to search the jungle as we drove along.

We were still about fifteen miles from Tarikere, at a place named Bagavadkatte, where a stream passes under the road by a small bridge with low parapets. Dark palms thickly fringed the road both to right and left of us, with heavy undergrowth and tiger-grass growing beneath the palms. It was there that we came upon a marvellous spectacle. Standing to one side, just beyond the parapet and evidently about to cross the road was a magnificent tiger!

It turned its head towards the car as the beams from the headlights, as well as the spotlight, caught it, and the reflection from its great orbs was brilliantly white-red, like two great stars shining by the wayside. By 'white-red' I mean more of white with a tinge of red. This is how I differentiate a tiger's eyes at night from those of a panther, which are smaller, closer together, and red-white in colour—that is, more of red and less of white.

We could see the tiger's striped coat, indeed its whole form, clearly in our bright lights.

I stopped the car. Both tigers and panthers, when a bright light falls upon them, often try to take cover by sinking to the ground, although they continue to stare back at the light, thus giving themselves away. This is just what our tiger did. It sank low and then started crawling forwards on its belly, seeking to hide behind the parapet of the bridge.

Venkat was beside himself with excitement. He trembled violently and the spotlight wavered. 'Shoot! Shoot! Shoot!' he hissed, louder and louder.

The tiger heard him. It scrambled forward the few remaining feet till the parapet hid it. Then it leapt down into the stream, passed under the bridge, and we heard it growl as it disappeared to our left in the long grass and undergrowth beneath the border of date palms. I could almost see tears in Venkat's eyes as he looked at me reproachfully. His lips trembled. For a moment I thought he was going to cry.

I explained to him at some length that all tigers are not man-eaters, that we were outside the man-eater's 'limit of beat' at the moment, and that Bagavadkatte was, and had always been, a well-known spot where tigers crossed the road, or passed under the bridge, from the low range of hillocks on the one side to the low range of hillocks on the other, and that the animal we had seen was undoubtedly a perfectly harmless-to-humans, innocent beast. Moreover, it was against rules to shoot tigers on the roadside with the aid of a spotlight, and unsporting besides.

I am not at all sure to this day whether Venkat was convinced by my arguments or considered me a fool. He certainly maintained an embarrassing silence till we reached our destination, his bungalow at about 2 a.m. There he brightened up a bit.

This happened when the watchman of the place informed him that the man-eater had carried away one of the few remaining coolies working on the dam when the man was returning to the village from work shortly after 5 p.m. the previous evening. As a result the coolies had told the watchman to inform his master when he returned that they would not come to work next day. Even if my arguments at the bridge at Bagavadkatte had not excused me in Venkat's eyes for not shooting the tiger we had seen there, he now had to be convinced that the animal that had crossed the road there could not have been the man-eater.

Venkat offered me food, but I declined and said we should snatch some sleep till five o'clock in order to be ready to start our operations at 6 a.m. He thereupon conducted me to a little room with a comfortable bed, and in five minutes I was asleep.

Dawn had broken when we set forth, together with the watchman and three coolies, for the place where the tiger had claimed its latest prey. It appeared that these same three coolies had been with the victim when the tiger had taken him. The four men had been walking along the high bund—or wall— of the dam which was still under the process of construction. They had reached the end of it and were descending the steep slope where the sluice-gate was to be built, with the intention of climbing up the other side, when the man-eater struck. There was a piercing scream, and on looking around the fourth man was not to be seen by his mates.

A moment later they caught sight of him, held securely by the throat in the jaws of a tiger which bounded up the slope they had just come down. The beast crossed the top of the bund and disappeared from view. They delayed not a moment, but fled to report the news at the village. Next they went to the engineer's bungalow. Nobody had attempted a rescue of any kind.

We searched the cutting which was to form the sluice-gate, and there the tragedy of the evening before, in all its gruesome details, was made clear to us. The man-eater had not been lying in wait in the cuttings, as we had surmised. It had, in fact, been some distance away when it had seen the men and had deliberately followed them. The soft earth showed pug-marks where the tiger had clambered up the bund, bounded along the top, and then sprung upon the man who had been the last in line as he was descending the slope of the cutting.

The poor fellow had probably died soon after emitting his loud scream. There were no blood marks at the spot where he had been attacked, indicating the tiger had not delayed in picking up its victim and making off with him.

We found the pug-marks left by the killer as it was making off after crossing the top of the bund. Halfway down the steep slope it had skidded, and the piled-up earth showed the deep furrows left by its four feet when it had dug them into the ground to stop its slide. At this juncture it must have released his hold upon the dead man's throat, for when the tiger picked him up again, it left a trail of blood all the way down the rest of the incline and into the jungle beyond.

But for the blood trail it would have been impossible for us to follow the spoor, for the undergrowth, due to recent rain, was dense. But the vivid green of the carpet of weeds constrasted sharply with the bright red of the blood-drops which showed up clearly before us for some distance ahead.

The tiger had carried its victim westwards, and for a long distance. It had crossed the main road at a sharp curve about half a mile beyond Lakkavalli village and before the road had begun to circle back towards Umblebyle and Bhadravati. The animal was obviously making for the Laulbagh Forest Block, and I began to suspect that it must be living in some cave in this area.

A few minutes later we crossed the Forest department's 'fire-line' and were now officially inside the Laulbagh Forest Block. Our quarry had not stopped tor a moment, and it was becoming difficult to follow its trail. The blood in the body of its victim had coagulated and ceased to flow, so that the drops that had fallen were scarce and small. Our progress was consequently slow through having to search for them at long intervals, and I feared that very soon the trail would die out.

That was exactly what happened ten or fifteen minutes later. No further blood-drops could we find, nor was it possible to see the pug-marks of the man-eater. Twelve hours had elapsed since it had passed that way, and the freshening effect of the night breezes, together with the dew that had fallen, had again raised the bent stems of weeds, grass and undergrowth that had been trodden upon or brushed aside by the tiger and the body of its victim in passing. With stems and leaves standing stiffly erect, the weeds and undergrowth effectively hid from us any indication whatever as to the direction which the tiger and the victim had taken. The trail was dead.

Venkat and my other companions were bitterly disappointed. So was I. However, one piece of information had been gained from our work that morning. It was clear that the tiger lived in some cave or haunt within the Laulbagh area, as I had suspected from the beginning, and considering the distance it had already brought its victim, his hide-out could not be very far from the place where the trail had died out. I made inquiries as to the existence of a cave, but none of the villagers appeared to know about one.

As soon as we got back to the village I asked for the local forest guard. He would know the topography of the jungle within its jurisdiction. To my chagrin I was told that the guard had gone to departmental headquarters at Tarikere and would return only in the morning.

No time was to be lost, so I bundled Venkat into the car beside me and made for Tarikere without further delay. The bee that had got into my bonnet regarding the existence of a cave or other hiding place would have to be swatted before I was satisfied.

In half an hour we were at the district Forest Office, where we found not only the guard we were seeking but also his immediate superior, the forest ranger, and the divisional chief, the district officer, as well. With these people around us we related how we had followed and lost the trail of the man-eater in the Laulbagh jungle. Could they tell us if there was a cave or any other place of hiding in this block in which the tiger could have made its home?

The D.F.O. looked at the ranger, and the ranger at his guard. Then the guard looked back again, and so back and forth.

'There does not appear to be any cave in the area, Mr. Anderson,' the D.F.O announced at length.

The bee that had flown into my bonnet was dying an ignoble death. My theory was shattered! The guard, standing on one bare foot, scratched his shin with the toe of the other.

'I don't suppose the devil could be sheltering in the old Munneswara Temple, could he, swami?' he asked shamefacedly, addressing his immediate superior, the ranger.

'The Munneswara Temple!' ejaculated the ranger, thoughtfully; 'the Munneswara Temple!'

'The Munneswara Temple!' the D.F.O. exploded exultantly. Then, to the guard who was hanging his head in disgrace, 'You fool! Why didn't you say that before? That's it! That's where he is! The old Munneswara Temple!' The D.F.O. pranced about in the his excitement.

When emotions had died down I was informed that an ancient temple, almost in ruins, stood a short distance within the border of the Laulbagh Block. From the directions given by the guard, we must have been very near it when we had lost the trail that morning. The inner room, or sanctuary of the temple, was said to have partly caved in, but sufficient room was left for the tiger to live in, the guard thought.

Back we went to Lakkavalli, the D.F.O., the ranger and the guard following in government jeep. They said they wanted to be in at 'the kill', although they promised me they would remain in the village and not hamper me while the actual killing was taking place.

It was now past lunch-time, but with expectation at fever heat I decided to forgo the meal and set out with the forest guard on foot for the ruins of the old temple. We passed the spot where we had lost the blood trail and had gone another mile or more when there was a sudden dip in the ground. The centre of this little bowl or depression was an island of tangled undergrowth and bushes, and peeping through the varied foliage I could see the grey ruins of a small temple.

Instructing my companion to climb one of the taller trees and remain at the top, a suggestion that he did not delay a moment in executing, I picked my way on tiptoe towards the ruins, taking advantage of every intervening bush to cover my advance. The hot sun poured down on the scene and I was in no hurry.

In my excitement I discovered I had forgotten to ask the guard the direction the temple faced. This was important, if I hoped to take the man-eater by surprise. It would never do for me to be watching the rear of the temple while the tiger slipped out in front, circled around under cover of the undergrowth and attacked me from behind.

Eventually, on closer approach, I could make out the opening that led to the temple-sanctuary. It faced a little to my right and was partially blocked by debris. I was lucky. All I had to do now was creep up beside this opening, take cover, draw the man-eater out, and shoot it.

This is what I proceeded to do. Edging forwards, I reached the corner of the square that formed the outside of the temple. This struck me as being a very suitable place in which to hide and ambush my quarry. I would be safe from attack when the tiger rushed out. Naturally, it would charge straightforward and not think of looking for me to its right or left.

But there was a snag. If I hid behind one corner of the building, what was to prevent the tiger hiding behind the other corner at the back of me and pouncing upon me from the rear? It might not be in the temple at that moment, for all I knew. Perhaps it was watching me from the cover of some bush while It was searching for it.

I decided to creep up to within a couple of feet of the temple entrance and flatten myself against the wall. At least that would prevent me from being attacked from behind while I was peeping around the corner in front. This I did and was in position at last. Now it was a matter of drawing the tiger out. I had to avoid frightening it, and I should not anger it. It had to do itself out of curiosity.

So I moaned faintly, imitating the call of a tiger far away. Nothing happened! Perhaps the tiger had not heard me, although I could scarcely credit that. I moaned again, and still nothing happened. I moaned a third time, and much louder. That distant tiger had made a remarkably fast approach! Yet nothing transpired and I concluded that the tiger was not in the temple. I peeped around the corner very carefully; then I grew bolder and entered the broken opening, stooping double. A damp, mouldering smell greeted me. The dust at the entrance showed no pug-marks. Nor was there any trace of human remains. Not only was no tiger here, but no tiger had been here for months. Clearly the Munneswara Temple was not the man-eater's hiding place.

We were so disappointed that the huge lunch my friend Venkat had had prepared for himself and me was sufficient to feed the D.F.O. and the ranger also. Moreover, a little was left over, sufficient to give the forest guard a snack.

Sitting on the plinth of the veranda of Venkat's bungalow smoking, a short while later, I chafed at the delay while my friends continued to talk over events. Time meant everything to me, but nothing to them. It is the one thing in India that has never been rationed; and never will be.

In the afternoon sunlight, a Lambadi herdsman grazed his buffaloes outside. With the man-eater about, it was far too dangerous for him to take them into the forest, while the sparse grass in the compound of the engineer's quarters offered a meagre substitute. Attracted by the sight and smell of the assorted fumes from my pipe, Venkat's cigar and the cigarettes smoked by our two friends of the Forest department, this individual became sufficiently emboldened to approach us and beg for a cigarette. The D.F.O., threw him one and we forgot his existence, after seeing him move off to the rear of the bungalow where we heard him and the forest guard talking to each other.

A few minutes later the guard approached. He was excited, but also hesitated to interrupt the conversation of his exalted superiors.

'Well?' muttered the guard with great diffidence. 'I prey your honour not to get angry, but the outcaste Lambadi tells me there is an overhanging ridge of rock a mile beyond the Munneswara Temple under which there is sufficient space for a tiger to shelter. In fact, he says he saw one sunning itself on top of the rock one evening when he was returning with his buffaloes, and before the man-eater came amongst us. Of course, he ran away and his animals followed. He says he had not been there again.'

We summoned the Lambadi without delay and closely questioned him. His reply was exactly what the forest guard had just told us. The only new piece of information he offered was that he felt certain that the tiger he had seen and the man-eater were one and the same animal, bearing in mind the fact that the tiger had not turned man-eater at that time. Within a few minutes I was on my way again, the forest guard accompanying me rather reluctantly this time. But the Lambadi was in better spirits.

It was half-past four when we passed the temple, and close upon five before the Lambadi pointed out to me, about two hundred yards ahead, a slight rise in the ground above which peeped a sloping rock. He told me that, although we could not see it from where we stood, owing to the intervening jungle, when I came close enough I would find that the rock made a low overhanging cave, the entrance to which was not more than two feet in height. This, he thought, had been caused by the rush of rainwater during the monsoons, for the cave was not a very deep one. On his previous visit he had been at almost the same spot on which we were now standing and had noticed the tiger lying at full length and sunning itself on the top of the rock. He had run away as fast as he could.

Once again I told my companions to climb trees and to remain there till my return, and for the second time that day I crept forward on tiptoe as cautiously as possible.

This time my advance lay through fairly thick jungle, and not through open country like that which formed the depression in which the old Munneswara Temple mouldered. I looked to right and left and behind, to guard against flank and rear attacks. There was an oppresive silence and I glanced momentarily downwards at each pace that I made. On no account must I step on a leaf that might rustle or a twig that might crackle. Now and then, despite all my precautions, some part of my body brushed against a bush and made a faint rubbing sound.

I said to myself: 'I must not do that again: the tiger will hear me.'

I was now very near the rock, but the undergrowth in front still hid the ground level opening mentioned by the Lambadi. I halted for a few minutes. Maybe I could hear the tiger if I strained my ears. I did so, but I heard absolutely nothing.

'A few steps more,' I said to myself, 'and I will be able to see.'

I looked down. No leaf, or twig, no loose stone in front. It was safe for me to take another step forwards.

I took that step, but I overlooked an insignificant little shrub to my right. That shrub had thorns, and the thorns did the trick. They rasped audibly against my trousers, held for a moment, and then let go with another rasp.

Before I could guess whether the man-eater had heard me, it had in fact done so. Instinct warned it that this was no bird, no hare or other small creature that was approaching just out of sight. It knew full well that no living thing that could fly, walk or creep would dare to come so close to its dreadful presence. Therefore this must be an enemy, and more over, an enemy that was stalking it, the tiger, no doubt to kill it in turn.

Its reflexes gave it this message and there was no delay. The tiger charged, its shattering roars of 'Wroof! Wroof! Wroof!' rending the silence.

The bushes before me parted and its head and body catapulted through them before it caught sight of me. It halted for a moment prior to making the final spring. Perhaps it never expected to find a miserable human being confronting it instead of running away. Head and paws at ground level, hindquarters and tail sticking up, the tiger looked a bit ridiculous.

I fired twice into its head. Then I leaped quickly aside, for one must never forget to spring aside after firing at a tiger at close quarters, as the odds are ninety-nine to one that it will rush straightforward, even if it must die the next instant. A dying tiger can in fact do you an awful lot of harm.

The man-eater did as I expected, and I shot it twice more behind the shoulder. As it twitched and then began to stiffen, I saw that it was quite an old animal, past the age from hunting game.

The bones of the coolie for whose body we had been searching were strewn about the entrance to the shallow cave. They had been gnawed clean. Red ants were devouring what small strands of flesh adhered to them still.

The three of us returned in darkness, unafraid this time. There was another feast at the bungalow, and it gave me indigestion. Dreams of tigers rushing out of temples troubled me till the early hours. Then came a farewell to Venkat and my friends of the Forest department.

I was at Santaveri by nine in the morning. Dick offered me lunch, but I declined. My stomach was still rumbling in uncomfortable protest as I swallowed a quick rum. By four I was home, having accomplished my mission well within time.

What the Thunderstorm Brought

Donald, my son, was immensely pleased with himself. he had just tied for the first place in a clay-pigeon shooting competition held by the Rifle Association of Mysore state.

Now clay-pigeon shooting is something we in India do not normally indulge in, at least so far as I know, perhaps because there are so many wild pigeons that we cannot be bothered with the clay variety, or whatever substance it is that goes to make a clay pigeon. More likely, because up to this time nobody had the apparatus to eject these little things, these clay pigeons into the air. Certainly, I had never seen them before. I am sure I could not hit one myself. I am essentially a rifle shot and almost useless with a gun. My attempts years ago at snipe and duck convinced me of that.

Donald, however, is a natural good shot with both gun and rifle. Like me, he had never seen a clay-pigeon-shooting gadget, and therefore certainly had had no chance to practise. But he entered tor the competition and tied tor the first prize. And now he suggested that we should make a trip to the jungles to celebrate the occasion.

To the jungles? What a strange place to go to celebrate! But the truth is we both love the jungles. In them we are at home; there we find peace. So it did not take much persuasion to get me to go.

This time we decided to try our hand at photographing tigers by night rather than shooting them. Donald had borrowed a wonderful camera with a flashlight apparatus from his old friend of schoolboy days, young Dudhwala, who was young no longer, and about whom I have told a tale in an earlier book.* For a long time Don had been wanting to try his hand at the most difficult and I might also add, most highly-skilled sport of night-photography and this was his chance.

I will not tell you to which jungle we went because it is one of the very few places remaining in southern India where tigers are yet to be found. Some enthusiasts have read my books and gone to places I have named, bent upon trying their luck, and it has become a matter of necessity, from the point of view of Indian conservation, no longer to name them. For tigers, panthers and bear are becoming very scarce in southern India. The heavy shooting which resulted from the influx of foreigners into India during World War II began their decimation. The Indian poacher particularly, of the kind that uses jeeps with spotlights, continued the process. Then came the deadly insecticide of which I have already spoken, which the government still supplies almost free of charge to protect the villagers' crops against various pests, but ryots whose cattle or goats have been killed by tigers and panthers have no compunction about smearing the flesh of their slain animals with this stuff. Almost always, success crowns this dastardly deed by poisoning the marauder when he returns for a second meal.

The results have been so disastrous that, particularly in Mysore state, tigers, panthers, hyenas, and even jackals, and to some extent vultures, have been practically wiped out by the misuse of this chemical—without taking into account the high mortality among human beings all over the country by suicide, murder and accidental poisoning. The old-fashioned and far slower acting, less deadly posions like arsenic, strychnine and zinc salts, which can only be purchased in minute quantities, are discoverable, but the government will give anyone pounds of deadly insecticide almost for the asking. It is deplorable that the authorities cannot, do not, or will not see the truth of this matter.

So we went to 'tiger-land', to a lovely cabin of bamboo and grass that we had built on a small plot of land I had bought many years earlier for the sum of 120 rupees (about seven pounds sterling). Two hundred yards in front of our hut flowed a river, its presence plainly indicated by the heavy growth of giant muthee, tamarind, jumlum and wild mango trees that lined both banks. Here and there were areas where dense clumps of bamboo had ousted all other forms of vegetation, bringing their towering, feathery fronds to overhang the cascades and pools of the stream, while dark and silent glades, covered with a carpet of rotting leaves, reached down to the water's edge.

The crocodile loves such places, for the deer like them too. The dense cover afforded by the bamboos, their shade, and the flooring of decaying leaves permit a silent, sheltered and comparatively safe approach for the sambar, nilgai and spotted deer when they come in the heat of the day, and also at night, to slake their thirst with the cool water that has cascaded down so recently from the cold of the mountains above the forest.

In their anxiety to escape the great carnivores that may be lurking behind any tree, any clump of bamboo, or any bush, the deer lose no time in drinking as fast as they can, with their noses and ears alert for the scent or sound of a tiger, and their eyes on the watch for a panther or for the cruel wild dogs. Often enough, in the anxiety of scanning the landscape, they overlook the ugly crocodile, who is invisible anyhow, his head and body below the surface of the stream and very close to the bank.

And so a sambar lowers its head to drink, and as it does so the crocodile rises from the water. Cruel jaws, with long, saw-like teeth, close upon the sambar's snout while almost in the same instant the reptile's flat, scaly tail swings out of the water and whips across with irresistible force, striking the sambar's legs or flank and throwing it off-blance into the pool.

Never loosening its grip on the sambar's face, the crocodile swims backwards into deep water, dragging its struggling victim with it. Once in its element, the crocodile throws itself into a spin of incredible speed in order to break its victim's neck or otherwise render it unconscious, and the next moment both crocodile and sambar vanish beneath the dark surface of the pool and only a series of large bubbles disturb the placid flow of water over the scene of the tragedy.

But we know nothing of the grim drama being enacted in the slime and ooze at the bottom of the jungle river. From the comfortable cane chairs on the veranda of our hut we listen to the loud cracking of the stems of giant bamboos as they are broken by a herd of elephants grazing on the opposite bank of the stream. Now and again comes the faint squeak of an elephant-calf and the dull thunder-like rumble from the digestive organs of an adult, or a contented cow-like mooing from a feeding female. All is peaceful and the faraway call of a peafowl alternates with the shrill, cat-like meowing cries that come from above us, made by the pair of brown vultures in their never-ending quest for scraps of food left by the great jungle cats.

Although there was apparent peace in the jungle there was some discord in our hut. Trouble arose between the caretaker, whom we employ to look after the place in our absence, and his wife, who brings us water twice a day in an old kerosene tin from the river. There was muttering and grumbling, and an occasional high-pitched female screech that put even the vultures to shame.

'Some trouble between Boora and his wife,' observed Donald laconically. 'Better see what it is about. She hasn't brought water for my bath yet, although I've told her twice already.'

So I got up and went into the kitchen, which is a smaller grass hut about twelve feet square, situated behind our dwelling-place. There sat Boora on the ground, idly poking a wood fire with a stick while his spouse sat opposite him, chewing betel-nut vigorously and spitting red saliva all over the place. An interested spectator was my shikari Thangavelu, originally from faraway Closepet, who had promoted himself into Don's services as a camp-cook, table-boy, dressing-boy, and every other sort of boy except a boy who honestly did any work.

'What's the matter with you two?' I asked aggressively, glaring at Boora and his wife alternately. Then, addressing the woman. 'Your bad language is disgusting.'

There was silence for a while, then Boora explained in the local dialect: 'Sir, I married this harridan three years ago. She has had three children from me but doesn't look after them. Neither does she feed me properly. She won't work because she's lazy, All day long she keeps chewing betel-nut and demands money to buy more. Altogether, she's too expensive a proposition.

'As it stands when I married her I paid ten rupees to her father for her. Now, old Javanna had offered me his youngest daughter for fifteen rupees. She's a comely wench and will look after me well. What's more, Javanna is willing to take over this bag-of-bones from me for five rupees, half the price I paid for her, so that the deal will only cost me ten. She can keep the three children she had from me—I certainly don't want'em!'

Further plans on the part of Boora were interrupted by the screeching voice of Devi, his wife.

'You lecherous old pig!' she cried. 'What do you want with a young girl like Lakshmi? She's only fifteen years old, although she's a bitch at that! You're already half-dead, and after a week with her I'll have the trouble of burying your exhausted bones! As for that old sod, javanna! He's so old he hasn't any teeth! Also, he's fond of young boys! Who's going to satisfy me? I'm young and vigorous still!'

A knotty problem, indeed! But there was one redemptive factor. Considering the rate of exchange at one shilling and four pence to a rupee, the cost-factor involved in this mutual exchange, in whatever way you might look at it, was not very high. Thangavelu summed up the situation concisely with a wide grin, and in the butler-English which he had picked up, chimed in:

'Sar I like this place. Plenty very much damn good place. Plenty shikar, plenty tiger, plenty deer got-it. Plenty women, too, plenty damn cheap-rate. Here five rupees, ten rupees get-it wife. Then too, can pay next month. When no want, can change-it. Another wife get-it. Only ten rupees! Damn woman won't go 'way after. Want-it more money. Can't get 'nuther wife less than 'nuther hundred rupees. Sar, this very damn good place.'

Thangavelu ended with a meaning grin.

'Thangavelu, tell that bloody woman to fetch my bathwater,' Donald roared from the veranda. Kunmarie, the local shikari , turned up just then with the information we had asked him to bring us. He had been scouring the jungle since dawn and reported that a tiger as well as a panther, had walked up the bed of a dry nullah about half a mile away. The panther seemed an old resident as Kunmarie said his tracks, both old and fresh, appeared many times. The tiger was evidently on a casual walk and could not be expected to return that way for some time.

So the prospects were that if we tied a bait with the object of taking a photograph later, it would probably be a panther and not a tiger that would kill it. We were after tiger only; we reiterated this fact to Kunmarie, asking him to go out again to try to find a place frequented by a tiger rather than a panther.

That afternoon he returned with news of success. Across the river, he said, was a well-frequented game trail on which were tiger-pugs, both old and fresh. Further, there was a convenient tree, safe from interference by elephants, from which we could easily take our photographs when the time came. The tiger was sure to pass the same way that night or the next.

We had procured four buffaloes as bait and decided to tie out two of them—the larger on the tiger-frequented game-trail across the river, and the smaller in the nullah four furlongs away, where the panther was almost certain to get it. Thangavelu went with Kunmarie to help tether the two animals, while Don and I went for an evening walk along the river bank.

This particular jungle was still a veritable paradise for game and we saw large herds of spotted deer, with a fair number of sambar and individual nilgai, browsing by the water-side. Around a curve in the river we came upon a bull-elephant having his evening drink. As we were not on a shikar trip we carried no firearms. For a moment or two the bull looked nasty; no doubt he resented our intrusion on his privacy. Then he thought better of it, wheeled and lumbered away into the thicket of overhanging trees. It was extraordinary how so large an animal could move so quietly.

The following morning Kunmarie went to the game-trail and Thangavelu to the nullah, to see what had happened to our baits during the night. In the jungle the unexpected frequently happens, and the reports they brought us were as surprising as they were heartening from the photographic point of view. A tiger, and not a panther, had come along the nullah where we had tied the smaller bait, expecting the panther to kill it. It had easily broken the tethering-rope and had taken the buffalo-calf a little distance away to a ditch. There it had eaten every scrap except the head and four hooves. Because they were sheltered by undergrowth the vultures had not discovered the remains.

Strangely enough a panther, and not the tiger we had expected, had come along the game-trail across the river. It in turn had killed the large buffalo-calf we had tied for the tiger, evidently with some difficulty, for Kunmarie reported marks of a struggle. But the panther had not been strong enough to sever the tethering-rope. So it had eaten a small portion of the buffalo-calf, leaving the rest by the side of the game-trail where we should be able to photograph it easily if we wished, from the big tree bordering the trail when it returned that night.

Don was in high spirits. He would photograph his tiger at last. Naturally he decided to sit over the scant remains, consisting of the head and legs, of the smaller calf we had tied out in the nullah. To make sure the tiger put in an appearance, he proposed tying our third bait near by, just in case the tiger thought the remains of the first one too insignificant to merit a second visit.

Incidentally, I might remark that this is a plan I have found most successful with both tiger and panther. After all, they are individuals just as we are; they differ among themselves just as we differ and they suffer from some at least of our faults. The commonest of these is greed. Some panthers and tigers hardly ever return to their kills a second time. Others return only after they have spent a very long time reconnoitering the locality and feel it safe to show themselves. It is in this process of surveyance that they frequently discover the presence of the hunter, perched in his tree-machan or wherever he may have concealed himself. To exploit this greed, I have found it good to tie another live bait within sight of the partially eaten one, and if possible to sit at a spot between them; or if that is not practical, to sit over the new bait in preference to the old, partly-eaten one.

What happens is this. The tiger or panther returns to the scene of its first kill but does not approach the carcase straight away. It is suspicious and circles the spot several times to discover the presence of the man its instinct warns is in hiding somewhere. During this manoeuvre it comes upon the new live bait. One might conjecture that this would make the feline more suspicious than ever. How does a live animal come to be so close to the place where he had left a dead and almost completely devoured victim? But you must remember that tigers and panthers cannot reason as human beings do. They are creatures of instinct, even if such instinct is often uncanny in its efficiency.

The immediate result is that the prowling tiger or panther kills the live animal. No doubt the prospect of fresh meat is always more enticing than the decomposing flesh that has been exposed to the sun and vultures throughout the day, and so the tiger or panther brings about its own undoing.

I had no camera suitable for night photography, and as we were not on a shooting excursion and carried no firearms there seemed no point in my sitting on the big tree across the river merely to hear a panther tucking into a good meal. So I decided to spend the first part of the night in sitting in the comfort of a cane chair on the veranda of our bamboo hut, listening to the sounds of the jungle; and the rest of it in bed.

Showers of rain had been sporadic in the area, and for this reason each of us had brought along a tarpaulin sheet to sling as a roof over the machan in case of necessity. This is a practice I do not recommend at all. Firstly, it makes the machan very conspicuous and calls for extra camouflaging. Secondly, when the rain comes the noise of the water on the roof is so great that your cannot hear a thing. Worse still, any creature on the ground below at fifty yards cannot help but hear the pandemonium overhead. It looks up, discovers the machan and knows you are there. But it certainly is no joke to sit up in a tree all night in pouring rain, even if you are waring a greatcoat or waterproof cape. The rain has a strange knack of getting inside anything.

Don decided to use the tarpaulin and I went along with Kunmarie and Thangavelu, together with another man named Bunda, to help him with his machan.

A soap-nut tree grew to one side of the nullah and on this Don decided to sit. It was within about thirty yards of the ditch in which lay the head and legs of our first bait and it overlooked the course of the nullah in both directions. There was a third advantage to this tree. The tiger, in stalking our bait the night before, had come down by way of a third nullah, which was more a shallow ditch, and the soap-nut tree grew just opposite the point where this ditch met the main nullah. So it was strategically in an excellent position and, according to all the rules of the game, with ordinary luck the tiger should make itself visible somewhere, and Don should get the chance of a good photograph.

Our three henchmen made an excellent job of the machan, and as the sky was clouding over Don decided to stretch the tarpaulin above the platform of the machan , across a stick cut and placed in position so as to afford a slope on both sides to allow any water to flow off. The tarpaulin itself was cunningly concealed with leaves and branches that entirely hid it from view. The four of us went away about 5 p.m. leaving Don with the camera all set for an adventurous night.

I will tell you first what I heard from our bamboo cabin, and then let Don tell his part of the tale.

Thangavelu served dinner early, and then I sat on the cane chair on the veranda, smoking my pipe and sipping rum and lime-juice. Darkness had only just fallen and the jungle was silent for the moment. The 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' came the cry of spotted deer from across the river while a sambar stag on the near bank hoarsely took up the warning with his strident 'Dhank! Dhank! Oo-onk!' and a doe sambar, farther away, heard the signal of danger and in a higher tone not quite so hoarse, answered 'Wonk! Wonk! Wonk!'

A bribe of langur monkeys on a banyan tree, the top of which was just visible to me in the darkness to my right, had all gone to sleep long ago. All except the watchman who, with a true sense of responsibility, had remained wide awake. Later, when he began to feel drowsy, he would awaken his relief, who would keep watch till the time came to awaken the next big male, and so on, throughout the night and all day long too, for the big male langurs have an uncanny sense of disicipline and responsibility. They take upon themselves.

each in turn, the duties of a watchman, perched at the very top of the highest tree, to look for possible danger and guard the females and young from an unexpected attack.

The langur watchman heard the sambar and the spotted deer and echoed the alarm to awaken the members of his tribe: 'Harr! Ha-harr! Harr! Ha-harri!' I could picture the mother-langurs clutching their young to their breasts while peering down from their perches on the banyan tree into the blackness of the night below to try to discover the killer and reckon from where it might be creeping upon them.

I could plot the progress of the tiger's approach by the cries of the spotted deer and the sambar. He crossed the river and frightened a barking deer in the act of drinking. 'Khrr! Khrr!' the little animal cried. Its cry is quite unlike any other noise associated with the deer species. It sounds more like the hoarse bark of a dog and accounts for the colloquial name by which this small creature, otherwise called the muntjac is known.

The tiger was now disdainful. It knew it had been discovered and scorned to conceal its movements any longer. 'Oo-oongh!' it roared, and then modified its utterance to a softer but deeper 'Aungh! Ughh; Ughh-aa!' There was not anger in the sound, nor was it very hungry.

As if by magic, at the sound of its roars, deep silence descended upon the forest. The deer and monkeys were stilled. Even the frogs by the riverside stopped their croaking. All living creatures, large and small, knew that the king of the jungle was on the prowl and they trembled in fear. Only a solitary wood-circket, ensconced in cool comfort behind the water-pot in what goes for the bathroom of our bamboo-cabin, disdained the challenge of the striped terror. Maybe it had not even heard. Maybe it could not be bothered with such big clumsy creatures as tigers. Probably its problem was more mundane.

Then the silence was shattered down by the river: 'Haa-ah! Haa-ah! Haa-ah!'

The panther had returned long ago and had no doubt been eating its fill of our larger bait. All this fuss had upset it, while the roars of its bigger, irascible and bullying cousin, the tiger, had made it jittery and irritable. It resented the proximity of that majestic terror, but did not know what to do about it. Angrily it repeated: 'Haa-ha! Haa-ah! Haa-ah!' while deciding whether to remain or slink away.

I knew that Don must have heard all these sounds too, and that he would be getting ready to take his picture of the tiger, which by this time should be near the remain of the buffalo calf it had killed the night before, and the live bait we had tied near by.

Silence fell over the forest again. The frogs resumed their croaking by the river and the night seemed to grow black and yet blacker. I looked up at the sky and wondered why I could see no stars. A moment later knew the answer as thunder rumbled across the range of hills behind our cabin. Repeated flashes followed, and the artillery of heaven was loosed upon us, each crash preceded by vivid forked lightning that snaked across the sky like rivers on a giant map.

Then the wind started. I could hear it howling in the distance as it raged down the hillside with a prolonged banshee wail rising ever louder and louder until it hit our own jungle. I could hear the trees tossing wildly as their branches clashed in agony, although it was far too dark to see a thing, and the bamboo supports of our cabin swayed, straining, creaking and groaning. I thought that the thatched roof would be blown away.

Then suddenly as quickly as it came, the wind passed. I could hear it receding into the distance across the forest tops as far as the distant horizon. But the lightning increased in intensity, and the crashes of thunder drew ever nearer and more intense. All at once a giant tree was struck. It was cleft asunder as a vivid flash lit the forest as bright as day, so close to our hut that the thunderclap was instantaneous. I thought of Don in his soap-nut tree and was worried. It was not a very big tree or a high one, however, and hardly likely to attract the lightning that had so many loftier trees to choose from.

The rain reached the cabin and for a moment even approaching down the hillside, long before it reached the cabin. Donald must be really glad, I thought, that he decided to put the tarpaulin roof above his machan.

The rain reached the cabin and for a moment even the thunder was drowned in the uproar of falling water. The grass roof above me hissed, and streams of water from a hundred leaks dripped, pattered and flowed in all directions upon our possessions. What had been, only a moment earlier, a cosy cabin became a wet and muddy hole with pools of water on the floor and no dry spot within sight. I sat on, inwardly cursing the labourers who had made such a poor job of the roof.

Thangavelu, awakened at last by the hubbub, in which perhaps he was dreaming of wives for sale by the dozen at five rupees a head, dashed in, gazing in dismay at all the wet things around him, and then scuttled about aimlessly, trying hopelessly to find shelter for them.

The deluge continued for an hour and then settled down to a steady drizzle.

'Quak-ker! Quak-ker! Quak-ker! Quak-ker!' The frogs had now changed their note. This was the mating call of a thousand throats from the river and surrounding puddles, to salute the advent of the monsoon. I rose and prepared for sleep. The only dry spot seemed to be under the bamboo bed rather than upon it.

At that moment I heard the unmistakable scream of an enraged elephant. It came from the direction of the nullah and Don's machan. Thangavelu, who was still pottering about aimlessly, heard it too. He stopped and we looked at each other anxiously. Then we both went out on to the soaking veranda in order to hear better.

The elephant screamed again. There was no mistaking the fact that the scream came from the nullah. Then I heard distant shouting, muted by the continuous pattern of the rain, but there was no doubt that it was a human voice, shouting words I could not make out. The voice came from the same direction as the elephant's scream. Who but Donald was out there in the nullah?

Then the truth dawned upon me suddenly. My son was in danger: the elephant was trying to pull him out of the machan , and he was trying to drive it away. And he was unarmed.

The irony of the situation struck me and I cursed myself for my overconfident carelessness. I should have known better; they boy was not to blame. We were defenceless. For we had brought no firearms with us, leaving them behind because we had come on a photographic excursion and did not want to be tempted to shoot!

Grabbing the larger of the two lanterns in one hand and, for want of anything better, a walking-stick made from sandalwood in the other, I dashed out and began to stumble through the drenched jungle as fast as I could to cover the half-mile to the nullah. I was hardly aware of the cold or the fact that I was bareheaded and without a coat as the rain soaked me to the skin.

I had run as best I could for quite a distance before I became aware of another lantern bobbing behind me. It was Thangavelu, carrying the other light. He loved Donald, and I was grateful for his presence. No other servant would have dared to venture forth on that foul night, in pitch darkness and unarmed, to a place where a wild elephant was rampaging in fury.

Then we heard a tearing, rending sound, and a crash, and I knew the elephant had pushed over the tree on which Don had his machan. I tried to run faster and Thangavelu ran beside me. But I could not make the pace, so we resorted to shouting as we jog-trotted along, hoping to attract the elephant's attention and draw him away from Donald.

This is how Donald himself tells his part of this story: 'I don't know why my father, when he writes his books, brings me into them. For one thing, I hate writing and talking about myself. Actually, the entire incident appears to me now as "much ado about nothing".

'Dad had told how it all started and how I came to be seated on the soap-nut tree with Dudhwalla's flashlight camera to try to photograph the tiger that had killed and devoured our bait the previous night. There was so little left that I had decided to tie a live one near by to tempt the tiger when he prowled around, as tigers generally do, before approaching their kills.

'The machan was a comfortable one; the head and feet of the first calf lay in a ditch some thirty yards to my left, while below me was the nullah that Kunmarie, our shikari, said was a regular route for tigers and panthers on their way to the river. Entering it was a smaller watercourse which the tiger used the night before. A shade to my right, and in clear view, was our third bait—a live one—another buffalo-calf. The second bait was killed by a panther across the river the night before.

'Darkness had just fallen when the deer and langur monkeys sounded their alarm cries and I knew that a tiger or a panther was afoot—probably a tiger, to judge by the amount of noise the animals were making. Then the tiger roared fairly near, and soon afterwards I could hear a panther answering in the distance. Most likely it was the one that killed our second bait.

'I got ready to take my picture. All the same, I wished I had a rifle in my hands instead of a camera. The old man is always talking about taking photographs instead of shooting, and I guess he is right, but the temptation was there nevertheless. I felt strongly now and wished I had my .423 with me.

'The next sound I heard was a thud and the cry of the live bait. I knew it was a tiger and not a panther that was killing the calf, for a panther has to choke his victim, who naturally struggles. There was no sound of a struggle whatever, for the calf was already dead with a broken neck.

'I pointed the camera downwards and to my right, in the general direction of the live bait, and pressed the switch-button. There was a blinding flash and the tiger uttered a startled 'Gr-a-ahm!' This was followed by the faint crash of undergrowth. I knew that it had gone.

'There was nothing more for me to do and I stretched out to sleep, contented with the hope of a good photograph. The machan was a bit hard and I wished I was back in our bamboo cabin.

'I must have fallen asleep after that, for I woke with a start to find my machan swaying crazily as the tree bent and threshed in a mighty wind. The night was extraordinarily dark till a flash of lightning, followed almost at once by a crash of thunder, told me we were in for a storm, and a big one too. Branches and leaves were torn from the trees and they whipped past my face, while my tarpaulin roof was partly blown away. One end held, the corner that we had lashed to the tree-trunk, while the other threshed loudly in the wind, whipping against the branches and making a great noise.

Then all at once the wind fell and the rain came. It was more like a waterfall than rain. I closed Dudhwalla's camera and flashlight apparatus and put them away in their case and hoped the water would not get through. I was like a sponge myself; so full of water that it seemed to be running through me. And the rain went on falling.

'Now something unusual occurred. The tiger came back. Probably the lightning had made it think himself a fool for running away in the first instance. What it had seen must have been only a flash of lightning, no more. So it came back and started tearing at the calf it had killed a short time before.

'I dared not attempt to take another picture. God knows what would happen to Dudhwalla's camera, I thought, if I opened it in the torrential rain. There was no point in trying to do anything; even the beam of my torch could not reach the tiger through the falling rain.

'Eventually the rain eased off a little and I could hear the tiger's gnawing more clearly. Then I heard a fresh sound: the squelch of giant footfalls approaching along the nullah, wading through the rushing water that I could hear gurgling down the watercourse below. An elephant!

'Probably is was too wet for it to eat and it just wanted to shelter, for he was breaking no branches. It squelched nearer and nearer.

'The tiger heard it too and did not like it. It let out a terrific "Wr-aah!" Ordinarily it would slink away, for tigers and elephants avoid one another as much a possible. But this tiger was an exception. It was eating.

'Moreover, it was angry. So he snarled again and again: "Wr-aah! Wr-aah! Wr-aah!"

The squelching stopped abruptly. The elephant attempted to strike its trunk against the ground in the usual note of alarm and warning. But its trunk met mud and water instead of firm earth, and the resulting noise sounded more like somebody with a severe cold blowing his nose.

'This annoyed the tiger more and he growled louder than ever, and the elephant would have as likely as not gone away then and left the tiger to its feast, and me in peace, but for an unfortunate turn of events.

'There was a sudden gust of wind and the end of the tarpaulin waved like a flag, banging against the branches of the tree almost above the elephant's head. The tiger took off with a leap at hearing this new sound and crashed into the undergrowth at the elephant's side. This startled and angered the great beast; confused and alarmed, it did not know whether the tiger meant to attack it or if the strange object that was lashing about above its head spelled danger. It looked up and saw everything: the tarpaulin, the machan , and me!

'Jumbo let out a terrible scream and rushed straight at the soap-nut tree, its forehead banging against the trunk with a sickening thud. The heavy rain had saturated and loosened the earth, the tree-trunk went off the perpendicular and assumed a slant, and I knew well enough that with another push or two it would come crashing to the ground.

'Jumbo screamed again, backed a little and was obviously gathering itself for a further assault. Although it was very dark, I could faintly make out his shape, so close as to be almost within arm's reach, directly to my left. A faint streak of whiteness against that inky-black background indicated its tusks and confirmed that it was a bull. Moreover, I could smell him now. In spite of the rain that must have washed him well, his body gave out the rank, unmistakable odour of a wild tusker, especially strong when the animal is angry.

'In the next rush the soap-nut tree would fall to earth and take me with it. so I started shouting madly, at the top of my lungs, the first words, just any words, that came into my mind. My voice had the desired effect—at least for the moment. The elephant delayed his charge and screamed again. The next second would decide my fate.

'My electric torch! Why had I not thought of it before? The light was sure to frighten him off. Hastly I grabbed it and shone it directly into the elephant's face.

'By all the rules of the game he should have beaten a hasty retreat. Instead, he screamed louder than ever, and a second later I felt as if a steamroller had hit me, when he dashed his forehead a second time into the trunk of the soap-nut tree. In slow motion, as if deliberately staged, the tree heeled over to the accompanying noise of rending roots. Then, gathering momentum, it crashed to earth, carrying me, machan and everything with it.

'When I felt myself falling I grabbed at the branch above my head so that, apart from the shock, I should receive no physical injury. I thought fast. The first idea that came to mind was to dash for it; but I was enmeshed in the branches of the blasted tree and could not find my torch. In falling I had let go of it in order to grab the branch. God knows where it had gone. It was pitch-dark and to escape from the entanglement of bamboos that formed the machan and which were now jumbled all around me, and from the branches of the tree itself, would take a considerable effort, and would lead the elephant to where I was.

'The elephant solved the problem by finding the end of the tarpaulin that had been threshing about in the breeze and seizing it with his trunk. One end was still tied to a branch, so he tore it in two and I could hear him tramping and stamping upon the other piece a few paces away.

'I cowered among the branches, but peeped out to see if I could discover how close he was. It was utterly black everywhere, but his movements betrayed that he was within fifteen feet. I could smell him strongly and hear him breathing as he slogged the end of the tarpaulin against the ground with his trunk, stamped upon it and tore it to shreds. The noise continued for a full minute or two when another noise reached me. I could hear men shouting.

'They appeared to be approaching, and soon I could make out dad's voice and another, which I recognized as Thangavelu's. The twinkle of lights in the distance showed that they were carrying lanterns or torches. Abruptly the bull stopped beating the tarpaulin. He was silent for a moment and then banged the end of his trunk against the ground in alarm and anger. I heard him turning around to face the approaching men.

'Dad and Thangavelu were coming in at the run now, shouting as they did so. I knew my father was unarmed and that it was going to be touch-and-go whether the enraged bull decided to charge them or beat a retreat himself. Perhaps if I started shouting it would help to confuse the dammed beast.

'Just then, stumbling and squelching down the water-filled nullah the two men came, holding their lanterns in front of them and shrieking like banshees. The old man was yelling "Don, are you all right?" but I dared not answer. The elephant was far too close and the sound of my voice would bring him down upon me.

'The flickering lights showed me the towering form of the creature as he faced them, his trunk curled inwards, the inevitable sign of an elephant on the verge of a charge. I would have to do something to divert his attention, so I let out a yell and kept on yelling.

'The elephant trumpeted shrilly. Dad and Thangavelu, who had now seen him, stopped running and held their lanterns aloft, to join in the general pandemonium, by yelling too. Dad was doing something so ridiculous that I almost laughed in spite of the danger we were all in at that moment. He was brandishing a stick.

'The screeching sounds we were all making must have sounded hideous. But, thank God, the bull thought so too and lost his nerve. He wheeled abruptly and thundered up the bank I lost no time in getting free of the tree and getting to Dad and Thangavelu.

'"Are you all right?" the old man asked.

'I could not help smiling. He appeared in worse shape than I was and his voice was hoarse from screaming.

'"Thanks. I'm fine." I assured him.

'"Thank God," he said, and then, "Let's get out of here."

'"That's a sentiment with which I fully agree. And fast," I added, rather unnecessarily.

'We stumbled away from the soap-nut tree as quickly as we could. Elephants are individuals after all, and this one could change his mind and return.'

The following morning we went back to recover Dudhwalla's camera and Don's torch. A sight awaited us.

Perhaps the camera had been thrown clear of the falling tree, or perhaps it had got caught up in the tarpaulin. Anyway, either deliberately or by accident, the elephant had stamped it flat. Gone was Dudhwalla's camera and Donald's precious flashlight photograph of the tiger eating its kill! But we found the torch unharmed.

Later that day we sat by the swollen banks of the river, watching the spotted deer and the langur monkeys feeding and playing upon the opposite bank. The wind of the previous night had knocked down the wild figs by the thousand from the great tree on the other side of the river. A herd of about thirty spotted deer were feasting upon them, while the family of langur monkeys that had found the figs earlier and had been tucking into them were now too full to eat any more. They were frolicking and playing with one another and the spotted fawns like children. Now and again a half-grown langur would leap from the branch of a tree onto the back of a startled spotted doe, tweak her ears or pull her stumpy tail and then jump back again. The spotted stag was indignant at such activities and so were the older langurs, but the fawns frisked about, trying to play catch-as-catch-can with the younger monkeys. It was an unusual and pretty sight.

But as we were looking, death struck where all had been so peaceful. The herd of deer had moved away but the monkeys were still gambolling when a rusty brown streak leaped out of the jungle upon a half-grown langur that had strayed a short distance from the band.

For once the langur watchman had failed in his duty. Perhaps he had been too distracted in watching us to notice the lone, slinking wild dog that had successfully stalked the happy monkeys and now stood upon the opposite bank of the river with one of them dangling from his jaws.

Most of the monkeys scampered to the tree-top, screaming invectives, but the langur watchman and the big males leaped down in concerted attack, voicing the harsh langur war-cry: 'Hok! Hok! Hok! Hok!' They were too late. The young langur was already dead.

Don and I stood up and shouted in unison. My voice, already strained by my efforts of the night before, must have sounded ghastly, for the wild dog dropped the dead monkey in fright and ran a few yards away. There he stopped to gaze at us stonily. These creatures are exceptionally bold, far more so than the great cats of the jungle. They hardly fear man, although they do not attack him as a rule.

The river was swollen and too deep to wade across, but while still shouting to keep the wild dog at bay, we made it by clambering along the trunk and branches of an ancient tree that had fallen years ago and still spanned the stream. The silver-grey body of the black-faced little langur was warm when we picked it up, the great tail, nearly a yard in length, hanging limply from the carcase.

The monkey tribe was still on the tree-top, screaming invectives at the watching murderer, while the watchman and the other males bared their teeth at the wild dog and us alternately. Then they appeared to understand that we were not responsible for the little creature's death and fell silent as we picked up the lifeless body and placed it as high as Don could reach on the crotch of the tree where the monkeys were grouped. After that we returned to our side of the river.

The langurs came down now and surrounded the carcase of their companion. Some smelled it, others handled it. An old female, who might have been its mother, picked it up and kissed it. The large black eyes in those jet black faces seemed strangely shiny and moist. Do langurs weep?

We left 'tiger-land' that afternoon, disappointed but richer in experience for our little adventure with the elephant. The geese had come down from the Himalayas in larger numbers than usual this year, and Don had planned a geese-and-duck shooting expedition with some friends. So we had to return in time to meet them. I did not join the party.

Man-Eaters and Jungle Killers

Introduction

Time and civilisation march inexorably onward, bringing in their wake industrialisation, higher standards of living, and greater amenities and comforts, but at the price, it seems, of an ever-diminishing appreciation of Nature. Her face has been scarred and furrowed by man-made projects and constructions. Every minute of the day hoary trees, the giants of the forest, some of them centuries old, crash to earth, felled by the hand of man, either for the sake of the timber they provide or to make room for the constant expansion of a mechanical culture: a condition in which only a few are happy and which is occasionally punctuated by the most barbaric atrocities.

With the crash of the forest giants, other things take their departure too: the wild animals, the birds and all the living creatures that once beautified our lands. They are all disappearing, and very rapidly too!

Such was the case long ago with the American prairies, once the home of countless bison and now completely cleared of its ancient tenants. Africa is rapidly following suit. Where are those myriad heads of game that once covered the face of that wonderful land? Some still remain; but long ago the bones of the vast majority lay bleaching in the hot African sun, scattered across those thousands of miles by the bullets of avaricious, unscrupulous and money-making hunters—men who sometimes shot the mighty elephant for commercial ends, literally by thousands.

India, too, has lost much, for the decrease in the variety and number of her wild life has been alarming. I know localities where until 1930 the moaning sough of a tiger or the guttural sawing of the panther were normal sounds in the night, followed always by the warning call of sambar and other members of the deer family. Now the night passes without a sound, except perhaps for a persistently chirping cricket. Where once the pug-marks of a tiger and other wild-animal trails would tell their morning story of the creatures that had passed that way during the night, the tiny tracks of a few rabbits might today indicate that they at least have not been exterminated.

I do not wish to enter into argument as to how and why a country loses so much with the disappearance of her wild life. Anyone who has never come to know and love the jungle, its solitude and all that its denizens signify, could never appreciate such sentiments, nor the sense of irreparable loss and sorrow felt by those who look for the once familiar forms that are no longer there, or listen vainly for those once familiar sounds that were music to their ears, only to be greeted by a devastating silence.

One cannot doubt that the time will come when even the few living creatures that today remain in their natural state will have vanished, and man may then, and only then, realise too late what a priceless asset he has wantonly allowed to be thrown away.

I write these stories not only in the hope that they may afford some degree of pleasure to the adventurous, but that they may also indicate what the conditions of living, in and near the great forests of India, were once like, and to show too that one of the greatest opportunities that any individual could desire, of showing his skill and perseverance in the fine sport of 'Shikar', is now in the process of vanishing forever.

The Marauder of Kempekarai

If you try to imagine two parallel ranges of lofty hills, averaging four thousand feet and more above the sea, with a valley between them about five miles across, covered with dense forest except for the craggy summits, you will have in your mind's eye the background of my story. It is set in the North Salem district of the Presidency of Madras in southern India.

The hills run from north to south, and the easterly range is the more lofty of the two, culminating at its southern point in the peak of Gutherayan, which is over 4,500 feet high. On its slopes stands a lovely little forest lodge, known as Kodekarai Bungalow, amidst some of the finest scenery in the world. Rolling hills and jutting cliffs are to be seen in every direction. The sun rises in shades of rose-pink above the billowing clouds of morning mist, to set eventually in the orange-bronze reflections behind the western range. Then the moon comes up in pallid splendour, tipping the hill-tops, and later the deep valleys, with her luminous wand. Through the night she rides the heavens, silent witness of many a jungle tragedy in the dark forests below. The scream of a dying sambar or the shrill shriek of a spotted stag have often gone forth in vain to that same full moon as they spilled their life-blood on the forest floor beneath the paws of a hungry tiger.

More than twenty years ago I had the honour of meeting the brother of King Amanuallah of Afghanistan, who was exiled from his native country and lived at Kodekarai Bungalow, which was his favourite abode. He told me that he loved the place, that its scenery reminded him of his beloved Afghanistan, except that the hills of Kodekarai were forest-clad while those of his country were bare. But both of them exemplified space and freedom.

Kempekarai is a small hamlet standing on the lower slopes of the western range. Around it lie a few fields and beyond the fields the forest of dense bamboo, intersected by a rocky stream that flows down the centre of the valley.

This valley, which I called 'Spider Valley' because of the immense spiders that spin their webs across the narrow footpath that runs beside the stream, broadens out toward the south into a larger tract known as the Morappur Valley where the rocky stream finally joins the Chinnar river at a spot called Sopathy, some ten miles from the Cauvery river.

I have described the area at some length so that the reader may, with a little imagination, share the stirring beauty: the dank smell of rotting vegetation, the twilight of a dense jungle, the distant half-roar, half-moan of a man-eating tiger searching for its prey, the eerie and deathly silence that follows those thrilling calls, and finally that faint rustle in the undergrowth, the indefinable creeping something that is the man-eater, watching as he becomes aware of your presence and pits the age-long hunting skill of his kind against the civilised intellect of man.

But let me begin my story.

Kempekarai was in a state of great fear, for a man-eating tiger had appeared, and three of its few inhabitants had already gone to fill his bill of fare.

The first victim, an old poojaree, had left Muttur, eleven miles away, to come to Kempekarai one month ago. He was never seen again. Elephants infest these areas, and very occasionally kill men, so when the poojaree failed to arrive at Kempekarai, a search-party set out towards Muttur. Perhaps the men who composed it expected to come upon the plate-like spoor of an elephant, and to find the squashed remains. But they found neither. About five miles from Kempekarai they did come upon the tracks of a male tiger, a little blood by the path- side, the old man's staff and his loincloth —and, nothing more.

Some ten days later, near sunset, a woman went down to the community well to fill her water-pot for the night. She never returned. At eight p.m. her husband and some of his friends, carrying lanterns and staves, visited the well to look for her. The brass water-pot, half-filled with water, lay on its side some twenty feet from the well, where it had been dropped by the woman on her return to the village. Of her there was no trace.

Next morning, a search-party was instituted, which duly came across the woman's saree, later a silver anklet, and finally her remains. Her head lay under a bush; her hands and feet were scattered about; of the remainder of her body, a goodly number of gnawed bones showed the tiger had indeed been hungry and had done full justice to a succulent repast.

A month dragged by. Kempekarai assumed the air of a fortress besieged. Nobody came in, and nobody went out. The immediate precincts, and in some cases interiors, of the few huts stank with human filth. Was there not a killer nearby, waiting for the first victim who was bold enough to even venture outside to answer the call of nature? The matter was particularly perilous at night; human beings, with their cattle and sometimes their dogs, were barricaded together within their cramped huts behind doors that were kept shut with logs of wood or rounded boulders from the stream. The huts became more filthy every day, under the force of the terrible circumstances in which the people were placed.

But the very best of precautions sometimes fall short of attaining their desired results. Mara, one of the sons-in-law of my old friend Byra, the poojaree, had spurned to live in such insanitary conditions. He had told his wife that, man-eating tiger or not, he for one would not soil the inside of his house. Nightly he had gone outside to answer the calls of nature, and nightly he had returned. Then one night he went out as usual for the same purpose, but this time he did not return. His wife, anxiously waiting inside, admits she heard a dull thud, a rasping gurgle, but nothing more.

After fifteen minutes she raised an alarm. Nobody would come to her rescue, for nobody dared. The inhabitants of the barricaded huts heard her shrieks for help. They knew that by this time Mara was beyond human assistance. He was dead, but they were alive! What was the use of going outside to join him among the dead! So they remained indoors, and listened to her screaming for the remainder of that long night.

Next morning, a half-hearted attempt was made to find what was left of Mara, and it would have been unsuccessful but that the tiger had boldly eaten his fill among the bushes within two hundred yards of the village. A little more was left of Mara than had been left of the woman who had gone to the well. Perhaps his flesh was tougher, or perhaps the tiger was less hungry. Who knows? His head and torso, at least, were still in one piece.

Because of the fate that had befallen his son-in-law, my old friend Byra, who happened to be at Kempekarai at that time, undertook the hazardous eighteen-mile journey to the village of Pennagram next day. He came by himself, as nobody would accompany him, and made the journey without sight or sound of the man-eater. At Pennagram he sought out his old acquaintance, Ranga, and the two of them came by bus to Bangalore. At 9 p.m. that night voices called me to the front door, and, going outside, I was surprised but delighted to see my old jungle companions once more.

The Salem district had meanwhile adopted 'prohibition' as a guiding policy towards physical, moral and, no doubt, spiritual uplift. But my two visitors, being simple, honest forest-folk, with no such high physical, moral or spiritual pretensions, enjoyed a shot of good spirits in the form of half a tumbler of neat brandy, each. Thus refreshed, they began at the beginning, or rather Byra did, and related the brief history of the coming and doings of the man-eater, as I have told it to you, closing with the flat statement that his son-in-law, Mara, must be avenged and that I was to do it.

In the face of that argument and his childlike confidence in me, I could find no very convincing reply. Three days later I was on the road to Pennagram, where I left the Studebaker. We bought supplies at the local market, and within a few hours the three of us were trudging those eighteen miles to the little hamlet of Kemperkarai, where the car could not go.

A couple of miles before our destination we found fresh pug-marks of a tiger on the footpath. No human traveller had passed along this track for many days, and the spoor was clear. I made careful measurements and noted that the pugs belonged to a male tiger of average size. This gave no indication whether the maker was an old animal, or of normal adult age, nor could any of us say at that time whether he was the man-eather, or just another passing tiger.

The few inhabitants of Kempekarai were unable to add much material information to that which had already been given to me by Byra. They thought the man-eater was an enormous animal, but, of course, all simple folk, when keyed up to a state of sheer terror bordering on panic, as had been the case with these poor people for the past few weeks, are given to attributing superhuman cunning and wholly impossible bodily strength and size to their oppressor.

The problem now was: how to proceed, and what to do? The answer was: wait for a kill, or present a live-bait. This particular tiger had not killed a single cow or other domestic animal belonging to the villagers. So far, at least, it had killed only human beings. The question was: would it kill an animal bait, or should that bait be human? To which the only answer was, that in the event of a human bait, it could be nobody but myself, an answer which I thoroughly disliked even to think about.

Byra, Ranga, and myself went into close conference, over successive mugs of tea, and eventually an answer began to take shape. I thought we should try animal baits, but they thought a human bait—myself, of course—would produce immediate results. I heartily wished they had reached a different conclusion.

In a three-man committee, any two of them form an overwhelming majority. The odd man must give in but I managed to force my point to the extent of agreeing that together with the human bait, there would be no harm in trying out a couple of young bullocks at selected spots as an additional attraction.

No buffaloes were available at Kempekarai, so I bought two bullocks, one of which we tied at the spot where we had found the pug-marks, and the other on the bed of the stream that meandered along the bottom of the valley. I sat on the stone parapet of the well, my back resting against one of the wooden uprights that supported the pulley-wheel, through which ran a rope for drawing water. I arranged for a metal pot to be tied to the end of this rope, which I kept beside me on the parapet. Fresh water is always nicer to drink than that from a water-bottle.

The jungle began some fifty yards from the well in all directions except one. Here somebody had planted a dozen or more papaya trees. With the occasional watering from the well that these trees received, an undergrowth, mainly of grass with a few shrubs here and there, had sprung up around the papaya tree. In daylight this undergrowth appeared negligible, but with twilight and approaching darkness, I began to feel it presented an admirable line of approach for the man-eater, which could easily crawl through it on its belly and come within almost springing distance of where I sat, without my being aware of its presence.

When this thought came to my mind, I changed my position to the other side of the well, using the opposite wooden upright as a back-rest, so that I now faced the papayas.

I had only decided to expose myself in view of the fact that we had fortunately come at a time just before full moon. Moonrise almost synchronised with sunset, but I had forgotten that the moon still had to top the range of hills to the east before it could cast its brilliance on that benighted well. This would only happen after 8 p.m. and I spent one of the worst ninety minutes of life awaiting—I cannot hope to express how eagerly and anxiously—the first rays of that longed-for moon.

The experience brought me back to the terrible hours I had spent before the huts of Gummalapur, awaiting that horrid panther, and to the day I had sat with my back to the teak tree, in the far distant Chamala forest range, hoping for a glimpse of a similar man-eater;[1] and I wondered what had made me so foolish as once again to place myself in such an awkward predicament. Then common sense told me that perhaps it was the only way.

The darkness was deathly still, and not even the familiar nightjar came anywhere near me. A few bats flitted down the well, to sip the limpid water in a series of flying-kisses, as they quenched their thirst after the hot day. I strained my eyes, not only towards the papaya trees, but also in all directions. Imagination created the form of the man-eater, slowly creeping, stealthily stalking me, from just outside my range of vision. I sat glued to the parapet, my .405 cocked, my thumb on the torch-switch.

The thoughts that spring to a man's mind at such times are often strange and unaccountable, but why should I burden you with them? The tiger first assumed the role of possible avenging fate. At other times it practically faded from conscious thought.

Shortly after eight o'clock the skyline above the eastern range grew more distinct; a pale glow diffused itself against the sky, dimming the stars, and then the moon appeared, lightening both the surroundings and my nervous condition. As the moon rose higher in the heavens, the scene became brighter, until I could see almost clearly between the stems of the papaya trees. Not a sound disturbed the silence of my vigil for practically the first half of the night.

Shortly after 11 p.m. a sambar stag voiced its strident call from the bed of the stream where I had tied one of my bullocks. I recognised the note of alarm and fear in its voice, as the call was repeated over and over again, to die away at last in the distance, when the stag ascended the rampart of the opposing range of hills to safety.

Again silence fell, and the night dragged out its last hours. It then struck me that I might perhaps be able to catch the tiger's acute hearing, if he was anywhere within a mile, by operating the pulley-wheel above the well, which, I had noticed earlier in the afternoon, creaked and squealed loudly as it revolved about its uncoiled axle. Perhaps he would hear and be attracted, thinking another prospective victim was drawing water from the well.

So I went around the well to where the water-pot rested on the ground. First of all I stood the firearm up against the wall, and then let the pot down till it touched the water, drawing it up and letting it down in slow succession thereafter. The pulley screeched loudly in the silence of the night, and I continued for nearly an hour, stopping every now and again to survey my surroundings intently, particularly the deep shadows cast by every bush. But nothing stirred, and in the breathless air not a leaf moved, nor did even a belated rat rustle the dried debris that carpeted the ground beneath the adjacent papayas. To all intents and purposes, I was the only living thing in that area, apart from the inmates of the huts, secure behind barricaded doors.

After 3 a.m. the moon began to sink behind the western range of hills, and the same conditions presented themselves as in the previous evening. It grew darker and darker, and soon I could see only a few yards around me, and that by the radiance of the stars that came to life, and twinkled overhead, with the disappearance of the setting moon.

There were only ninety minutes of darkness left, and I felt terribly sleepy. Still I had now to redouble my guard. Had I not been trying to attract the tiger for the past hour? As he had not passed that way all night, it was just possible he might do so now. Moreover, conditions for a surprise attack were all in his favour, as the papaya trees themselves now became undefined, except as a darker blur among the other shadows in my line of vision.

I realised that the man-eater had me completely at his mercy if he chose to attack. Should he roar as he charged, I could at least discharge my rifle at point-blank range. On the other hand, if he crept silently upon me, I would not be aware of his coming until actually struck down.

At the same time, all the rats and rabbits, and other small animals, which had been conspicuous by their absence all night, appeared to select this moment to rendezvous near the well. They scurried hither and thither, and rustled the dead leaves, sometimes noisily, sometimes barely audibly, while my excited imagination telegraphed the urgent message 'the man-eater is coming'.

Altogether I had a dreadful time. The false dawn came and went, and then at 5.45 a.m. the brightening of the skyline once more, above the eastern range, told me that daylight was at last at hand and that the tedious vigil was nearly over. It was well past seven before the sun peeped over the eastern hills, and I arose and dragged my wary, sleepy steps to the tent I had pitched at the southern end of the village.

Hot tea and a nap till ten-thirty. Then, accompanied by Ranga and Byra, I first visited the bait tethered in the streambed. It was alive and well. Closer inspection showed that a tiger had approached to within 15 feet of it and had passed on after a cursory inspection.

The sambar stag I had heard during the night had doubtless seen or scented this tiger and had voiced his loud alarm. The tiger's pug-marks were clearly identified as having been made by the same animal as had been those I had seen while coming along the path on the western range, where the ground was firmer and dimensions not exaggerated. Nevertheless, I had little doubt that this was the real man-eater, for a normal tiger will not readily leave a tempting, unguarded bait alive.

We then went to see the other bullock, where a surprise awaited us. It had been killed by a tiger, whose pug-marks were identical with those I had carefully measured the previous day, near the very same spot on the pathway.

The question now was this: were there two tigers in the vicinity, or had the second bullock been killed by the man-eater? If the latter was the case and there was only one tiger— and that the man-eater— why had he not killed the bullock which had been tied in the streambed instead of just looking at it and choosing to kill the other?

I formed the definite opinion that there were two tigers in the vicinity, and that it had been the man-eater which had ignored the bullock at the stream. Ranga agreed with me, but Byra would not commit himself to either opinion. He suggested that the man-eater might be the only tiger in the area, that it had not killed the first bullock, possibly because it was a white one. The second, being dark brown, had been above suspicion.

On the question of the colour of a live-bait I have a very open mind. In my own experience, colour makes little or no difference to a tiger, and he will kill your bait provided certain other conditions also exist. He must be hungry, for a tiger rarely, if ever, kills wantonly. Moreover, he must not suspect a trap of any kind. In these days when tiger-hunting is becoming intensified, tigers are learning their lessons quickly. Nature makes an effort to try to preserve a species which is rapidly becoming shot-out.

Thus a bait secured around the neck by a rope stands a very good chance of not being touched by a tiger. He cannot reason, but his instinct, or sense of self-preservation, tells him that it is unnatural of villagers to tie up their cattle for the night in a forest. A bait secured by a rope tied around the horns stands more chance of being killed, for it is possible for an animal to get entangled in the under-growth by its horns. A bait secured by its hind leg is also readily taken. The main point to be remembered is that both tigers and panthers attack the throats of their victims, and there should therefore be no visible obstruction to prevent this method of attack, or the attacker becomes suspicious.

Panthers are generally less careful than tigers in this respect, and take greater risks. Personally, I dislike tethering dogs as bait for a panther; I feel the practice is extremely cruel, for the dog is a very sagacious animal and knows well the purpose for which he is being tied. This being so, he must suffer terrible mental torture till his attacker arrives. When I was younger, and, I must confess, had fewer scruples, I tried to salve my conscience by protecting the dog's life. To achieve this I made a collar about four inches broad, using two pieces of leather, with numerous two-inch-long, sharpened nails in close array, protruding outwards, the heads of the nails coming between the two strips of leather. It would amuse me, in those bygone days, to watch the panther grab at the dog's throat, only to spring backwards in obvious dismay as the sharp nails pierced his mouth. Before he could solve the puzzle, of course, he was shot. But such elementary tricks cannot be played on a tiger.

Tying up a sickly live-bait is also fatal to success. The Badaga tribe, who inhabit the Nilgiri mountains, are very averse to selling healthy animals for bait, no matter what price is offered for them. They feel it is a sin to sacrifice the life of a good bullock. Invariably, they will offer only a sickly animal, whose days are numbered anyhow, for this purpose. I well remember tying up a bullock in the last stages of foot-and-mouth disease. For three nights in succession, as tracks in the sand revealed, the tiger came to the spot, walked around the bait, even squatted before it, and then decided it was too diseased to kill. On the fourth night, my son sat up over the sick animal, but by eight o'clock its allotted span of life was running out. It collapsed and took the whole night to die. That night the tiger did not even appear.

Hunters of experience vary in their opinions regarding the colour of a live-bait, and I have met a few who avoid using white animals, either cattle or goats, because they claim that these are the least likely to be taken. A famous panther-hunter of days gone by, who had shot over a hundred panthers, was very averse to tying up a black goat, which, he claimed, made the panther extra wary in its approach.

I have digressed at some length on these points, as I feel many of you who read these stories will be interested to learn what might be called some aspects of the technique of tiger and panther shooting. In drawing-room circles we often hear of the extraordinary degree of 'good luck' that attends a certain shikari or big-game hunter. Actually, much of this 'good luck' is due to his previous experience of the innumerable factors that combine to make, or mar, a successful hunt.

Returning, to my story. There was obviously only one thing to do, and that was to fix a machan above the partly eaten brown bullock. Through experience both our baits had been tethered near suitable trees; so while I went back to the tent for a further nap, Ranga and Byra, both highly qualified in such matters, made a good job of slinging up the canvas camp-chair I had brought, neatly folded, with me. Next to a charpoy, or Indian rope-cot, a folding chair makes a good machan. It is not nearly so comfortable or roomy as the charpoy, but has an advantage in being easily taken to pieces and folded up.

Returning by 5 p.m., I took up my position, prepared for an all-night vigil.

The pathway, situated as it was on the western range above the village of Kempekarai, received the rays of the rising moon far earlier than did the village and the well, where I had spent the previous night. So it was that, soon after the sun sank below the western hill-tops, the moon peeped over the eastern range, and visibility was good all around me.

Nothing happened, till shortly after eight, when I became aware that the tiger stood directly beneath me. How or from where it had come, I never knew. Certainly not along the path which was clearly visible in both directions as it stretched away into the forest. I knew the tiger was below me by the soft noise it made as it rubbed its body against the trunk of the tree in which I was sitting, and in doing so looked up and became aware of my presence!

Things then began to happen quickly. With a snarling growl, the tiger began at once to claw its way up the tree trunk. Fortunately, we had selected a tree with fairly straight trunk till the first crotch was reached at about fifteen feet above the ground—where I was sitting on the camp chair. I knew that this was the man-eater, for normally a tiger would have decamped at once on becoming aware that a human being sat above him.

Instinctively I drew up both legs as high as possible, while leaning over the chair sideways and to the left, to get in a shot. Unfortunately, I had leant in the wrong direction, for the tiger was trying to climb the tree on my right side. I quickly corrected myself, but now had to hold the rifle to my left shoulder.

It took you longer to read the preceding two paragraphs than events actually took that night. As I have said, I was sitting about fifteen feet above the ground. A normal tiger is about nine feet long from nose-tip to tail-tip. Subtracting the length of his tail and adding something in compensation for an outstretched forepaw, we may come by a working figure of almost 8 feet to cover the 'stretching range' of man-eater, or for that matter, of any tiger. Deducting these eight feet from the original height of fifteen feet, we get a difference of about seven feet, which was about the distance that the tiger succeeded in climbing the tree-trunk that night. In his eagerness to get hold of me he stretched out a forepaw, and as the sharp claws drove through the canvas of the camp-chair seat, and incidentally partially through my pants, the tiger lost his balance and fell backwards to earth, while instinctively, in my anxiety to protect my rear, I half-levered myself out of the chair. I was lucky not to drop my rifle and follow in the wake of the tiger.

Now it is a peculiar fact about man-eaters, both tigers and panthers, that they appear to be craven creatures, although they attack and devour human beings. Almost without exception, such attacks are made from behind, and when the victim is not aware of the presence of his attacker. Very rarely, indeed, has any man-eater been known to carry out frontal attack or rush a person who is aware of his presence and faces him.

So it was that night, for, as he fell backwards to earth, the man-eater realised his presence had been disclosed, and no sooner had he landed on the ground than, with a bound and a snarl, he disappeared in the surrounding lantana.

I cannot say to which of our good fortunes it was that he did so, for, although I had now become aware of his presence and was prepared for him, I might easily have overbalanced, or dropped the rifle, in trying to get a downward shot at that very awkward angle, directly below me. Be that as it may, he was gone in a flash, and as suddenly and as unexpectedly as he had come.

My presence having been discovered, there was now no point in remaining motionless or silent. Reviewing the damage done, I discovered three claw-marks through the canvas of the chair, each about five inches long, where the tiger's forepaw had swept. Of these, two had penetrated the seat of my pants — and myself inside them to a lesser extent. The flesh certainly smarted, to remind me of the fact.

Normally, the incident would evoke some mirth in the minds of mirthful people, but I would remind them that the claws of all carnivores are full of poisonous bacteria from the decomposed flesh at which they tear, and a man-eater is no exception to this rule, because the flesh happens to be human. The canvas of the chair, and the cloth of my pants, were not sufficiently thick to absorb all this poisonous material, so that there was some chance of my wound becoming infected.

I had brought with me a variety of first aids, including a good stock of procaine penicillin and my five c.c. hypodermic syringe. But all these were in my tent at Kempekarai, some two miles away. I had therefore to choose between returning immediately and taking medical precautions, or remaining till morning—which was at least ten hours ahead—by which time the poison might have spread in the wounds. In the one case I had to face the chance of an attack by the man-eater, which might be launched anywhere along the path for the distance of the two miles it extended up to Kempekarai. On the other hand, I had to face perhaps the more certain danger of sepsis, and a long period of incapacitation from pursuing the man-eater.

So I chose to risk the tiger, as the lesser of the two evils, and quickly letting my rifle down on the rope brought for the purpose, I quickly scrambled down myself, praying fervently that the man-eater would not choose that very moment for a second attack. Reaching the ground, I stood with my back to the tree-trunk, while I freed the rifle from the rope by which I had lowered it. All was as silent as the grave, and not a sound came from any part of the forest to give me any indication of the whereabouts of my recent attacker. For all intents and purposes he might be ten miles away, or behind the nearest bush! The brilliant moonlight bathed the jungle in its ethereal glow, making visible each leaf and grass-blade as they gracefully vibrated to the soft currents of the night-breezes that gently wafted the scent of night flowers along the glades of the forest, or blew in gusts between the aisles of its myriad trees.

After a few moments, I set forth along the path on the two-mile walk to Kempekarai. Now this path varies in width according to the nature of the soil, and the character of the vegetation, from fifteen feet at the maximum to hardly a yard. At certain spots it is fringed with long grass and at other places by lantana undergrowth. Several small streams have to be crossed, where bamboos grow in profusion, their tall swaying stems creaking to the gentle breeze, while the fronds, in obliterating the moonlight, cast ghostly, chequered patterns on the ground in front.

In such circumstances your heart thumps in your chest almost audibly and as if to leap from its cage; your nerves are frayed to breaking-point and every faint rustle heralds the man-eater's charge. The inclination is to hurry, if not break into a run. Your nerves signal you to look to one side or the other, for the tiger may be making an attack from behind or from either side!

All these emotions must be held under close restraint, for to give way to them in the least would mean panic, and panic will cause you to lose your presence of mind, with ultimate but certain destruction to follow.

The thing to make certain of is that the tiger is not in front, lying in ambush till you come abreast of him. To attack from the rear, he has to make at least some noise in the undergrowth in order to catch up with your normal stride as you walk forward.

It is wisest, therefore, to look in front, although your eyes must search every shadow before you come abreast of it, rather than keep turning the head from side to side. Keep your rifle cocked and held in the crook of your arm, for you will have to fire from your hip, and make certain of your shot. There will be no time to raise the rifle to your shoulder and aim, for the tiger is a killer, and it is not the habit of killers, either animal or human, to go about advertising their presence. For if they did, they would soon cease to be the killer—and become the 'killed' instead.

If your quarry is wounded, you may perhaps hear a snarl or growl, but most likely that unnervingly awful, earth-shaking 'woof' as he charges. If he is not wounded, and a man-eater, you may expect to hear just nothing, for he will be upon you in the twinkling of an eye.

Hardly a quarter-of-a-mile before Kempekarai there is a low outcrop of boulders on both sides of the path. This is the most dangerous spot in the journey home, as the tiger could be behind any one of those boulders. However, seeing him head the other way when he made off, I felt he had not had enough time to retrace his steps. With this mental assurance, I negotiated the rocks, and soon came to Kempekarai and my tent.

Ranga and Byra were awake, as they always remained when I went out alone, in case I should require their sudden assistance. Telling them to make a fire and heat some water, I drank some coffee that had been kept ready, and got out my hypodermic, which I sterilized in the hot water. Thereafter, mixing two phials of eight-lakh units of procaine penicillin, I gave myself a shot with the syringe.

I got Ranga and Byra to wash the wounds with a strong solution of potassium permanganate dissolved in the rest of the hot water, followed by a dressing of sulphonomide ointment. The spot was one that could not be bandaged, or plastered, so I went to sleep hoping that no ill effects would develop with my wounds.

I was tired after my sleepless nights, and it was nearly nine before I awoke next morning. This is a very late hour for rising in any jungle, where one is usually up and out before sunrise. The wounds, I was glad to note, were not unduly painful.

Taking another four lakhs of penicillin, and after redressing the wounds, I breakfasted excellently on porridge, bacon and eggs, and an enormously large, ripe papaya fruit from the grove by the well-side, where I had spent the first night.

Then I set off to visit my bait on the streambed, which I found as alive and well as on the previous morning. Returning the two miles up the path to where I had sat the previous night, I found the tiger had not come back nor touched the bullock he had killed two nights before. His pug-marks, as he had approached the tree, identified him as the tiger whose prints I had seen first.

The forests of Salem, unlike those of the Nilgiris, Coimbatore and Chittoor districts, are mostly thorny in nature, lantana and the 'wait-a-bit' thorn predominating. Along the valleys and streambeds these give way to clumps of bamboo, massed in close array. In either case, the effect is the same, namely, to make roaming or stalking unprofitable, if not impossible.

A carnivore moves silently, and the secret of its success as a hunter lies in the animal instinctively watching where it places its front paw in order to make no sound. Next it places its rear paw in exactly the same spot, as the front paw moves forward again to take the next step. The human stalker must move silently, too. He must watch carefully where he places each step, for the smallest dry leaf will crackle when trodden upon; the smallest twig will snap. Those clutching 'wait-a-bit' thorns must be avoided, too, for a single thorn is strong enough to halt your progress if it catches in any part of your clothing, while it will rip your flesh in no uncertain manner if you are foolish enough to wear shorts.

All this will distract your attention from being on the lookout for the tiger, and if that tiger is a man-eater, who will not be deterred by thorns, you are at a distinct disadvantage.

The jungle at this spot was etremely thorny, so we returned to Kempekarai to hold a council of war with the 'greybeards' of the village. The facts, as far as we now knew them, showed that:

The man-eater was a male of average size.

He particularly frequented the path on the western range.

He did not particularly care for bullock meat.

We were still uncertain whether or not there was a second tiger in the vicinity.

The obvious conclusion reached after this discussion was much the same as that reached by Ranga, Byra and myself on the first day we had come to Kempekarai: either await the next human kill, or offer a human live-bait, preferably somewhere along the pathway to Kempekarai as it descends the western ridge. A couple of bullocks could also be tied out elsewhere in the jungle to tempt the man-eater, but more to find out if there was another tiger operating in the same area.

The scratches which the tiger had inflicted, being located where they were, made it impossible for me to sit still for more than fifteen minutes at a stretch. This fact precluded all chances of 'sitting-up', in the literal meaning of the word. True, if I was to act as a bait there would be no necessity for me to sit still. In fact, movement would be a necessary factor in helping to attract the tiger. On the other hand, the very act of sitting would not only be agonising, but would also retard the healing of the wounds, which I was naturally anxious to hasten.

The alternatives left were either to stand or lie down. The former course was naturally not advisable for a night-long vigil, so the only practical method under the circumstances was to lie down.

We did a lot of thinking that day and eventually came by what we all thought to be a very ingenious plan. How ingenious it actually turned out—or rather did not turn out to be—you will very soon come to know.

I have already explained that the footpath down the western range to Kempekarai was crossed at several places by streamlets, bordered by dense undergrowth and clumps of bamboo. The beds of these small rivulets were rocky and admirably suited the purpose I had in mind.

It so happened that the first of these small streams to be crossed on the way down to Kempekarai, from the tree on which I had sat the night before, was the broadest of the lot, and was, moreover, closely covered with rounded boulders of all sizes. My plan was to detach a cart-wheel from one of the only two bullock-carts in the village of Kempekarai, dig a pit in the stream-bed, get inside it, place the wheel above, and anchor it securely around the circumference with big boulders. Smaller boulders, and a camouflage of dry leaves, would help to conceal the cartwheel. I would also make a human dummy and seat it somewhere on the footpath, where it crossed the stream. The cartwheel would be raised off the ground at one end, facing the dummy, to allow me a range of fire in that direction.

This was my general plan. For the benefit of those who have not been to India, I would explain that the wheel of an Indian bullock-cart —I am referring to the large type of cart—averages five feet in diameter. The circumference is of wood, some six inches wide by three inches thick, shod with a hoop of iron to serve as a tyre. There are a dozen stout wooden spokes, all converging on a massive central wooden hub. The central hole in the wooden hub rotates around an iron axle, some one-and-a-half inches thick. The wheel is kept from falling off by a cotter-pin in the form of a flat iron nail, passing through the axle at its outer extremity. Similarly, the wheel is prevented from moving towards the frame of the cart by the axle itself, which is made suddenly thicker immediately beyond the bearing surface of the axle on the hub, which is perhaps a little over a foot in width. In what may be called deluxe models, a better bearing surface is provided by lining the hole in the wooden hub with a piece of iron or galvanised piping. 'High-grade lubrication', from the village viewpoint, is provided by applying old motor oil, perhaps once a fortnight, on the ends of the axle, after removing the cotter-pin and the wheel to do so. The oil is carried permanently on the cart in the shell of an old bullock-horn, suspended somewhere beneath the cart, and is applied to the axle at the end of any piece of stick that may happen to be lying handy, when 'servicing time' comes up.

It was too late to set the cartwheel that day, so we busied ourselves gathering old clothing from the villagers. Pants are unknown in such parts, so I contributed a pair of mine, into which we stuffed two 'legs', made of bamboo and wound around with straw. In case the pants might strike the tiger as being unfamiliar, we draped a 'dhoti' (which is a cross between a sarong and a loincloth) over the pants. The body of the dummy consisted of straw rammed into an old gunny sack, over which we draped a couple of torn shirts, and a very ragged coat. The head of the dummy was a work of art; it was made from a large-sized coconut, complete with its coir fibre.

On dress occasions Indian women sometimes augment their natural hair with 'false hair', which they twist into a 'bun' or 'coonday' behind their heads, into which they stick flowers, particularly jasmine. Fortunately there was a 'belle' in Kemperkarai who was vain enough to be the owner of a coil of such hair. This we borrowed, combed out, and fixed around the coconut, to emulate the long hair of a villager. An untidily-tied, 'yokel-pattern' turban was then wound around the nut and a pair of 'chappals' or sandals were put on the dummy's feet.

Tigers, as I have said, have no sense of smell, so the dummy looked realistic enough to attract a man-eater, if only he did not watch it long enough to begin wondering at its uncanny stillness.

That night I applied fresh dressing to my wounds, and next morning helped myself to another shot of penicillin. I was thankful to note that so far no undue inflammation had occurred.

By 8 a.m. half-a-dozen willing helpers and myself had trundled the cartwheel to the crossing I had in mind. Here we busied ourselves excavating a hole nearly four feet across by about four feet deep. This was easily done, for we were digging in the soft sand of a streambed. Some grass was then cut and thrown into the hole to absorb, to some degree, the dampness of the sand which naturally increased with the digging of the hole.

Sitting inside, I found I could adopt only a semi-crouched position, which was going to be very uncomfortable indeed, the only recommendation it offered being that it saved me from a sitting position, which, as I have said already, would have been most uncomfortable in view of my recent wounds.

The dummy we placed with its back to a tamarind tree, some fifteen feet away, which stood on the western bank of the stream where it was crossed by the track to Kempekarai; it was so arranged that its legs stuck out on the track at an angle of forty-five degrees. Thus, it would at once be visible to the tiger from any point along the streambed or on either section of the track, if he happened to pass in any of those directions. Lastly, we collected some of the larger boulders, and, as I stood guard with my rifle, Ranga and Byra gathered brushwood and debris for camouflaging the wheel.

When eventually I got into the hole, the wheel was just a couple of inches above the top of my head. There was a space of six inches between the ground level and the wheel through which I could fire in the direction of the dummy; it was made by placing two stones of that size about three feet apart under the circumference, leaving the central portion open to the sky for the purpose of ventilation. Brushwood and debris were scattered and intertwined among the boulders; it would also give me warning if he came up from behind, when the debris would crackle as he brushed against it or trod on it.

For safety's sake, I had arranged that the men should return to Kempekarai in a body, and only come back next morning, again in a body. I would be imprisoned all night in the hole, as the weight of the cartwheel with the boulders above it was too great for me to lift unaided from inside.

It was 4.30 p.m. when I entered my voluntary prison. It had taken nearly another half-hour to position the boulders on the wheel and arrange the camouflage, so that it was almost five when I found myself alone. The heat inside the hole, despite the opening above, was stifling. I removed my coat and shirt, and would have removed the remainder of my clothes but for the fact that I did not want the sand to get into my wounds.

Peeping above the level of the ground, I could clearly distinguish the dummy and quite a wide extent of the background. A clump of 'henna' bushes grew halfway down the sloping bank behind the dummy. A slight movement in that direction caught my eye, which I found was due to the twitching, outstretched ear of a beautiful spotted stag that gazed in curiosity at the motionless dummy. The value of sitting still in a forest was then made apparent to me, for the stag gazed a full ten minutes at that still dummy. Then it appeared to lose interest in the curious object, came out on to the open track, which it eventually crossed, vanishing into the jungle on the other side. The distance between the dummy and the stag could not have been much more than twenty feet, and yet the latter was quite unalarmed. Had a human been seated in place of the dummy, he would surely have moved, even if it was an eyelid that flickered, and this would have sent the stag crashing away in alarm.

A pair of peafowl then came strutting along the track. The cock-bird stopped, fanned out his tail and rustled the quills in display to his admiring spouse. Female-like, she kept one eye on him and the other elsewhere! Anyway, she saw the dummy, took a short run, and sailed into the air. The cock, chagrined at her failure to appreciate his beauty, lowered his tail and saw the dummy too. A much heavier bird than the hen, he flapped wildly and desperately in an effort to take off, his wings beating loudly on the still evening air, before he finally managed to rise just clear of the surrounding bushes and follow his more wary partner to apparent safety.

'Kuck-kaya-kaya-khuck' crowed the grey junglecocks in all directions, as they came out along the streambed to peck a few morsels before darkness fell. 'Kukurruka-wack-kukurruka-wack' cackled the smaller spurfowl, belligerent little birds, as male fought male in little duels throughout the jungle for the favour of an accompanying hen. Drab and uninteresting as she looks, to gain her favour was for them the only interest in the world that evening.

Darkness fell, to the farewell call of the pair of peafowl, as they roosted for the night on some tall tree in the forest, perhaps a quarter-of-a-mile away. 'Mia-a-oo-Aaow' they cried, as the sun sank behind the western range.

Those of you who have been in an Indian forest will remember the almost miraculous switch-over that takes place at sunset, as the birds of the daylight hours cease their calls, and the birds of the night take up theirs. 'Chuck-chuk-chuk-chucko' cried the nightjars, as with widespread wings they sailed overhead in search of insect morsels, or settled on the ground, resembling stones against a background of sand.

It was pitch-dark where I sat and even the dummy was hidden under the shadows of the tamarind tree beneath which it was propped. I reckoned the moonlight would not reach that spot till after ten. At nine I heard the noisy snuffling and deep-throated gurgle of a sloth bear, as it wended its clumsy way down the stream in my direction. It almost fell over the outlying debris we had placed on the streambed to give me warning of the tiger's approach, and then saw the newly-heaped boulders placed upon the cartwheel! I could have read the thoughts that crossed the little brain beneath the shaggy black hair! 'Here's a chance to find some luscious fat grubs, or a beetle or two; perhaps a nest of white ants, or, most hopeful of all, a beehive built by the small yellow bees that can hardly sting a big bear like me.'

With those thoughts, the bear fell to work on the task of clearing away the boulders that so carefully anchored my cartwheel.

'Shoo!' I whispered in an undertone. 'Get away, you interfering...!'

The bear heard my voice, and stopped. 'Where did that come from?' he was thinking. A few minutes' silence followed, and then he started at the stones again. 'Out! Shoo!' I whispered. The bear stopped, climbed over the boulders, and looked down between the spokes at me.

'Aa-rr, Wr-rrr!' he growled. 'Get out, you idiot!' I growled. 'Wr-oof! Wr-oof! Wr-oof' he answered, as he scrambled, helter-skelter, over the boulders, stumbled over the debris, scampered up the bank and crashed away between the dried bamboos.

Hardly ten minutes had passed after the bear's noisy departure when I heard the most infinitesimal of noises, the soft tread of the padded foot of some heavy animal. It is almost impossible to imitate that noise in speech, and less so on paper. The nearest description I can give is the very muffled impact of a soft cushion when it is thrown on to a sofa.

The tiger had come and in his silent way was negotiating the fringe of the debris we had scattered on the streambed behind me. He was picking his way carefully across it.

Would he attack the dummy? Would he pass in front of me? These were the questions that raced through my mind as I awaited developments. My nerves were taut with anticipation.

The moon had already risen, but its beams had not yet reached the shadows cast by the heavy foliage of the tamarind tree. The dummy was not visible to me, but I knew that the tiger could clearly see it.

There was silence for a time—how long I could not say. Then came the clink of a stone as it rolled above my head. Nobody had anticipated an attack in that direction; but my recent visitor, the bear, had already shown that the unexpected could happen. Now the unexpected was being repeated by the presence of the tiger above me. What had caused it to ignore the dummy, and come straight to the spot where I lay, was a mystery. Very likely, the tiger had been watching the bear, had seen its strange behaviour, had noted its hurried departure and had come to investigate. Even more likely, the behaviour of the bear had caused the tiger to suspect human agency, which he had come over to find out himself. Or perhaps the wheel just happened to be situated on the shortest line of approach which the tiger was following to get at the dummy.

Whatever be the reason, the tiger was now barely two yards away, and above me.

As these thoughts raced through my mind, I heard the vague sound caused by the tiger's breathing. Then he stepped gracefully over one of the big boulders that held down the wheel, and peered down at me.

In the meantime I had not been idle. Screwing myself around, as best as I could, I now lay half on my back, gazing up at the tiger. The rifle I had drawn inwards and backwards till the butt came up against the side of the hole. I have already told you this hole was about four feet across, and about the same in depth. Hence it was impossible to get the rifle to point completely upwards. The most I could manage was an angle of a little more then sixty degrees with the bottom of the hole. Unfortunately, the tiger was not in the direction in which the muzzle was pointing, but was standing behind it, and directly above the spot where the butt of my rifle was stuck against the side of the hole.

Then events moved quickly. The tiger did not react quite as the bear had done. His features, dimly visible above me, contorted into a hideous snarl. A succession of deep-throated growls issued from his cavernous chest, and, lying down upon the cartwheel, he attempted to rake me with the claws of a foreleg, which he inserted between the spokes of the wheel.

I knew those talons would rip my face and head to ribbons if they only made contact, so, sinking as low into the hole as possible, I struggled desperately to turn the muzzle of the rifle towards the tiger.

All this took only seconds to happen. The tiger growled and came a little farther on to the wheel. The muzzle of my rifle contacted his shoulder and I pressed the trigger.

The explosion, within that confined space, was deafening. The tiger roared hideously as he catapulted backwards. During the next thirty seconds he bit the boulders, the wheel and even the sand, as he gave forth roar after roar of agony. Then I heard him fall amidst the debris, pick himself up, fall again, get up and finally crash into the bushes that bordered the little stream. He was still roaring, and continued to do so for quite fifteen minutes more as he staggered away into the jungle.

Finally silence, total and abysmal, fell over the forest. After the pandemonium that had just reigned, every creature, including the insects, decided it was wise to hide till with the passage of time they could forget their fright.

The hours passed. At one in the morning a stiff breeze began to blow over the hills, dark storm-clouds scudded across the sky, completely hiding the moon, and soon the distant sound of falling rain across the western range fell upon my listening ears. Not long afterwards, large raindrops penetrated between the spokes and splashed down upon me.

Then the deluge began, such as can only be experienced in tropical countries, and particularly forest regions with dense vegetation. I was soaked to the skin, and the water began to trickle down the sides of the hole. With that came the sudden realisation that the stream, which had been dry, would soon be flowing with the spate of rain-water that was running into it from all directions along a hundred tributaries. I would be drowned like a rat in a hole.

Jerked into frenzied action, I got on my hands and knees, placed my back to the wheel and pressed upwards with all my might. The wheel did not budge an inch! My helpers had done their work of protecting me from the tiger only too well! They had placed the heaviest boulders they could find around the circumference of the wheel and I was unable to move them unaided.

There was but one chance left, and that was to dig myself out through the six-inch-wide gap we had made for me to fire through. Desperately, with both hands I scooped the earth downwards into the hole, which was already half filled with water and sand; the damp sides were collapsing, making it very obvious that within the next few minutes, unless I got out quickly, cartwheel and boulders would all come down together on top of me.

When I judged there was sufficient room for my body to pass, I pushed the rifle between the spokes of the wheel and then rested it across them. Next I started squeezing myself through the opening I had just dug, wriggling in the sand and water like a stranded eel, till I finally struggled free onto the streambed.

The rain continued to fall in torrents. I had no idea how far the tiger had gone, or in which direction, so, picking up the rifle, I first carried the dummy off the streambed and placed it high up on the western bank. Then I started to recross the stream on the return journey to Kempekarai, and as I did so, I heard the dull roar of the spate of rain-water descending the streambed from the direction of the hills.

Within a few minutes it arrived, a wall of foaming water over three feet high, carrying all before it. Logs of wood, uprooted trees, dead bamboos and flotsam and jetsam of every description mingled with the crested, frothing waters. They reached the cartwheel and covered it; then the cartwheel and boulders were swept away downstream along with the torrent. In less than five minutes the stream had become a raging river, over four feet deep.

Thankfully appreciating the escape I had had, I began the return journey to Kempekarai. No other sound could possibly be heard above the splatter and swish of the rain. The darkness was intense, my torch throwing a circle of light before me. Moreover, the ground was extremely slippery to the soft rubber shoes that I was wearing. I had to cross three other streams, slightly smaller that the one where I sat, but all were raging torrents of water.

Half-way to Kempekarai, I saw the flicker of an approaching light. A little later, I met the party of men that were carrying it—Ranga, Byra and a few stalwarts from the village. They had realised the danger I was in when the waters rose and had risked encounter with the man-eater to come to my rescue.

Next morning the sun shone brightly on the saturated forest. We returned to the site of my adventure the night before. All streams were flowing briskly, although they were now no more than two feet deep. There was no trace of the cartwheel anywhere near the crossing. Evidently it had been borne downstream by the spate and probably smashed to bits. We combed both banks thereafter, without finding any signs of the tiger. The torrential rain had only too effectively obliterated any blood-trail or pug-marks.

Two hours later, a depressed and disappointed group, we returned to Kempekarai. There I remained for three more days, hoping to hear news of the tiger, only to be doomed to disappointment. Both Byra and Ranga felt it had died of its wounds, but I doubted this very much, as I knew I had not been able to aim sufficiently well to score more than a mere raking shot.

My period of leave, taken for the purpose of shooting this animal, had now elapsed, so I left Kempekarai on the morning of the fourth day, instructing Ranga to remain behind to assist Byra in reconnoitring. They were then to come to Pennagram, and thence to Dharmapuri, where there was a telegraph office from which they could send me a message. They were to await my reply there.

Ten days after returning to Bangalore, the hoped-for telegram arrived, stating that a pack-pony belonging to a Forest Guard of the Kodekarai Forest Lodge had been killed. Calculating from the telegram that the kill would be four days old by the time I reached it, I sent a reply, telling my henchmen to return to Kempekarai and wait there for any further events, which were to be reported by telegram in the same way.

Six more days passed, when I received a second telegram stating that a tiger had attacked the driver of a bullock-cart that was the last of a convoy travelling from the small hamlet of Morappur towards Sopathy on the Chinar River.

This, no doubt, was the man-eater again. Within an hour I was on my way by car to Dharmapuri, where I picked up my two henchmen. We continued to Pennagram, where we left the car and made a cross-country trip of about twelve miles to Morappur, passing the Chinar river and Sopathy on the way.

I had meanwhile learned that the cartman, who had been attacked by the tiger, had saved his life by jumping from the cart, in which he was travelling, on to the yoke and then between the two bulls that were hauling his cart. He had yelled vociferously and his yells were taken up by the other cartmen in the 'convoy'. The tiger had then made off.

I spoke to this cartman at Morappur. He said that the tiger had suddenly appeared behind his cart, which was the last in the line, and had attempted to leap into it from the rear, when he had dived between his bulls for protection. Asking him why the tiger had not succeeded in the comparatively easy task of getting into the cart, the man said it had jumped half-in, and he had not waited to see any more.

Meanwhile, a party of travellers who had followed us from Sopathy brought the news that they had come across fresh tiger pug-marks, made the previous night, leading down the Chinar River.

Hearing this, we hurried back to Sopathy, and it did not take us long to find the pug-marks. The water was running in the Chinar as a silvery stream, meandering from bank to bank, and in the soft, wet sand we clearly noticed that the tiger which had made the marks must have been limping badly. The weight of the body fell almost entirely on the left forefoot, the right being placed very lightly on the sand at each step.

I have said that, 'Spider Valley' met the Chinar river at this spot. A half-mile downstream, and in the direction in which the tiger had gone, was a small longish rock in midstream. It rose some four feet above the bed of the river and was about forty feet long by eight feet wide. I decided to sit on top of that rock that night, in the hope the tiger might make his way back up the Chinar and see me in my elevated position.

Borrowing Ranga's turban, old brown coat and dhoti, I donned all three, the two latter above my own clothing, and seated myself on the rock by 5.30 p.m. As Ranga and Byra were afraid to return to Morappur alone, they elected to spend the night on comfortable crotches, high up in the huge muthee trees that border the Chinar in this locality.

The nights were dark at this time, but from my position on the rock, and as the Chinar was about 100 yards wide at this spot, I relied upon the white sand to reflect the starlight and to reveal the form of the tiger from whatever direction it might come. Apart from being handicapped by its lameness, I knew the tiger would not charge its prey from a distance of fifty yards, but would try to stalk as close to me as possible before launching the final attack.

After testing my lighting equipment, I carefully loaded and cocked the .405, which I laid on the rock to my right, where it could not be seen by the tiger and create suspicion. I had also taken the precaution of bringing my .12 bore double-barrel Jeffries with me as a spare weapon. With L.G. slugs in the choke barrel, and lethal-ball in the right, I laid the Jeffries on the rock to my left. My flask of tea, some chappaties to satisfy my hunger towards morning, and my pipe completed my creature wants for the night. I sat on my great-coat, for the cushion it provided against that hard rock; I would wear it if the night should become too cold.

The usual animal and bird calls from the forest bade farewell to the day, while the denizens of the night welcomed their turn of activity with their less melodious, and more eerie, cries.

At seven-thirty it was dark; the reflecting whiteness of the sands of the Chinar surrounded my rock as if it were an island.

Just after nine there was a loud bustling and crashing and a tusker came down the bank, walked along the sands, passed the rock where I sat motionless, and continued beyond. There he met the current of breeze blowing down the river and caught scent of me. Banging the end of his trunk against the ground, and emitting a peculiar sound as if a sheet of zinc were being rapidly bent in half, he turned around, smelled more of me and hurried up the bank into the cover of the thick undergrowth that grew there. Such is the behaviour of an elephant when it is not a rogue.

At eleven I was still keeping my watch in all directions, as I had been doing since sunset. Then, half to the rear and my left, I sensed rather than saw a movement. Looking more intently, I could see nothing. No, wait! Was that not a blur against the faint greyish-white carpet of river sand? I looked away and then back again at the spot where I had just noticed the blur. It was not there!

'That's funny', I thought. 'Are my eyes playing tricks, or are they just becoming tired?'

Staring hard, I saw it again. Only it was much closer to me this time than when I had seen it first. Indeed, it was halfway between the further bank and the rock on which I sat.

I could not now risk looking in any other direction until I succeeded in defining this strange object. And as I looked it seemed to stretch, to float towards me, growing longer and shorter at intervals, but making no sound whatever.

Then in a flash I realized what it was. The tiger was crawling towards me on his belly, silently, in quick, short motions, till he judged he was within range to make his final, murderous assault.

Perspiration poured down my face and neck; I trembled with terror and excitement. But this would not do; so taking a deep breath and holding it, to allay the trembling, I offered a silent prayer to my Maker and drew the rifle on to my lap, raising it to my shoulder.

The tiger, now some twenty yards away, saw my movement and seemed to guess that his presence had been discovered. A thin black streak, his tail moved behind him. The blur became compact as he gathered himself for the charge. My torch-beam fell full on his snarling, flattened head. Then the rifle spoke, a split-second before he sprang.

With my bullet he rose and bounded forward. I owe my life to the fact that the torch did not go out, and I was able to fire a second shot. Then he had reached the rock.

Because of his earlier wound, or my recent shots—at that moment I could not tell which—he failed to climb up. My third bullet, fired at point-bank range through the crown of his skull, stopped the charge that had all but succeeded in reaching me, and he rolled back on to the sands of the Chinar, his career at an end.

Whistling on my way back to Sopathy, I gathered Ranga and Byra from the muthee trees on which they were sitting. Hearing my shots, and seeing my approach along the riverbed, they gathered I had killed the tiger.

Next morning we found him to be an average-sized, somewhat thin, male. My shot from beneath the cartwheel, fired seventeen days earlier, had done more damage than I had thought, for it had passed through his right shoulder, splintering the bone, and out again. But the wound was in good condition, and I have little doubt, would eventually have healed, although the tiger would have remained a cripple. My first shot of the night before had passed through his open mouth, and out through the neck, blowing a gaping hole. Still, he had come on. The second shot had gone high, entering behind the left shoulder, passing downwards through the lungs, and out again. And still he had come on. It was only my last shot, through the crown of his skull, that had shattered the brain that impelled his indomitable spirit.

What had made this tiger a man-eater? This is the riddle that every hunter tries to solve when he kills a man-eater, be it tiger or panther, not only for his own information, but for the education of the general public. And this beast proved to be no exception to the invariable rule that it is the human race itself that causes a tiger to become a man-eater. It had an old bullet wound in the same leg—the right —as had been injured by me in our first encounter, only lower down; embedded in the elbow joint was a flattened lead ball, fired from some musket or gun a year or more earlier.

This foreign body, embedded in that most important joint, had not only caused the tiger to suffer intense agony, but had greatly impeded his movements when it came to killing his legitimate food, wild game and cattle. It had weakened the use of the right leg, which plays an all-important part in gripping and pulling down his normal prey. Without a doubt, this was the sole factor that forced this tiger to turn to human beings as food, in order to keep himself from starving.

Alam Bux and the Big Black Bear

The story i am now about to relate concerns a sloth bear. Quite a big, black and bad bear.

All bears, as I have had occasion to remark in other stories, are excitable, unreliable and bad-tempered animals. They have a reputation for attacking people without apparent reason, provided that person happens to pass too close, either while the bear is asleep or feeding, or just ambling along. So the natives give bears a wide berth; together with the elephant, they command the greatest respect of the jungle-dwelling folk.

This particular bear was exceptional among his kind for his unwarranted and exceptionally bad temper and aggressiveness. He would go out of his way to attack people, even when he saw them a long distance away.

The reason for his unusual conduct was difficult to explain. There were many stories about him, which were as varied as they were extraordinary. The most unpretentious was that he was quite mad. Other stories had it that he was a 'she' who had been robbed of her cubs and had sworn a vendetta against the human race. I think that the bear had been wounded or injured at some time by some human being. Perhaps the most fantastic of the stories was to the effect that this bear, almost a year previously, had kidnapped an Indian girl as a mate while she was grazing a flock of goats on the hill where he lived. The story went on to say that the whole village had turned out, en masse, to rescue the girl, which they had finally succeeded in doing, much to the bear's annoyance; he had then taken to attacking human beings in retaliation.

Whatever the reason be, this bear had quite a long list of victims to his credit; I was told that some twelve persons had been killed, and two dozen others injured.

Like all bears, he invariably attacked the face of the victim, which he commenced to tear apart with his tremendously long and powerful claws, in addition to biting viciously with deliberate intent to ensure the success of his handiwork. Quite half the injured had lost one or both eyes; some had lost their noses, while others had had their cheeks bitten through. Those who had been killed had died with their faces almost torn from their heads. Local rumours had it that the bear had also taken to eating his victims, the last three of whom had been partly devoured.

I had no opportunity to verify the truth of these rumours, but felt that they might be true to some extent, as the Indian sloth bear is a known devourer of carrion at times, although generally he is entirely vegetarian, restricting himself to roots, fruit, honey, white ants and similar delicacies. So fresh meat, even human meat, might not be unwelcome.

This bear originally lived in the Nagvara Hills, which lie to the east of the large town of Arsikere, some 105 miles northwest of Bangalore, and in Mysore State.

It was on these hills that he had perpetrated his earliest offences. Then, as he lost his fear of mankind and grew bolder, for no apparent reason he came down to the plains and commenced to harass people in their fields at dawn and dusk. He would come out from one or the other of the numerous small boulder-strewn hillocks that were dotted here and there, to forage for food.

I had been hearing occasional stories of this animal for about a year, but had not paid much attention to them, as I felt that, like nearly all the stories one hears in India of maulings and killings by wild animals, they were greatly exaggerated. Furthermore, as I think I have mentioned somewhere else, Bruin is quite an old friend of mine, against whom I have no antipathy. I was therefore most disinclined to go after him.

But there came an incident that made me do so. I have an old friend, an aged Muslim named Alam Bux, who is the guardian of a Mohammedan shrine situated on the main road which leads past Arsikere and on to Shimoga. This shrine is the burial place of a Mohammedan saint who lived some fifty years ago, and like hundreds of similar shrines scattered over the length and breadth of India, is preserved and held sacred by the Muslim community. Each shrine has its own guardian, or caretaker; invariably some old man who is quartered at the shrine itself to keep it clean and care for it. One of his particular duties is to light a lamp over the shrine, which is kept burning all night, to signify that the memory of the saint burns ever brightly in the bosoms of the faithful.

I first met Alam Bux on a dark night while motoring from Bangalore to Shimoga on my way to a tiger-hunt. The rear wheel of my Studebaker flew off, and the back brake-drum hit the road with a terrific jolt. I happened to be alone at the time and. stepping out of the car, viewed the situation with considerable disgust and annoyance. Fortunately for me, the incident had taken place almost opposite the shrine, and old Alam Bux, waking up at the noise made by the brake-drum striking and dragging along the road, came out to see what it was all about. Seeing my predicament, the old man volunteered to help me, which he did to a very considerable extent by bringing a lantern from his abode, gathering stones to serve as 'packing' while I raised the axle of the car, and last, but by no means least, by serving me with a bowl of hot tea. I thanked the old man, after he had replaced the truant wheel, and promised that I would look him up whenever I happened to pass his little hut again. This promise I had faithfully kept, and I never failed to bring the old man something, by way of supplies, on any occasion that I happened to pass.

Some four hundred yards beyond the shrine is a small knoll of heaped boulders, among which grew the usual lantana shrub. All around this knoll, and right up to the shrine and adjacent roadway, were fields in which the villagers grew groundnuts after the monsoon rains. Now, bears are very fond of groundnuts and our big black bear was no exception to this rule. The boulder-covered hillock offered a convenient lodging, and the groundnut fields were a great attraction. So he took up residence among the rocks.

He made his abode in a deep recess beneath an overhanging boulder. Hungry by sunset, he could be seen coming forth from his cave, and, as twilight deepened into nightfall, he would amble down the knoll and come out on to the groundnut fields. Here he would spend a busy night, eating, uprooting, and generally shuffling about over a wide area throughout the hours of the darkness. Early dawn would find him replete, with his belly full of roots and nuts, white ants, grubs and other miscellaneous fodder which he had come across during the hours or his foraging. Leisurely he would climb back to his abode, there to spend the hot hours of the day in deep and bearly slumber. I forgot to mention that a small tank, which is the Indian colloquial name for a natural lake, was conveniently situated on the other side of the hillock, so that our friend, this bad bear, wanted for nothing.

About this time the fig trees that bordered the main road which ran past the little shrine came into season, and their clusters of ripe red fruit filled the branches, spilling on to the ground beneath carpeting the earth in a soft, red, spongy mass. Hundreds of birds of all varieties fed on the figs during the day. At night, scores of flying fox, the large Indian fruitbat resembling in size and appearance the far-famed 'vampire' bat, would come in their numbers, flapping about with leathern wings, screeching, clawing and fighting among themselves as they gormandized the ripe fruit.

These numerous visitors, both by day and night, would knock down twice the number of figs they ate, which added to the profusion of fruit already lying scattered on the ground, blown down by the wind and often falling of their own weight. All this offered additional attraction to the bear, which now found a pleasing change to his menu. It was there in abundance, just waiting to be eaten.

So from the fields he would visit the fig trees, and thus his foraging brought him into the precincts of the shrine. That is how the trouble began.

Alam Bux had a son, a lad aged about twenty-two years, who, together with the guardian's aged wife and younger sister, lived at the shrine. One night the family had their meal at about nine, and were preparing to go to bed, when the boy for some reason went outside. It happened to be a dark night, and the bear also happened to be eating figs in the vicinity. Seeing the human figure suddenly appear, he felt that this was an unwarranted intrusion and immediately attacked the youth; more by accident than deliberately, the bear bit through the youth's throat and not the face, which was his usual first objective. The boy tried to scream, and had kicked and fought. The bear bit him again, this time through the nose and one eye, and clawed him severely across his chest, shoulders and back. Then it let him go and loped away into the darkness.

The boy staggered back to his parents streaming with blood. His jugular vein had been punctured, and although they had tried to staunch the bleeding with such rags as were available, they failed in their attempt to save his life, which ebbed away in the darkness, as cloth after cloth, and rag after rag, became soaked in his blood.

The false dawn witnessed the youth's passing while the old bear, replete with figs and groundnuts, climbed back to his cave among the boulders.

Alam Bux was a poor man and could not afford the money to send me a telegram, nor even his fare to Bangalore, either by train or by bus. But he sent me a postcard on which was scrawled the sad story; it was written in pencil, in shaky Urdu script. It was stained with the tears of his sorrow. The postcard arrived two days later, and I left for Asikere within three hours.

I had anticipated that the shooting of this bear would be an easy matter and that it would take an hour or two at the most. Therefore, I did not go prepared for a long trip. I carried just my torch, .405 Winchester rifle, and a single change of clothing. I reached Alam Bux shortly after five in the evening and it did not take him long to tell me his story.

There was no moonlight at this time. Nevertheless the plan to be followed seemed a simple one; namely, to wait till it grew quite dark and then set forth to search for the bear with the aid of my torch.

With this procedure in view, Alam Bux allowed me inside his abode by sunset, and closed the door to give the appearance that all was quiet. In the dingy little room we chatted in the flickering light of a small oil lamp, while he repeatedly lamented the death of his son. In fact, within a few minutes the whole family were weeping and wailing. I had, perforce, to listen to this continuously till eight, when I could stand it no longer and decided to go out in search of the bear.

Loading my rifle, and seeing that the torch was functioning properly, I stepped outside, Alam Bux closing and bolting his door behind me. The darkness was intense, and as I pressed the switch of the torch fixed near the muzzle of the rifle, its bright beams shone forth over the groundnut fields to my left, and the dense aisle of fig trees bordering the road to my right.

The bear was nowhere in sight and so I started to look for him, beginning with the fig trees. These trees grew on both sides of the road, so I judged the best thing to do would be to walk along the road itself, swinging my rifle from one side of the road to the other. I walked in this fashion away from Asikere for about a mile and a half, but saw no signs of the bear. I then walked back to the shrine and continued in the opposite direction for another mile and a half, but there were still no signs of the bear. So I came back to the shrine, and started to search the groundnut fields.

Bright glimmers of various pairs of eyes glared back at me, reflected by the torch beam. But they proved to be those of rabbits and three or four jackals. I circumvented the hillock and walked along the margin of the tank on the other side; where I came across a small sounder of wild pigs wallowing in the mud. But still no sign of the old bear was to be seen. I then walked closer to the foot of the knoll, and around it two or three times, shining my light upwards and in all directions. It was a tiring work, and the old bear did not put in his appearance. On the third occasion I almost stepped upon a very large Russell's viper that was coiled between two rocks in my direct path. Engaged as I was, looking for the reflecting gleam of the bear's eyes, I did not watch the ground before me. My foot was within a few inches of the viper when he inflated his body with a loud, rasping hiss, preparatory to striking. Instinctively I heeded his warning not to come any nearer and leapt backwards, at the same time shining the torch directly upon the snake, which lunged forth with jaws apart to bite the spot where, just a moment before, my legs had been. It was a narrow shave, and for the moment I felt like shooting the viper. But that would have caused a tremendous disturbance and might frighten away the bear, in addition to wasting a valuable cartridge. After all, the snake had been good enough to warn me, and so, in return, I threw a small stone at it, which caused it to slither away beneath the rocks.

By this time it was evident that the bear had either gone out earlier in the evening and wandered far away, or else he was not hungry and was still in his cave. I returned to Alam Bux's shack and decided to make another tour in a couple of hours.

This I did, and made two further tours after that, making four in all, but the bear was not to be seen, and the false dawn found me still vainly circling the hillock in search of the enemy.

With daylight, I told Alam Bux that I would return to Bangalore but he begged me to stay for the day and to climb the hill and search the cave for the bear. In the meantime his wife had prepared some hot 'chappaties' —round flat cakes made from wheat flour—and a dish of steaming tea, both of which I consumed with relish. Then I fell asleep. At about noon Alam Bux woke me, to say that his wife had prepared special 'pillao rice' in my honour. Thanking him for this, I tucked into it too, and in a very short time polished off the lot. Mrs. Alam Bux appeared highly gratified that I so relished her cooking. The sun was now at its meridian and shone mercilessly on the rocks which blazed and shimmered in the noon-day heat. It would be a good time to look for the bear, I knew, assuming he was at home, as he would be fast asleep.

Alam Bux came with me up the hill and from a distance of fifty yards pointed out the shelving rock beneath which the bear had its cave. I clambered upwards on tiptoe, the rubber soles of my shoes making no sound on the rocks. But against this advantage I was soon to feel a greater disadvantage, as the heat from the sun-baked stone penetrated the rubber and began to burn the soles of my feet.

Coming up to the entrance of the cave, I squatted on my haunches and listened attentively.

Now a sleeping bear invariably snores, often as loud as does a human being. If the bear was fast asleep, as I hoped he would be, I counted upon hearing that tell-tale sound. But no sound greeted my ear, and after sitting thus for almost ten minutes, the sun began making itself felt through the back of my shirt. Some pebbles lay at hand and, picking up a few, I began to throw them into the cave.

Now such a procedure is calculated to make any sleeping bear very angry. But I could still hear nothing. So I went closer to the entrance and threw the stones right inside. Still nothing happened. I threw more stones, but again with negative results. The bear was not in his cave.

Descending the hill, I told Alam Bux the news and announced my intention to return to Bangalore, asking him to send me a telegram if the bear put in a further appearance. I gave him some money, both for the cost of the telegram and to tide him over immediate expenses. Then I left for Bangalore. A month elapsed, and I heard nothing more.

About twenty miles across country, and in a northwesterly direction from where the shrine is situated, the forest of Chikmagalur, in the Kadur district of Mysore, begins. About halfway between Chikmagalur and Kadur stands the small town of Sakrepatna, surrounded by the jungle.

The next news that came to me was that a bear had seriously mauled two woodcutters near Sakrepatna, one of whom had later died. The district Forest Officer (D.F.O) of Chikmagalur wrote to me, asking if I would come and shoot this bear.

I concluded that it was the same bear that had been the cause of the death of Alam Bux's son, but to look for one particular bear in the wide range of forest was something like searching for the proverbial needle in a haystack, and so I wrote back to the D.F.O. to try and get more exact information as to the whereabouts of the animal.

After ten days he replied that the bear was said to be living in a cave on a hillock some three miles from the town, near the footpath leading to a large lake known as the 'Ionkere' also that it had since mauled the Forest Guard, who had been walking along this path on his regular beat.

So I motored to Chikmagalur, picked up the D.F.O., and proceeded to the town of Sakrepatna, where there is a small rest house owned by the Mysore Forest department. Here I set up my headquarters for the next few days.

As luck would have it—or bad luck, if you call it that— the very next afternoon a man came running to the bungalow, to tell us that a cattle grazier—his brother in fact—had been grazing his cattle in the vicinity of the very hill where the bear was supposed to be living, when he had been attacked by the animal. He had screamed for help. and his cries had been mingled with the growls of the bear. His brother, who was lower down the hill and nearer the footpath, hearing the sounds had waited no longer, but had fled back to the bungalow to bring us the news.

Now bears are essentially nocturnal animals never moving about during daylight. At most, they may be met with at dusk or early dawn, but certainly not in the afternoon. Probably the unfortunate grazier had strayed too close to some spot where the bear had been sleeping, causing it to attack him at that unusual time. That could be the only reason for this strange attack.

It was nearing 4.30 p.m. when he brought us this news, and I set forth with my rifle and torch and three or four helpers to try to rescue the grazier who had been attacked. We soon found that the distance to the spot was much greater than we had been told by the unfortunate man's brother. I figured I had walked nearly six miles into the jungle before we came to the foot of a hill that was densely covered with scrub, including clumps of bamboo. It was then nearly six and, being winter, it was getting dark. The men I had brought along refused to come farther, and said that they would return to Sakrepatna, advising me to accompany them and suggesting that we should go back next morning to continue our search. The brother of the missing man volunteered to wait where we stood, but was too fearful to come farther into the jungle. The most he could do to help me in finding his missing relative was vaguely to indicate, with a wave of his arm, the general area where the attack had occurred.

I went forward in that direction, calling loudly the name of the man who had been mauled. There was no answer to my shouts, and I advanced deeper and deeper into the scrub. By this time it was almost dark, but I did not feel perturbed, as I had brought my torch and began to flash it about as I sought a way through the undergrowth.

Soon it became so dense that I could make no further progress, and was on the point of turning back, when I thought I heard a faint moan, away in the distance. The ground at this point sloped downwards into a sort of valley that lay between two ridges of the hill, and the moan seemed to come from somewhere in the recesses of this valley.

The missing man's name was Thimma, and, cupping both hands to my mouth, I shouted this name lustily, waiting every now and then to listen for a reply. Yes! There, undoubtedly, it was again! A moaning cry, feeble, but nevertheless audible. It definitely came to me from the valley.

Forcing my way through the thickets, I struggled down the decline, slipping on rocks and loose stones, catching myself every now and then on the thorns. After a couple of hundred yards of such progress, I called again. After some time I heard a moaning answer, somewhere to my right. I proceeded in this fashion, following the cry till I eventually found Thimma, lying at the foot of a tree in a puddle of his own blood. His face was a mass of raw flesh and broken bones, and the only way of distinguishing that he was breathing was by the bubbles of air that forced themselves through the clotting blood. In addition, the bear had raked him across the stomach with its claws, tearing open the outer flesh, so that a loop of intestine protruded. He was hardly conscious when I found him, and I soon realised that what I had taken to be a moaning reply to my calls were just the groans he kept making, every now and then, in his delirium.

The situation was critical, and after examination I saw that another night's exposure would cause him to die by morning. There was therefore no alternative but to carry him back to the spot where I had left his brother. Lifting him on to my shoulder was a tricky business, in the terrible state that he was in. To make matters worse, he was a heavily built man, equal to myself in weight. But I managed to lift him and, using my rifle butt as a prop, began to struggle upwards the way I had come.

I never wish to experience again so terrible a journey. I had almost gained the ridge down which I had lately come when the accident occurred. My left foot slipped and came down heavily between two boulders. There was a sharp, shooting, wrenching pain as I collapsed on the rock with Thimma on top of me, while the rifle clattered to the ground.

I had sprained my ankle, and was now myself unable to walk. From where we lay, I began to shout to the brother; but after nearly an hour I realised he either could not or would not hear me. There was no alternative but to spend the night with the dying man.

Desiring to make the torch batteries last the night, if that were possible, I refrained from using them more than was necessary. The early hours of morning became bitterly cold and Thimma's groans became more and more feeble, till eventually they turned into a gurgle. I realised he was dying. At about 5 a.m. he died, and there I sat beside him till daylight eventually came, shortly after six.

I then made a determined effort to drag myself to my feet, but found my leg would not support my weight. I tried to crawl, but the thorns formed an impenetrable barrier. They tore my hands, my face and my clothing to shreds. I soon gave it up and became reconciled to the fact that I would have to wait till a rescue party came to search for us.

It was well past noon before the Forest department people, accompanied by Thimma's brother and a dozen villagers, came anywhere near the scene. Eventually, guided by my shouts, they located us, and that evening I was back at Sakrepatna forest bungalow, lying on the cot with an immensely swollen ankle. The D.F.O. turned up at about nine o'clock and drove me in my car to Chikmagalur, where I went to the local hospital for treatment. It was a week before I managed to hobble around. You may guess that by this time I was extremely angry with myself at the delay, and more so with the big, bad, black bear that had caused all the trouble. I was determined that I would get him at any cost, just as soon as I could walk.

In the meantime he had not been idle, but had mauled two more men who had been walking along the path to the lonkere Lake.

Four days later saw me back at Sakrepatna, just about able to walk, although not for long distances. Here I was told that the bear had taken to visiting some fields about a mile from the village, bordered by boram trees, the fruit of which was just then coming into season. At 5 p.m. I reached the trees in question and, selecting the largest, which had the most fruit, decided to spend the night at its foot, hoping that the bear showed up. I sat on the ground with my back to the trunk, my rifle across my knees.

Shortly after eleven I heard the grunting, grumbling sound of an approaching bear. He stopped frequently, no doubt to pick up some morsel, and as he came closer I heard the scratching sounds he made in digging for roots. He took nearly an hour to reach the boram tree, by which time I was amply prepared. Finally, he broke cover and ambled into the open, a black blob silhouetted in the faint glimmer of the stars.

I pressed the torch switch and the beams fell on him. He rose on his hind legs to regard me with surprise, and I planted my bullet in his chest between the arms of the white V-mark that showed clearly in the torchlight. And that was the end of that really bad bear.

Bears, as a rule, are excitable but generally harmless creatures. This particular bear carried the mark of Cain, in that he had become the wanton and deliberate murderer of several men, whom he had done to death in the most terrible fashion, without provocation.

Three

The Mamandur Man-Eater

This animal was a female, and young at that; so there was no apparent reason for her becoming a man-killer. But because she began her depredations shortly after the death of the man-eating tiger of the Chamala Valley—whose career I have told in the story entitled 'The Striped Terror of the Chamala Valley' [1] —and operated partly in the same locality, there were perhaps some grounds for the local gossip that set her down as the mate of that august killer. Another, and equally likely explanation, was that she was a grown-up cub, who had learned the evil practice of man-killing and man-eating from her evil sire.

Whatever her antecedents, this tigress made her first attempt at killing a human being when she attacked a herdsman, who attempted to succour a fine milch-cow, which she had chosen to attack from amongst his herd of cattle, and whose neck she had just skilfully broken. The herdsman very bravely but foolishly attempted to frighten the tigress away from the fallen cow by shouting and brandishing his staff in the air. Mostly such tactics have the desired effect of frightening the tiger away, but in this case the effect was just the reverse. Instead of bounding away, the tigress bounded towards the herdsman, covering the short twenty yards that separated them at incredible speed. The herdsman turned tail and bolted, but the tigress dealt him a raking blow with her front paw that opened the flesh from shoulder to buttocks. The weight of the blow bore him to the ground; but in this, her first attack on a human being, the tigress apparently considered she had inflicted enough damage, for she turned back to the cow she had just killed.

With returning consciousness, the herdsman could hear the crunch of bones a mere forty yards away as the tigress fed on the cow. Fortunately, this man kept his head and did not attempt to get to his feet. In all probability any such movement would have provoked a second, and this time fatal, attack.

So he lay as he had fallen, on his face, but by stealthily moving his head very slowly and slightly, he was able to see the tigress as she fed.

He told me afterwards that he would never forget the next hour for the rest of his life. Apparently, the tigress stopped eating every now and then, raised her head and glanced in his direction. Once she got to her feet and even took a few steps towards him. The poor fellow almost screamed with terror, and nearly made the mistake of moving. Perhaps his very terror saved his life by making him incapable of movement. Fortunately, the tigress then changed her mind and returned to the cow.

It was more than an hour, the herdsman told me, before the tigress eventually decided she had eaten enough. She then leisurely sat on her haunches, licked her forepaws thoroughly and began to clean her face. With a final backward glance at his recumbent figure, she at last got to her feet, stretched herself contentedly and walked off into the jungle.

The herdsman lay still for another ten minutes, to make perfectly sure she had really gone. Then he got to his feet and dashed homewards as fast as he could run.

There is at least one other, equally remarkable, end to this story: the deep scratches the tigress had inflicted healed completely in spite of the absence of any proper medical treatment, apart from some crushed herbs, mixed with cow-dung, which the native doctor rubbed into the wounds. Perhaps the shawl he had been wearing, draped across his shoulders, had prevented the poisonous matter under the claws from entering the bloodstream.

This incident had occurred scarcely four miles from Mamandur railway station, where a rocky escarpment fell sharply for about three hundred feet into a forest glen, through which ran a little stream.

The next incident was also one of mauling, but this time the victim was not so lucky. Again it was a cowherd who was involved, an elderly man who died of his wounds. The events were much the same as in the earlier case. The tigress had dashed into a herd of cattle that was grazing a mile to the west of the railway line that cut through the forest, and had once more selected a milch-cow for her victim. As the frightened cattle stampeded past the elderly herdsman, he ran in the direction from which they had come to learn the cause of their alarm.

Soon he came upon the tigress, astride the dead cow. This time no attempt was made to frighten her off; the herdsman just stopped in his track in surprise. But evidently the tigress resented his appearance on the scene, for she attacked and mauled him severely. Then she walked back to the dead cow and dragged it away into the undergrowth.

It was three hours before help came to the old man. The cattle had stampeded across the railway line. The old man's brother, coming in search of him, saw that the cattle had moved and that their owner was nowhere to be seen. Standing on the railway embankment, he called loudly to his brother, but got no response. Then sensing that something was wrong, he hurried back to Mamandur village for help.

The search party, following the tracks of the stampeding cattle, came upon the mauled man. He was unconscious and almost dead from loss of blood. They carried him to the village and then to the station, intending to put him in the guard's van of a goods train that was due in half-an-hour, bound for the town of Renigunta, nine miles away, where there was a hospital. But the old herdsman died before the goods train reached Mamandur.

Only at her third killing did this tigress develop man-eating tendencies. She again attacked a herdsman, on this occasion at about nine in the morning. How it happened was related by a second herdsman, who was standing beside the first at the time of the attack. The tigress dashed out amongst the herd as usual and leapt upon a young bull. Somehow, she failed in her initial attempt to bring the bull down. On the other hand, the bull, with the tigress on his back, dashed madly to where the two herdsmen were standing. One of them —the man who lived to tell the tale—bolted. The other just did nothing, but appeared to be rooted to the spot with surprise.

The fleeing man looked back only once, in time to see the tigress leap from the bolting bull on to the terror-stricken herdsman. He saw no more, for the very good reason that he turned away and ran as fast and as far from the spot as he could.

When the rescue party turned up some hours later, armed with sticks and matchlocks, the body of the victim was not to be seen. So the party went back for reinforcements. Another three hours elapsed before the rescuers, now numbering nearly a hundred men, arrived at the scene of the attack. They followed a clear trail and found the corpse, lying on its face in the sandy bed of a narrow nullah. A part of the chest and buttocks had been eaten.

Three further human kills followed during the next couple of months. Of these, one was a herdsman, one a traveller on the Renigunta road, and the third a Lumbani, who had gone out to gather wild honey. Thereafter, all cattle-grazing stopped, as did also the collection of wild honey. No more travellers dared to come by road on foot. They came by train instead.

Mr. Littlewood, the district Forest Officer at the time, wrote to me, suggesting I might spend a few days at the beautiful Forest Bungalow at Mamandur and try to bag this tigress. With fifteen days' privilege leave to my credit, I caught the night mail-train from Bangalore; but it was 3.30 p.m. next day before I alighted from a slow passenger train at the little wayside station of Mamandur.

The forest bungalow lies a bare seven furlongs away on the top of a small hillock. The path to the bungalow traverses the small village of Mamandur, where I stopped for some time to make it widely known that I had come especially to shoot the tigress. My object was to get the news to spread from mouth to mouth, so that I would not only pick up all available known details about the animal, but, more particularly, would be acquainted with the news of any fresh kills that took place, either animal or human. I also negotiated the purchase of three buffalow heifers, which I paid for in cash, placing them in the charge of the local shikari , a man by the name of Arokiaswamy, whom I had engaged on earlier visits to Mamandur.

The bungalow had a wide and well-sheltered verandah. From its hillock fire-lines, or 'forest-lines' as they are sometimes called, radiated in five directions. Those south and south-westwards ran close to the village and railway embankment respectively. The other three struck far into the forest, and the eye could travel along them for many miles. The fire-line to the north stretched away towards the escarpment where the very first herdsman had been mauled by the tigress. Those to the east and southeast travelled in almost straight lines into the labyrinth of the jungle, like the spokes of some giant wheel. The country in both these directions was flat.

In years gone by, when game was far more plentiful, I had spent many a pleasant early morning or late evening, standing on the verandah or on the plinth of the bungalow with a pair of powerful binoculars, looking along those forest-lines. It was very common to see sambar, spotted deer and peafowl cross from one side to another. I had seen bear on three occasions, early in the morning, and a tiger crossing the northern fire-line at five in the evening. Also, although quite two miles away, I had witnessed a pack of eleven wild dogs 'ringing' an old bear. I had dashed after them on that occasion— to save the bear from the cruel fate that awaited it—arriving just as the eleven demons closed on the harried, exhausted, but brave, old beast. Three of the dogs lay dead before they realised they had to deal with a new foe. A fourth tumbled to the crack of my rifle as the pack began to run away, and a fifth joined the other four by the time the remnants of the pack were out of sight in the jungle.

I was using my old .405 Winchester rifle in those days, and had emptied my magazine. Only then did I realise I had to face a maddened bear, who had been infuriated by the dogs and the pain of the bites he had already received.

He was then about sixty yards away, and he charged straight at me, screaming, 'Woof! Woof!' I ran as fast as I could along the forest-line, and as I did so I opened the under-lever action of the .405, rammed home a cartridge in the breach, and closed the lever, which automatically cocked the rifle. Whipping around I faced the bear, which was scarcely fifteen yards away. In true bear style, when five yards away, he rose on his hind legs to deliver the final 'coup de grace', which is popularly thought to be that most fearsome of caresses, 'a bear's hug', of which we have all heard so much.

Actually, the south Indian sloth bear does not 'hug' his adversary. He rises on his hind legs to tear at his victim's face with his formidable, three-inch long talons, or to bite him on the head with his powerful teeth. In rising to his hind legs, the bear exposed the broad white V-mark that all sloth bears carry on their chests. With the one cartridge I had in the rifle, I shot him in the base of the V. He fell forward and lay still, just two yards away!

Three of the wild dogs had been males, the other two were females. The forest department paid me a reward of ten rupees for each male and fifteen rupees for each bitch. As wild dogs are very destructive to deer, their shooting is encouraged. I was sorry to have had to kill old Bruin, but he brought it on himself.

All this had happened very, very long ago.

Another factor that made this bungalow very attractive was the sea breeze that blew in from the east shortly after two o' clock each afternoon. I think, as the crow flies, the Bay of Bengal is not less than seventy-five miles from this little bungalow; and I am no authority to argue about the distance at which a sea breeze ceases to be effective. I only know that, at almost two each afternoon it turns the verandah of that little bungalow into a delightfully cool spot on which to take a nap. If you don't believe me, visit Mamandur Forest Bungalow.

It was too late that evening to tie out more than one of the three buffaloes, which only arrived at 5.30 p.m. This buffalow I took for two miles along the northern fire-line, where I tied it at the foot of a large and leafy tamarind tree. It was past seven when I got back, so I kept the other two buffaloes in the garage and asked Arokiaswamy to sleep in the kitchen.

Early next morning we were astir. First we took the bait which we had tied two miles away the previous night, and which was still alive, right up to the foot of the escarpment where the very first attack had taken place. There we secured it to the roots of a tree in a beautiful glade of rank, green grass.

We came back to the bungalow and took the second heifer along the fire line stretching to the east, where I tied it at almost the very spot where my encounter with the wild dogs and the bear had taken place.

Returning for the second time to the bungalow, we took the third and last heifer across the railway line to the west, and tied it near the spot where the elderly herdsman had been killed.

It was past midday when I got back to the bungalow for the third time, and blazing hot too. Taking off my sweat-soaked shirt, I ate a belated cold lunch and awaited the advent of the sea breeze, which I knew would start at about two. Nor was I disappointed; for when it began, it turned that broiling-hot verandah to the likeness of the shores of some far-distant South Sea Island, where we read that 'the sea-breezes forever play'.

The next two days were uninteresting. I visited all three baits each day, but none of them had been touched. The evening of the fifth day brought a tragedy.

The semaphores along the railway lines of southern India are lit at night by kerosene oil lamps, except in the shunting yards of the larger railway junctions. As you are no doubt aware, every ordinary railway station has two sets of signals on each side of it; the near or 'home' signal, and a more distant, or 'outer' signal, as it is called. Normally, the kerosene oil lamps at these signals are cleaned, trimmed, refilled and lit by a pointsman or an other railway employee appointed for the purpose who does his job at about six each evening. But owing to the presence of the tigress at Mamandur, and the fact that the outer signals, both in the direction of Renigunta to the south and Setigunta to the northwest, were surrounded by forest, it had become the custom to light these lamps well before five, while the sun was still up.

That evening two pointsmen had set out on this task at 4 p.m., one walking towards Renigunta, and the other in the opposite direction. The second man never came back.

Shortly before six a body of seven men came rushing to the forest bungalow, sent by the stationmaster, to tell me what had happened. Hastily grabbing my rifle, torch and a few other necessities for a nightlong vigil, I sent the seven men back to the station, and Arokiaswamy along with them, as he absolutely refused to stay in the bungalow alone that night. Then I hurried up the forest-line that led to the west, which I knew met the railway track almost midway between the 'inner' and 'outer' signals.

When I reached the railway line, which here ran along an embankment ten feet high, I looked to my left and saw the 'inner' signal, with its red light twinkling.

'Stupid man', I thought. 'Instead of attending to the outer light first, while it was still early, and coming back to the inner on his way to the station, he wasted time on the inner light, and then went to the outer, when it was considerably later.'

Turning to the right, I walked along the embankment towards the 'outer' semaphore, which came into view when I turned a corner. As I walked, I looked along and about the tracks for signs of the attack that must have taken place while the pointsman was approaching the outer signal. I found nothing. Then I came to the foot of the 'outer', and looked up. The light was burning!

So the man had been attacked on his way back after he had attended to the 'outer' signal, and not before. Added to this was the fact that the light of the 'inner' signal was also burning. Perhaps he had not attended to that light first, as I had originally thought. Perhaps he had lit the outer, then the inner, and had been attacked somewhere between the inner signal and the station yard.

But was that likely in view of the fact that all the area from the station up to the 'inner' signal, and even a little beyond it, was open cultivated land? Would any tiger, even if it was a man-eater, walk about thus boldly on absolutely open land in broad, daylight? It was possible, but rather unlikely.

My watch showed 6.55 p.m., and it was rapidly growing dark as I began to retrace my steps towards the inner signal, keeping now a sharper lookout than ever. An early moon had risen, which was indeed fortunate, or it would have become quite dark by this time.

Almost at the spot where I had first come on to the embankment from the forest-line was a small culvert, crossing a narrow but deep nullah. Something white there caught my eye, fluttering between the sleepers of the railway track as it spanned this nullah. I stopped, and peered between the sleepers.

It was the white dhoti worn by the railwayman. Wedged under a boulder, twenty feet away and clear of the embankment, lay an elongated, dark shape, which I knew to be the body of the victim. Even in that uncertain light I could tell that the body had been partly devoured in the short time that had elapsed since the kill had taken place. The neck had been bitten through, and the head lay about a yard away. Because the tigress might perhaps be in the vicinity at that moment, or even watching me from the cover of the bushes, it would be unnecessarily dangerous to descend the embankment and make a closer examination of the body.

A hasty survey of the position made me decide to lie at right angles across the railway lines and exactly in the middle of the culvert. I would thus be safe from attack from the front or rear, as to do this the tigress would have to leap a clear fifteen from the bottom of the nullah on to the track. This left her the choice of attacking me along the track, either to my right or left. I should have told you that the span of the culvert was about twenty feet. Not much, but it would at least give me time to see the tigress.

Of course, there was the possibility that she would creep up at an angle to the embankment and attack me obliquely, either from the front, or worse still, from behind; and either to the left or right of me.

It was a chance that had to be taken.

I had already clamped my torch to the rifle walking from the bungalow. I placed my haversack beneath my chest, to soften contact with the rail. This section of track was broad gauge, which means that the lines were five feet six inches apart. By spreading my legs widely, I found my soles just touched the other rail and did not overlap it. The teak—weed 'sleeper', on which I lay, was perhaps eight inches wide: not over-comfortable to lie on and awfully hard!

The moon was shining brightly by this time and lit the scene clearly. The corpse and its severed head were clearly visible against the lighter colour of the rock and the finely-grained white sand of the nullah in which it lay. Everything was deathly silent.

The red light glimmered from the friendly inner signal; it seemed to remind me that help was close—but yet so distant.

The hours ticked by; a sambar stag belled from the jungle to the west. Perhaps that call heralded that the tigress was on the move! No, for it was answered by another stag, further away to the northeast, and then by another to the east. Periodically, the spotted deer also gave vent to their sharp cries of alarm, 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!'

But the cries did not come from any one direction; if they had done so, that would have indicated definitely that some carnivore was afoot in that area. They came from all sides, far and near, indicating that several carnivores were on the move. Also, being a brilliant moonlight night, it was possible that packs of wild dogs were on the hunt. These animals chase their prey by day and never on a dark night, but on brilliant moonlit nights, in certain jungles, they occasionally reverse their habit and hunt by moonlight.

At midnight silence reigned again. And then the hair at the back of my neck began to rise, for what I was witnessing was eerie indeed. The severed head had rolled on to its side!

All this time it had been staring heavenwards; now its lifeless eyes and face were turned to me. Yet no animal had touched it, for it lay in the open, clearly visible in the bright moonlight.

I felt myself tremble and grow cold. I licked my dry lips and stared at that terrible head.

Again it moved! It had tried to roll back to its former position; it had turned halfway and then, as if it lacked the strength to complete the move, it had rolled back again and was staring me in the face.

Now I may tell you I am a very practical person, not superstitious, nor afraid of the dark. I had spent many a night in a similar or even more dangerous position; I had sat over half-eaten human bodies before, and on earlier occasions I had imagined that I had seen them move. But never before in my life had I seen a severed human head actually turn around of its own accord, then try to turn back again and fail; finally, to roll back in obvious despair.

I almost cried out and for quite a while was seized with a powerful urge to get up and run towards the twinkling, friendly red light of the 'inner' signal. Then common sense reasserted itself. A dead head, human or otherwise, cannot move of its own accord. Something must have moved it!

I stared at the head intently, and the bright moonlight showed me the answer to my problem. Two black objects could be seen moving in the white sand. They were 'rhinoceros beetles': large insects, more than an inch-and-a-half long, with great spikes on their noses resembling the horn of a rhinoceros, from which resemblance they had got their name. Generally they are nocturnal, although one frequently sees them on forest roads, early in the morning, and again late at evening, busily rolling a ball of cow-dung, perhaps thrice their own size, to some unknown destination.

These two little creatures by their combined strength had succeeded in rolling this head over once, but the second time they had not quite succeeded. I had been so absorbed by what I saw that I had forgotten all about the tigress; she could easily have surprised me at that time.

It was now 1.40 and the rail beneath my chest began to tremble. Then I heard a distant rumbling sound which gradually grew louder and nearer. A sharp whistle rent the air and soon the brilliant headlight of an engine fell full upon me. It was the Night Mail from Madras to Bomaby.

Stiffly I got to my feet, lifted my haversack, walked to the end of the culvert, and then a couple of foot down the embankment. But I had entirely forgotten to take into account the vigilance of the driver of the train. He had clearly seen me in the bright headlight of the engine, although he had not noticed my rifle. As he was to tell me in a few minutes, he took me for a would-be suicide, deliberately lying on the track in order to be run over, whose courage had failed him at the last moment. I may mention, incidentally, that this method of committing suicide is rather popular in India.

Anyhow, with a grinding of brakes and violent hissing of steam, the train drew up just after the engine had passed me. The next thing I heard was the loud thudding of boots on the hard ground as figures ran towards me. It was the driver and his two firemen from the engine.

They charged up and grabbed me. Only then did they realise that I was obviously not what they had taken me to be. In the meantime, heads popped out of carriage windows, and a hundred voices began to question and conjecture. The guard came up from the rear with his bulls-eye lantern. So I had no alternative but to tell them what I was doing.

'Where is the man who has been eaten by the tiger?' asked the driver, a middle-aged Anglo-Indian. I pointed the corpse out to him. 'And you have been lying here in the open by yourself since evening?' he asked, incredulously.

When I replied in the affirmative, he added, very simply, 'You are quite mad,' and tapped his forehead significantly. His two firemen, and the Indian guard of the train, nodded heartily in agreement.

A few minutes later, the Mail puffed onwards, on its long journey to Bombay, and I was left alone once more. But I had little hope of the tigress putting in her appearance after so great a disturbance.

At 2.30 a.m. the rails began to rumble again. This time I lay flat on the embankment, hiding my rifle, before the engine's headlight betrayed my presence. As a result, the goods train passed me by without stopping. At 4 a.m. again the rails rumbled and trembled, and I hid once more. It was the return Mail, from Bombay to Madras, that thundered by at full speed, as mail trains do not halt at Mamandur.

The false dawn came and went. The distant call of awakening peafowl fell on the air, as they cried, 'Mia-a-oo-Aaow' across the forest valleys to be answered by the cheery 'Whe-e-e-e-Kuch-Kaya Kaya-Khuck'm' of that most lovely bird, the grey junglecock.

A pale shell-pink tinted the sky above the eastern hills that stood sharply outlined now in velvety black. Meanwhile, the moon, which had held sway all night and was now about to set, began losing some of her brilliance.

In the east the shell-pink turned marvellously to mauve, then to a deep rose, tinged at its edges by the palest of greens and the purest of blues. The rose became orange-purple then orange alone, then deep red, and finally flame, as the glowing tip of the sun peeped above the wave-like lines of hilltops to the east.

Radiating beams of sunlight, cast heavenwards by that rapidly growing orb, touched the racing, fleecy clouds in the sky with all the colours of the spectrum. Then, suddenly, just as a butterfly bursts forth from its chrysalis, the sun surmounted the hills, driving before her, in eddying swirls, the wisps of mist from the damp jungle below.

It was another day, and to welcome its birth a glad chorus of song burst from the birds of the forest all around me. Every bush and tree throbbed with life, fresh, clean and new. Those who have seen the marvel of an Indian jungle sunrise will never forget it.

The head still stared up at me, but it was still now; the two rhinoceros beetles that had worked so diligently throughout the night had long since abandoned the unequal task and gone to rest.

I made my way to the station, disappointed and slowly, to tell the stationmaster he could allow the relations of the dead men to remove the remains for cremation, and by eight I was asleep on the verandah of the bungalow. In the afternoon the sea-breeze lulled me to a deeper slumber.

At 4 p.m. I awoke, feeling refreshed and fit, and ate a quick lunch-cum-tea, while listening to Arokiaswamy's report that he, with four others, had visited all the baits and had found them alive. It certainly looked as if this tigress was not going to kill any of the heifers I had tied out.

Then came sunset and bright moonlight. I felt like taking a walk. If I kept to the centre of any one of those five radiating forest fire-lines, I felt I would be safe enough, provided I maintained a sharp watch while I walked. There was also the definite chance of attracting the tigress, should our trails cross during the night.

I dressed for the occasion. In my own kit I had only khaki clothes and a black shirt which was useful for night machan work. So I went with Arokiaswamy to his hut, where I slipped on a long white shirt, allowing the shirttails to flutter loosely outside my khaki pants. Arokiaswamy further completed the disguise by tying a white turban round my head.

I did not know what the tigress would take me for if we met; but I know I was a source of considerable amusement to the villagers, who were somewhat shocked to hear of my plan.

I debated for a moment which fire-line to walk up first and decided to follow the one leading in the easterly direction. It was 7.30 p.m. when I started to walk. I kept in the centre of the line, and as I moved I allowed my eyes to rove freely around and about the bushes and undergrowth on both sides. Occasionally I glanced backwards.

Although the moonlight was brilliant, the bushes cast long black shadows, and clumps of thorns and grass looked ghostly grey around me. I realised that, for all the moonlight, my eyes could never pick out a lurking carnivore in that unreal sheen, even if it showed itself, which it would not. I should have to rely on my sense of hearing—and that other, my sixth sense!

At ten-minute intervals I whistled a bar of some tune or other to advertise my presence to the tigress; but only for half-a-minute at a time, so as not to impede my own ears, that were attuned to catch the slightest sound.

Thus, many a subtle rustle did I hear in the grassy hillocks as I passed them. Invariably, the nocturnal bamboo-rat was the culprit, as he scampered for cover at my approach. Then an indefinable, prolonged, slithering rustle: that was a snake, probably a Russell's viper, coiling comfortably around and around himself in the grass, to be cosy and warm. Something heavy descended from the sky, neatly on the back of a hare as it scampered across the fire-line. The hare squealed, and the great horned owl, which had attacked it, pecked it sharply on the forehead. I approached the owl, which extended both its wings to the ground to hide the hare from me, much in the same way as does a hen with chickens. I approached closer and the owl glowered; I drew closer still and the owl flew away. I picked up the limp hare and rubbed its back briskly. With regaining consciousness, it began to kick vigorously. I let it go into the long grass.

There were no bison in these jungles, nor elephants, but in their stead bear were plentiful. Nor was it long before I came upon Bruin, engaged in his favourite pastime of sucking white ants out of their hills. A distant sound, midway between a buzzing and a humming, a queer noise rather like someone inflating a bagpipe, or the sound of angry swarming bees, first told me that a bear was afoot. It grew louder and louder and was punctuated by grunts, coughs, whimpers of impatience and growls of annoyance.

There, to one side of the line and to my right was a white-ant hill. There standing up against it, with its head inside a hole, was a shaggy, black shape. It was the bear, blowing, sucking, grumbling, swearing and complaining, as he met with little or no success. Rarely there would be a chuckle of sheer joy as something succulent went down.

He was deeply engrossed in his task as I padded silently on my way, and the sounds of his feast receded behind me, growing fainter and fainter. I walked for two hours along that line, then turned and retraced my steps. Bruin had gone home by the time I came to the ant hill again, and it was then only half its original height, due to his efforts. I saw nothing else till I reached the Forest Lodge.

Next, I turned up the northern fire-line and walked towards the escarpment. This line did not run straight like the one I had just abandoned. Rather, it twisted and turned considerably as I approached the escarpment. A stream intersected it at the third mile, in which a trickle of clear, cold water sparkled like silver in the moonlight.

Stooping down, I drank, conveying the water to my mouth in my left palm; my right hand held the rifle with its butt to the ground, while my eyes watched the jungle and my ears strained to catch the slightest sound. There was nothing visible, and the only sound was the gurgle of the water. I went on.

The bait I had tied was around the next corner. It was alive, and as I passed it looked at me with dumb reproach for the cruel fate to which I had exposed it. I had no answer, no excuse! That I was guilty there was no doubt. I turned my eyes away, but could not rid myself of the sense of guilt.

At last the base of the escarpment was reached. Here the fire-line stopped and became a narrow game-trail that plunged abruptly into the labyrinth of greenery. It was too dangerous to go any further under such conditions and I turned back.

All I passed on the return journey was a large cobra in the process of swallowing a bamboo-rat. Three-quarters of the rat were down the cobra's throat, only the hindquarters and tail protruding, when I came upon the scene in the middle of the fire-line. The snake saw me and raised its head two feet above the ground, simultaneously erecting the fine bones of its neck to form that most beautiful and at the same time most enthralling of sights to a newcomer to India; the well-known cobra's hood. The hind legs and tail of the rat still dangled incongruously from its mouth. The beady black eyes glittered malevolently in the phosphorescent light.

I rapidly stamped my feet and clapped my hands. The cobra became nervous and finally panicked. It vomited the rat, lowered itself to the ground with deflated hood, and slithered away into the bushes to one side of the fire-line.

Once more I was back at the bungalow. I had covered twenty miles, and it was 2.45 a.m.

Two fire-lines remained to be tried, but there would only be time to negotiate one, either the fire-line running to the south-east, up which I had not yet been since my arrival, or the line to the south-west, crossing the railway embankment, where I had sat the previous night over the dead body. For some unaccountable reason, I chose the latter.

I reached the railway track, crossed it, and had walked over a mile further towards the west, when suddenly the silence was shattered by the moaning call of a tigress. It appeared to come from a point no more than a couple of furlongs in front of me. Perhaps the beast was walking along the same fire-line; she may have been going away or perhaps coming towards me.

Doubling forward for the next 50 yards, I hid behind the trunk of a large wood-apple tree, cocked the rifle and raised it into position. Then I gave the deep-lunged moan of a male tiger.

Almost immediately it was answered, from much closer than I thought—perhaps a hundred yards away. I did not dare to call again, for fear that I should be recognised for the imposter I was.

Tiger-calling should not be indulged in at close quarters, for fear that the real tiger should discover a difference in the timbre of the call. Should he become suspicious, he may just fade away. One hundred yards is about the closest range at which such mimicry can be tried. Of course, man-eating propensities, and also curiosity, from which most animals suffer to some degree, might still cause the tiger to come forward, but there is always the risk that suspicion may drive him off. So I remained silent—and still.

Thirty seconds later, a tigress strode down the forest-line towards me, the moonlight playing upon the black stripes of her coat. She came abreast of me, then began to pass.

I shot her behind the ear. Only her tail twitched as she sank to the ground. She never knew what happened; she had no chance. It was an unsporting shot.

Anyhow, at Mamandur no human has been killed now for some years. The tigress, which was young, was in the best of condition and there was no reason why she should have become a man-eater. Perhaps, after all, the Chamala man-eater had taught her the bad habit.

Four

The Crossed-Tusker of Gerhetti

This is the story of another elephant that earned the name of a 'rogue', and was proscribed by the government of Madras by notification through the Collector and the district Forest Officer of Salem.

The events I am going to relate took place quite a time ago. As usual with rogue elephants, no one knew just what caused this elephant to start molesting human beings. The forest guard then stationed at Gerhetti stated that, one night about a month before the rogue began his depredations, he had heard two bull elephants fighting in the forest. According to his story, the contest had raged off and on for over three hours, and had taken place in the vicinity of a water hole situated just about half a mile in front of the forest bungalow.

Next day he had found the jungle trampled down and great splashes of blood were everywhere in evidence of the punishment that had been inflicted. Judging by the account he gave me, and from the pandemonium that had raged, it must have been a mammoth struggle. Possibly the rogue, as we came to know him, had been the elephant that had got the worst of that fight and from this moment had begun to vent his spleen on all and sundry.

Another explanation might have been that the rogue, was just an ordinary bull elephant in a state of 'musth' a periodical affliction that affects all elephants and lasts for about three months, during which time they become extraordinarily dangerous.

A third possibility was that this elephant had been wounded by one of the many poachers that are to be found in the forests of Salem district. These gentry sit up over water holes and salt licks to shoot deer that visit such spots during the hot and dry summer months. Generally, when a poacher sees anything more formidable than a harmless deer, he keeps very quiet or slinks away if he feels the going is good. Yet even amongst poachers we find a few that are 'trigger-happy'. They discharge their muskets at any animal that puts in an appearance, and it may have been that one of these adventurers had wounded the bull and started him on his career as a rogue.

It may even have been that a simple peasant, guarding his crops by night, had shot at him with his match-lock. Elephants are fond of destroying crops that grow close to the forest.

Whatever it was that had originally upset him, the rogue of Gerhetti started his career quite suddenly, and for the short time he held sway in the fastness of the jungle where he lived, he became a terror, bringing all traffic, both bullock-cart and pedestrian, to an end within an area of about four hundred square miles.

Gerhetti is the name given to a tiny hamlet comprising some five or six huts about two miles off the track leading from Anchetty to Pennagram in the Salem North Forest Division. The country here is very hilly, and thick bamboo jungle grows to a distance of about three miles from both banks of a rocky stream known as Talvadi Brook, which joins the Cauvery about fifteen miles southwest of the spot I am telling you about. This bamboo jungle nearly always harbours herds of elephant and quite often three or four independent elephants, which although not rogues, are very carefully avoided by the jungle folk.

Another stream, called Gollamothi, flows almost parallel with the Talvadi rivulet, about twelve miles north of it, and joins the Gundalam river, itself another tributary of the Cauvery. These three rivers, with the hills that surround them on all sides, and the thick bamboo jungle that abounds, makes an ideal habitation for any elephant, and it was here that the rogue started his career as a killer.

It began like this. With the midsummer heat, the Gollamothi stream had dried up, except for one or two isolated pools of water which had managed to survive, being formed between huge rocks that cropped up on the riverbed, and fed by subsoil percolation. One of these pools was known to hold fish of some size, perhaps six to eight inches in length, and one afternoon two men from the village of Anchetty, five miles away, decided they would go to this pool and net some fish in the restricted area that had resulted from rapid evaporation.

So they arrived at the pool and cast their nets. Soon they had made a considerable catch. They then put the fish into their baskets and lay down under a shady tree by the side of the water hole to enjoy a brief siesta.

It was about five when one of them awakened. The sun had just sunk behind the top of a hill that jutted out to the west of the pool, but it was still quite bright. As he sat up beside his sleeping companion, something caused the man to look behind him, where he saw the slate-grey bulk of an elephant descending the southern bank of the Gollamothi on its way to the pool.

The man reached out and vigorously shook his companion, to whom he whispered in Tamil 'Anai Varadbu', which means 'an elephant approaches'. Then he got up and ran to the northern bank and into the forest. His companion, suddenly aroused from sleep, did not quite grasp the significance of the warning, and as he sat looking around and wondering what had happened to his friend, the elephant was upon him.

The man who escaped told me he heard the screams of the friend he had left behind, mingled with the shrill trumpeting of the enraged elephant. Then there was silence. Naturally, he had not waited to hear more. Two days later, when the search party from Anchetty came to look for the remains, they found a pulpy mass of broken flesh and bones decaying in the hot sun. There was evidence that the elephant had first placed his foot upon the man and then had literally torn him apart with his trunk. He had carried one leg to a spot ten yards away, where he had beaten it against the gnarled trunk of a jumblum tree before finally throwing it away among the rocks.

That was the rogue's first victim. His second attempt was upon a herd-boy who was driving his herd at sunset to the cattle patti at Gundalam. This boy, being young and agile, had fled along the sands of the dry stream, hotly pursued by the vicious elephant. Finding he was losing ground, the boy had the sense to run up the steep side of the hill where the rocks were very slippery and small loose boulders abounded. This had enabled him to maintain his lead.

In his mad rush to escape, the boy cut his bare feet literally to ribbons on the protruding sharp stones, while his body was lacerated in a hundred places by the thorns and shrubs that sought to hold him back. But he had kept on running, and managed to escape the elephant by climbing on to a high rock that protruded about two hundred yards up the hillside.

He told me afterwards that when the bull reached the rock, he walked around it several times, trumpeting and attempting to reach his victim with his trunk. But the boy kept his head, and moved around with the elephant, keeping as far as possible from the tip of that dreaded trunk. He told me that the top of the rock was only about twenty-five square feet in area and that the snake-like tip of the killer's trunk had sometimes been within a foot of his ankles. Nevertheless he had managed to avoid it, and after an hour of this game the elephant suddenly lost interest in his victim and wandered away. Still the boy had been too frightened to come down and had spent the night on top of the rock, only getting down the next morning after the sun had risen high in the heavens, when he felt that the elephant was nowhere in the vicinity.

After this there had been a lull for a month, when the few folk who lived in the area began to feel that the elephant had perhaps departed to other regions, or alternatively, if it had been in musth, that musth season had elapsed and that its condition had returned to normal.

But they had been far too optimistic, for exactly five weeks after unsuccessfully chasing the herd-boy this elephant attacked two wayfarers as they were journeying through the forest to the village of Nattrapalyam, which lies about eight miles south of Anchetty. These men had been suddenly chased by the rogue and had begun to run along the forest path with the animal in hot pursuit about hundred yards behind them. One of these men was about thirty years old and the other some ten years older. Age soon began to tell on the older man causing him to lag behind, his breath coming, in sobbing gasps. He knew that a terrible death was behind him, and he tried his best to keep running. Unfortunately, he had quite lost his head, and made no attempt to circumvent the animal, as he might have done, by perhaps climbing a tree, or by getting behind a rock or even by throwing down a part of his clothing as he ran. This last action might have served to delay the attacker for a few minutes. For when chased by an elephant, it is advisable as a last recourse to shed some part of one's clothing; when the elephant reaches it and catches the strong human smell, he will invariably stop to tear it to ribbons. In the precious seconds thus gained, the victim has a chance of making good his escape.

But this unfortunate man simply ran on till he could run no more. The elephant overtook him as he lay sprawled on the path, his body heaving to the gasps of his tortured lungs. Soon their services on this earth were ended, for the elephant picked him up in his trunks and dashed repeatedly against a wayside boulder, beating him to pulp before finally tossing him aside into the jungle.

As a result of these incidents, petitions had been forwarded, through Forest authorities, to the Collector of Salem district to proscribe this animal 'rogue', which means that permission was granted for the elephant to be shot by any game-licence holder in the district. Normally, the elephant is strictly protected in India. Red tapism, as anywhere in the world, is a slow process, and this is particularly the case in India, so that three months or more elapsed before action was taken to issue the necessary order. A further month's delay occurred before all game-licence holders in the district were notified.

Meanwhile the 'rogue' was rather busy. He attacked a bullock-cart that was laden with sandalwood cut by the Forest department. The driver of this cart, and the forest guard who was accompanying the sandalwood, escaped by running into the forest, but the cart was smashed to pieces and one of the bulls slightly injured.

Not long afterwards, the rogue did rather an-unusual thing. Cattle, let loose by graziers in the forest, generally scatter over a fairly wide area. One of these animals evidently strayed too near the rogue, which attacked and broke the beast's back.

A further short lull was followed by the news that he had killed a 'poojaree', one of a jungle tribe of this area, as he was returning with honey from the forest for the contractor who had bought the right from the Forest department to collect all the wild honey in this particular division.

Then the official notification reached me. As a rule, I take no pleasure in elephant-shooting, as I have a very soft corner for these big and noble animals. Secondly, I feel it is a comparatively tame animal itself; elephants invariably give away their position by the noise they make in the undergrowth when feeding. It is then a comparatively simple matter to get up-wind of the quarry and stalk to within a short distance of it. All that is required is a little experience in knowing where to place one's feet, to avoid stepping on dried leaves or twigs that crackle and so give away the stalker's position.

Another very important aspect of 'still hunting' is the ability to 'freeze', to become absolutely still in whatever position you may be at that moment, if the quarry looks your way. This may prove a little awkward at times, when in a half-crouched position, but to straighten up or squat down would be fatal, as the slightest movement involved in doing so will give the stalker away. The thing to do is to remain absolutely and completely 'dead', even for as much as ten minutes in the same half-crouching position. I can assure you that this can sometimes be extremely tiring.

By these methods I have often stalked elephants to within a few yards and watched them grazing peacefully, without their being in the least degree aware of my presence. But the slightest whirr or my scent, or the slightest crackle underfoot, would have sent them thundering away. An elephant has surprisingly poor sight, and if you are dressed in military khaki-green and you keep absolutely still, it will often look your way without ever becoming aware of your presence.

For these reasons, as I have said, I do not like shooting elephants. Also, many of the so-called rogues are not rogues at all. As I have mentioned before, poachers and cultivators are in the habit of firing at elephants and often wound them in the process, when they become embittered against the human race. Again, many of the incidents reported against the so-called rogues never occurred, for people interested in shooting an elephant sometimes concoct tales and urge the villagers to write exaggerated reports in order to induce the Collector to proscribe the rogue. Collectors as a rule go into such matters very carefully and thoroughly before issuing orders; but sometimes, with all these precautions, elephants are killed which are not rogues at all in the real sense.

So I did not pay much heed to the notification till it was followed, about three weeks later, by a letter from Ranga, my shikari who lived at the town of Pennagram. He wrote to report that the elephant had killed a poojaree woman four days previously at a spot called Anaibiddamaduvu, which lay about seven miles from Gerhetti.

The literal interpretation of this name is 'the pool into which the elephant fell'. It is a natural pool, formed by steep rocks on the bed of Anaibiddahalla river, a sub-tributary of the Chinnar river, which itself is a tributary of the Cauvery, that largest of south Indian rivers. Moreover, this pool is deep and never dries up, and I am told that many years ago an elephant, while reaching for water with its trunk, fell in and could not get out again because of the steep and slippery rocks that ringed it. Elephants are good swimmers, and have herculean strength and endurance, but they also have great bulk; so this poor creature, after swimming round and round in the pool for three days continuously, slowly sank and drowned before quite a large crowd of people who had come all the eleven miles from Pennagram to witness the 'tamasha'.

After receiving Ranga's letter, and as some time had passed since I had last seen him, I got leave of absence for four days and motored down to Pennagram. I picked him up and covered the eighteen miles or more of terribly bad forest road that leads to the Gerhetti forest bungalow, passing Annaibidhamadhuvu on the way.

The forest guard at Gerhetti told me that the rogue was in the vicinity, as well as a herd of about ten elephants. All these animals were in the habit of drinking at the water hole in front of the bungalow, and as there were several animals in the herd of about the same size as the rogue, it would be difficult to know which was which. This precluded any possibility of following with any degree of certainty any particular set of tracks.

Further, the description of this animal in the notification was very vague; it merely stated that the measurement around the circumference of the forefoot had been 4'10", which made the elephant approximately 9'.8" tall, as twice the circumference of the forefoot is the approximate height. The colour was reported as black, but all elephants are black after they have washed, but they soon cover themselves with sand or earth. Sand in the forest is of different hues, varying from red to brown, grey, and almost black. So this was no distinguishing factor either. The only feature that appeared to identify the elephant was that the two tusks, which were reported to be over three feet long, met and crossed near their tips.

You will therefore understand that the last factor was the only one by which I would be able to identify this particular animal, for it was doubtful if he would give permission, to approach and measure his height! But to see if the tusks were crossed meant getting a frontal or head-on view of the elephant, as at an angle tusks may appear to cross without actually doing so. I certainly did not want to shoot the wrong animal, apart from the immense amount of trouble and official explanation that would follow.

This meant that I could select any set of tracks that came up to the measurement of the rogue and follow them till I came upon the animal that had made them, then manoeuvre for a frontal view of the animal to see whether he possessed the hallmark of crossed-tusks. If he did, he was my elephant. If he did not, I would have to start all over again by going back to the pool and following another set of tracks. It must be remembered that I had only four days at my disposal, and of these four days one had already passed in picking up Ranga, coming to Gerhetti and making the necessary inquiries.

At about ten that night I heard the sound of elephants feeding in the vicinity of the pool. This was undoubtedly the herd, and the rogue would not be with them. So I went to sleep again.

At dawn I started with Ranga and the forest guard on my plan of following up one of the sets of tracks. The margin of the water hole was fairly ploughed up by a mass of footprints of all sizes, where the herd had watered the night before. These included the tracks of some very young elephants, which could hardly have been over three feet tall.

Circumventing the pool, I found three sets of tracks which came near to the size of the rogue. Two of these three sets, I noticed, had been made on the same side of the pool as the herd had watered, while the remaining set had been made by an elephant which had approached the water from quite another direction. I therefore argued that this third animal might be the rogue, and we began to track him in single file. Ranga went in front, following the tracks; I followed, covering him with my double-barrelled 450/400 Jeffries; the Forest Guard came behind me, his duty being to guard against an attack from the rear in case it happened that the elephant had gone round in a semicircle, and was now grazing behind us.

For a short distance after leaving the water the ground was covered by long spear grass and clearly revealed the passage of the elephant the night before, being trampled flat in all directions. Then the spear grass gave way to the usual thorny growth of lantana and wait-a-bit thorn. Here also it was comparatively easy to see where our quarry had passed, but our own passage became more difficult by reason of the thorns that plucked and tore at our clothing.

Yet the tracks were clear and we made fairly good time for about a mile, when we reached the base of a small hill. The slopes of this hill were covered with heavy bamboo growth, and the elephant had passed through this, climbing the hill as he went. He had also stopped to feed on the tender shoots that spring from the end of the fronds of bamboo, as was clearly evident by the havoc he had created in the mass of broken bamboo stems we met along this trail. Here he had passed a considerable quantity of dung, and as we reached the top of the hill and went down the other side, it was evident that the elephant had fed until the early hours of that morning; for the dung was fresh and had not had time to cool.

From here onwards our passage became laboriously slow. The dense bamboo completely surrounded us and a careless step by any one of us resulted in a rustle or sharp crackle, depending on whether we trod upon the leaves or bamboo fronds.

I touched Ranga's elbow and motioned to him to stand still, the guard and myself doing the same. We listened for over ten minutes for the familiar sounds of a feeding elephant, or the deep rumble that issues from his cavernous stomach in the process of digestion. But the forest was comparatively silent except for the cheery calls of grey junglecocks everywhere around us, and the distant whoops of langur monkeys on the opposite hillside.

Evidently our quarry was resting, or had perhaps passed further down into the deep valley that lay before us. As the latter seemed more likely, we proceeded on tiptoe, slowly and carefully in his wake. We had all to keep our eyes down to make sure we did not trample on anything that would betray our presence. Another half mile brought us to the valley, where the undergrowth was extremely dense; wild plum, wood-apple, and mighty tamarind trees grew profusely everywhere, making visibility beyond fifteen to twenty yards impossible. Another two hundred yards brought us to the rocky bed of a small tributary of the Gollamothi river.

The elephant had here skirted the bed of the stream and crossed it at a sandy spot fifty yards further down. The opposite bank, up which he had then climbed, was fairly steep, so that we were now faced with the prospect of having the elephant above us, which is hardly the best way of meeting a 'rogue'.

We went forward very slowly indeed, and as silently as was humanly possible. Our quarry had stopped feeding, and was now on the move again. We soon saw that he appeared to be making for another valley that lay beyond the spur of the hill up which we were now climbing. Having reached this conclusion, we began to move faster, but had gone only another quarter-mile when we heard the rumbling sound made by the elephant's stomach in the process of digesting his heavy meal.

I sent Ranga and the forest guard up a stout tamarind tree and crept forward alone in the direction of the sound. The elephant was in a small depression, densely wooded by bamboo. Evidently he was resting, or perhaps lying down, as there were no sounds of his feeding. By this time the rumbling had also ceased.

Very carefully, almost inch by inch, I went down into the depression. Then stopping for a moment, I gathered a little soft earth in my hand and held it up before me, letting it drop in order to see from which direction any current of air might be blowing. The earth fell straight, indicating that there was hardly any breeze in the depression. This was a handicap, as there was a chance of the elephant smelling me in the still air.

So I went forward, still more carefully, if that were possible. The bamboos towered above me, and I peeped around each clump as I came abreast of it. A few more yards of this sort of progress and I saw what appeared to be a slate-grey boulder before me. It was the elephant, lying on the ground, and as my bad luck would have it, facing in the opposite direction.

I could now do one of two things: either make a detour and try to come upon the elephant from the front, where I might see his tusks and identify him as the rogue before shooting, or much simpler, rouse him from where I stood. He would undoubtedly turn around to face the disturbance, so that I could then identify him and shoot before he could know what was happening.

Deciding on this second and easier course, I slipped partly behind a clump of bamboo, then softly whistled. The elephant took no notice. Perhaps he was deeply asleep, or thought the sound had come from some forest bird. Then I clicked my tongue loudly. This had the desired effect, for the elephant scrambled to its feet and span around to face me.

He was a magnificent tusker, quite ten feet tall, and his ivory tusks gleamed magnificently in the early morning sunlight. But they were wide apart, not crossed in the least. I had spent my time tracking the wrong elephant.

The pachyderm looked at me in amazement for quite half a minute, his small eyes contemplating the creature who had disturbed his slumber. I could almost read the thoughts that were passing through his brain. His first reaction, after surprise, was annoyance and he moved forward a pace or two in a threatening attitude. I gave another sharp whistle, at the sound of which his courage ebbed away, and he turned tail and bolted into the forest, the crashing sound of his retreat dying away in the distance.

By the time I returned to the spot where I had left Ranga and the Forest Guard, they had already climbed down from the tamarind tree, guessing, by the sounds they had clearly heard, that I had found an animal which was not the rogue we were after. The three of us then trudged dejectedly back to the water hole, not only disappointed, but annoyed at the time we had wasted.

As previously related, there were two other tracks of approximately the same size. They had been made in the mud of the pool and nothing could be gained by measuring them with my tape to determine which came nearest to the notified dimensions of the rogue; soft mud exaggerated the track of any animal. Ranga followed one, and the guard and myself the other, with the understanding that we would return to the water hole in fifteen minutes for further consultation.

It was not long before I could see that the animal I was following had been one of the regular herd, for the broken undergrowth revealed the presence of the feeding cows and young that had accompanied him. He was obviously not the rogue, and in exactly fifteen minutes by my watch I turned and made my way back to the water hole. Ranga, having no watch, had not yet arrived, so I sat down to a quiet pipe and sip of hot tea from the flask carried by the Forest Guard. After about ten minutes, he came to report that the elephant had made a detour a quarter of a mile from the water hole, had moved around in a semicircle and passed through a strip of jungle that led to a hill in exactly the opposite direction, behind the bungalow.

This news seemed promising, so we were up and away. Nor was it long before we came to the spot whence Ranga had returned to report. It soon became evident that our new quarry was a traveller, for he had hardly stopped to feed, other than pluck an occasional small stem of succulent young leaves. That elephant led us on and on, over the hill behind the forest bungalow, over the next two hills, and then in almost a straight line to the Talvadi stream.

In all we covered well over four miles before reaching the bed of that stream, when we found that the elephant had turned southwest and was moving directly down the Talvadi river itself. I knew the Cauvery river lay within a distance of fifteen miles, and I began to feel our quarry had suddenly made up his mind to reach the big river. Once he did this, and particularly if he swam across to the opposite bank, it would be hopeless to follow him, as the terrain there is not only extremely dense, but leads on and on as unbroken forest and hill country to the Niligiri and Biligirirangan Mountains, over a hundred miles away.

So we passed on with all possible speed, casting discretion to the winds, but our elephant had had a lead of several hours, and judging by the long and determined strides he had taken, he had been bent upon travelling.

The soft sand of the riverbed was now scalding hot under the midday sun. It hampered my walking and trickled into my boots by means that only fine river or sea sand knows. Every now and again the streambed became rocky, and for long stretches the fine sand gave way to a succession of rounded, water-worn boulders. In such spots the elephant had pushed through the undergrowth of the banks to avoid the boulders, and we did the same, bent double to dodge the dangling lines of creepers, and pouring with perspiration from our exertions.

Fifteen miles of such walking brought us near the confluence of Talvadi and the Cauvery. A few hundred yards from the big river, the Talvadi stream is crossed by the rough track leading from Uttaimalai village to Biligundlu. The elephant had changed direction here and had followed the track towards Uttaimalai for another two miles, before turning southwards again towards a swamp that borders the big river. This swamp, known as Kartei Palam, which means Bison Hollow, was well known to me. Years before it had been a regular haunt for bison herds that swam across the Cauvery from the Coimbatore bank to the Salem side. At this time of the year the swamp was fairly dry except in places, but lush grass grew everywhere, while shady clumps of trees dotted the whole area.

We now met with signs that the elephant had begun feeding, and as we made our way towards the centre of the swamp mounds of fresh dung showed that the animal was not far away.

The ground also became boggy, and once more I sent Ranga and the guard back to minimise the squelching sounds that were bound to arise from three people walking in the mud. Progress was necessarily at a snail's pace, for I had not only to look out for the elephant, but study the ground carefully at each step, to avoid suddenly plunging waist-deep into the clinging black clay. Yet, several times I sank knee-deep, and to extricate myself I had to struggle and flounder about, making no end of noise, before I gained a firmer footing.

Several times I stopped to listen but heard nothing, and then, without warning, there came a violent 'swoosh' of the reedy grass, and the elephant stood some twenty paces away, all dripping and covered with the sticky muck in which he had been lying. It was a big bull, with gleaming white tusks, symmetrically curved. But they were not the crossed tusks of the rogue. Disappointment and disgust so overcame me that I fairly 'shoo-ed' that poor elephant away, and when I rejoined my followers, I was in no good mood, as they could clearly see.

It was now past 4 p.m., and we had some fifteen miles to retrace along the Talvadi Stream, plus another four to the Gerhetti bungalow. Alternatively, we could camp at Biligundlu and return next morning; but this would mean the loss of another half-day, out of the two days that were left to me. So I gave the order for the return march, much to the disgust of my companions, who reminded me that, as we had no light of any kind, the major portion of our journey would have to be performed in darkness, there being no moon. We might even meet the elephant! My reply, I am afraid, was terse, and consigned this elephant, and all other elephants, to a region they would find far too hot.

That return journey seemed one long succession of stumbling, slipping, slithering over rocks, or tripping over stumps, or being caught by creepers without sign or sound of the elephant. It was almost midnight before we limped into the Gerhetti bungalow, thoroughly exhausted and as fretful as children. We had been up with the dawn, walking incessantly, stalking through thorns, grass, river-sand and swamp, and had covered about forty miles. We were ravenously hungry and thirsty too.

Next morning I was cramped and footsore. The forest guard showed an ankle, which he had contrived to twist somewhere along the Talvadi stream, and begged to be excused from that day's operations. Only Ranga appeared fit, and ready for another hard day. Porridge, bacon and eggs, and strong coffee put new life into me, while a huge ball of 'ragi', which is a small foodgrain, boiled and made into a sphere almost the size of a tiny cannonball, washed down with coffee, would satisfy Ranga till nightfall.

We had all been too tired to hear any sounds during the night, but a visit to the waterhole now indicated the herd had returned while we had slept. There were also the fresh footmarks of two big bulls, one of which was probably the first elephant I had followed the previous day, while the other was the animal I had not followed at all. The third bull, as we well knew, we had left far away at Kartei Palam.

Nevertheless, nothing could be left to chance; so we followed the same plan as that of the previous day, tracking each of these two animals till we came up with them. By 9.30 a.m. we had come up to the first bull that we had decided to follow. He was slightly smaller than the two we had tracked the previous day, and he was not the rogue! No doubt this was the third animal of the trio whose footprints we had noted the previous day. Going back to the water hole, we set out on the remaining track, and came upon its maker at 2.30 p.m., quietly standing under a large and shady tamarind tree. Nor was he the rogue. I readily recognised him as the first animal I had tracked the previous day and had disturbed while lying among the bamboos.

Thus it was clear that the 'rogue' was not in the immediate vicinity. Three of the four days available to me had now gone, but I was still no further forward than on the day of my arrival.

At five we were back at the bungalow, brewing a large degchie of tea. Then at half-past five a party of bullock-carts arrived from Anchetty, eight miles away, to shelter for the night because of the presence of the rogue. The cartmen stated that at a spot about half-way from Anchetty, where the Gollamothi stream traversed the road, they had come upon the tracks of a large elephant which had crossed and recrossed the road at several points and was evidently hanging around not far from the ford itself.

Determined not to give up till the last moment, Ranga and I ate an early dinner and, bundling the still-tired Forest Guard into the car, motored to the ford of which the cartmen had spoken.

It was 7 p.m. when we arrived there and almost dark. The car lights revealed the tracks of the elephant where the cartmen had said. At the ford itself, with the aid of torches we made out the plate-like spoor of the elephant superimposed upon the narrow ruts made by the cartwheels of our friends. Elephants do not wander about in daytime in hot weather, and this clearly indicated that the pachyderm had been on the road that very evening, before our arrival. Perhaps he had even heard the sound of the car, or seen our lights, and had moved off just before we came on the scene.

We quickly lowered the hood of the Studebaker. I handed my 'sealed-beam' spotlight to Ranga, whom I placed in the 'dickie' seat behind, but kept the guard in the front seat. I myself sat on the folded hood, my feet on the driving seat, with my rifle and torch at the ready. Complete darkness soon enveloped us, overshadowed as we were by the towering muthee and jumlum trees that bordered the banks of the Gollamothi, together with bamboo clumps, whose stems creaked weirdly to the jungle air-currents that blew up and down the dry sandy bed of the river.

The prospects were poor. To begin with, we did not know whether the tracks we had seen belonged to the rogue. They might, indeed, have been made by any elephant. All we knew for certain was that they had not been made by any of the three big males around Gerhetti. Secondly, there was not the slightest reason for this elephant to return to the ford he had so recently passed, for he had the whole wide jungle in which to roam. Thirdly, we all knew that ten miles to an elephant is scarcely two hours' easy ambling, and that when he is really travelling he moves much faster. Fourthly, the wind was blowing in all directions, and would carry our scent to any elephant within a quarter-of-a-mile and, if he was not the rogue, drive him off. On the other hand, there was the slender hope that, if this was the rogue, our scent might attract him.

So we waited in the pitch-darkness till 8.30 p.m., and then the dull sound of a hollow log being turned over came to us form somewhere upstream. The elephant was on the move at last and, judging by the sound, was some four or five hundred yards away. Silence followed for another quarter-hour, when the sharp crack of a breaking branch, much closer, indicated that the elephant was feeding and moving towards the ford as he did so.

I knew he would take thirty minutes at least to finish eating the young leaves from the ends of the branch he had just broken, so that there would be plenty of time before he came near. The car, with us inside it, would be clearly visible to him as he came around the curve of the river, and there was every possibility, if he was not the rogue, that on seeing us he would just fade quietly away into the forest. But I had not taken the wind into consideration; just then it blew strongly from us towards the elephant.

Minuets of silence followed, and then we heard a slight rustling in the undergrowth from the bank of the river nearest to the car. It was a faint sound, apparently made by a small body in the bushes. Then the ominous crack of trodden bamboo came to us suddenly. Silence again, deep and enveloping. Even the breeze seemed to have died, to allow full opportunity for the next event.

This was the ear-splitting scream of a charging bull-elephant, mingled with the crashing of bamboos and undergrowth as they collapsed before the monster that rushed towards us.

Ranga never flinched! The beam of the spot-light cut through the enveloping gloom. My own torch-beam, mingling with that of the vastly more brilliant spotlight, showed an enormous tusker, his bulk pitch black, his trunk curled upwards and inwards, with two wicked white tusks that were crossed at the tip, thundering upon us!

At fifty yards range the bullet from my right barrel took him in the throat. He stopped with the impact, screaming with rage. No doubt this was more than he had bargained for! The explosion, the pain and the lights confused him, and he half-turned into the jungle. My second bullet, aimed hastily at the temple, struck him somewhere on the side of the head. He rushed into the jungle, stumbled on his forefeet, picked himself up again as I reloaded, and disappeared in the bamboos as my third shot struck him somewhere in the body. For quite fifteen minutes we could hear heavy crashes in the jungle as the elephant reeled, collapsed and then recovered, to continue his flight.

Starting the car, I reversed and returned to Gerhetti. I slept soundly that night, Ranga awakening me at dawn with a mugful of steaming, strong tea.

By 6.30 a.m., we were on the track of the stricken rogue. Great gouts of blood had issued from the throat-wound and had sprayed through his trunk over the surrounding bushes, which had been reddened by his passage. Soon we too were red with his blood as we pushed ourselves through the undergrowth in his wake.

He had lain, or fallen down, in several places, where the greensward had been dyed a deep red. He had leaned against several tree-trunks that were still sticky with his blood. Truly, if you do not finish the job of killing an elephant, you let yourself in for a gory trail. I really pitied this poor beast, murderous killer of men though he had been.

After two miles I found him, half-kneeling, half-lying against a tree-trunk. He was so weak from loss of blood that he could scarcely move, although he clearly saw me as I walked towards him. The only sign of life were his wicked little blood-shot eyes, that gleamed and moved as they watched my approach. Fifteen yards away I raised my rifle to deliver the coup de grace. As if to salute approaching death, that game and mighty beast shivered from head to foot as he drew up his mighty bulk to its full ten feet. The trunk curled upwards, the big ears flapped outward, and he staggered two paces forward in his last charge, when the heavy 450/400 bullet crashed into his temple and he collapsed, as if pole-axed, to earth.

Although a killer, the 'crossed-tusker of Gerhetti' was a brave fighter, and I honoured him as he lay before my still-smoking muzzle —mighty in life and even mightier in his death!

The Sangam Panther

News filtered through to my home in bangalore that A leopard, or 'panther' as it is more commonly known in India, was killing people in the vicinity of a place called Sangam, a little over seventy miles south of the city.

Man-eating panthers are rare in southern India. To begin with, the jungles are not so extensive, or nearly so continuously mountainous as in the north, particularly along the foothills of the vast Himalayan range. The exception is the Western Ghats, which are almost wholly covered with forest for over four hundred miles, with an average breadth of ten to fifteen miles. But the other forest areas are of much smaller extent and are more or less surrounded by cultivation. This causes carnivores, and particularly panthers, to confine their attentions to the herds of cattle and goats, in which the country is abundantly rich, and to a lesser extent to village curs, locally known as 'piedogs' which are, like the common monkey, the curse of the land. Prior to the advent to hydrophobia vaccine, large numbers of persons died yearly of infection from the bite of mad dogs, as these curs constantly contract rabies, especially in the hot weather. Monkeys are and always have been a major menace, doing untold damage to crops and fruit trees. The monkey has a strong religious significance to Indians, and great objection is raised against any attempt to harm it. Panthers—at least so far as the 'piedogs' and monkeys are concerned—therefore perform a great service to the land.

In the Western Ghats of which I have just spoken, the rainfall is very heavy, even exceeding hundred inches per year. They are covered with dense bamboo, long grass, and thick evergreen vegetation—the breeding grounds of clouds of mosquitoes, ticks, leeches, flies and other animal pests.

Panthers do not like much water—and they detest the pests, in any and all their many forms! So, in the only region where they could multiply unmolested they are hardly to be found! By a natural arrangement, therefore, panthers, which are found in all other jungles of southern India, generally have plenty to eat and somehow do not become addicted to the bad habit of man-eating. A notable exception to this was the panther of Gummalapur, a story I have related elsewhere [1]; in that case there were special circumstances that caused it to take to man-eating.

In Bangalore news often reached us of people being mauled by panthers and tigers, more often by the former. But nobody took particular notice of these rumours as on-the-spot investigation always told the same tale. Some villager, with his matchlock, or some inexperienced hunter would let fly at a panther, generally with slugs, and succeed only in hurting it. Then, inexperienced in jungle-lore, he would attempt to follow it up, through lantana bushes or amongst rocks, and get mauled—sometimes severely—for his pains. In years gone by, over seventy-five per cent of such cases of mauling resulted in death from septicaemia. With the advent of the sulpha drugs, casualties dropped to below ten per cent.

So nobody took much notice when such news came in. Why should they? They had other work to do. Moreover, rumour is invariably much exaggerated in India! A slight scratch is magnified into a severed mauling, and a mauling into a killing. When an actual killing does occur, it is widely described in the Press as several killings.

Therefore, when I heard that a panther had killed a woman, and later killed and eaten a child at Sangam, I did not believe it. Then the panther killed a third and a fourth time. The Press got hold of the news and it was splashed across the front pages.

Several hunters from Bangalore, Mysore and Madras went after the animal, but for a month the panther did not kill. One of the hunters succeeded in shooting a panther; and this fact, coupled with the cessation of human kills, seemed to indicate that it was the man-eater that had been shot. The hunters returned to the towns.

Then the panther killed once more, but was prevented from eating its victim, a man who was sleeping in a shed-like room with a pack of four mongrel dogs, with which he used to hunt hare and sometimes deer.

A thorn fence protected the entrance to the shed. The roof comprised loose bits of zinc sheeting, and the wall consisted of wooden stakes driven into the ground in close formation, the gaps being stuffed with thorns. The panther came at night, and with its paws contrived to open a passage between the end stake of the doorway and the thorn fence across the entrance. The dogs panicked, barking and howling loudly and cowering to one side. But the man must have just woken.

The panther entered the shed. The dogs clustered together but did nothing, and the marauder, walking past them, grabbed the man by the throat. He died after uttering a single, piercing wail.

The people in the neighbouring hut had been disturbed by the noise made by the dogs' barking and growling in the shed. They wondered what was happening, but nobody would go outside to investigate. The panther then tried to drag the dead man out of the shed through the same gap by which it had entered. The gap was not big enough. So the panther itself passed through and tried to drag the man after it. But the body became entangled in the thorns and stuck fast. The panther then gave a mighty heave, which succeeded in unbalancing the fence, which fell with a crash on top of the animal. This must have frightened him considerably for he made off, leaving the corpse still entangled amongst the thorns.

The continued noise resulting from the efforts of the panther now alarmed the people in the next hut, who had been listening breathlessly all this time. They began to shout and woke other villagers. After quite a while, some of the brave men came forth carrying lanterns, armed with matchlocks, bludgeons and staves, to find the dead man, but no panther.

The alarm now spread afresh, and news was brought to me by the village Patel, or headman, who came to Bangalore expressly for the purpose. I was at that time able to take two days' casual leave, while Sunday made a third. So I agreed to go with him and attempt to shoot the panther within those three days.

The road to Sangam ran past the town of Kankanhalli, thirty-six miles from Bangalore, from where it began to descend sharply to the bed of the Cauvery river. The last ten miles of the track was really atrocious, and my Studebaker rocked and creaked and groaned in all its joints, in protest at such bad treatment. Hairpin bends at ridiculous gradients and sharp angles (where all milestones and furlong slabs were coloured black to prevent them from being uprooted by wild elephants, who have a great aversion to anything white), betokened my approach to journey's end, and soon I reached the little traveller's bungalow after a short but exceedingly tough journey.

The word 'Sangam' denotes a 'joining' or 'confluence', and was most appropriate, for it marked the junction of the Cauvery river with its tributary, the Arkravarthy, which flows in almost a straight line southwards from its source north of Bangalore.

The Cauvery here flows from west to east, Sangam being on its northern bank within Mysore state territory. The southern bank of the Cauvery comes within the jungles of North Coimbatore district (Kollegal Forest Division). Some thirteen miles east of Sangam, Mysore state territory ends and is flanked by Salem district, which thereafter holds the northern bank of the river with North Coimbatore district continuing along the southern bank. Both North Coimbatore and Salem districts belong to the Madras presidency.

Sangam is a beautifully wooded spot, offering in normal times first-rate masher fishing, with crocodile shooting among the sandbanks and rocks in any direction along the river. On the Mysore side of the forest there are spotted deer, sambar, barking-deer, wild pig, feathered game, and an occasional bear, panther or tiger. Elephants often cross over from the Coimbatore bank. Along the southern bank, in the Coimbatore jungles, all the above abound in greater number, in addition to several fine herds of bison. Elephant and bear are particularly numerous.

After parking the car under the huge muthee trees that flanked the river and grew beside the bungalow, I walked across to the small village where the dog-keeper had recently been killed and inspected the scene for myself, in addition to being given graphic accounts of what had happened by the neighbours, who had heard so much that day, but had done nothing to help the poor fellow. The Patel, who had returned with me joined in the voluble tale.

With much questioning and cross-questioning, it became apparent that this panther was going to be an exceedingly difficult animal to bag, as on the north banks of the river it had a very wide expanse of jungle to wander over, without taking into consideration the many square miles of forest on the southern or Coimbatore side. But the latter could reasonably be excluded, since panthers, unlike tigers, generally dislike swimming across big rivers, although they swim well when compelled to do so.

The first, and apparently only thing to do was to tie out baits. With the Patel's active help, I purchased five large bull-calves. The first of these we tethered about half-a-mile west of the bungalow and about the same distance from the river bank; the second, on a line roughly parallel with the river and a mile farther west; the third, a mile farther west than the second; the fourth, on the farther bank of the Arkravarthy tributary, about half-a-mile east of the bungalow and the same distance from the Cauvery; and the fifth, a mile east of the fourth bait. Thus the five baits were roughly in a straight line, flanking the river, about half-a-mile inland and with a distance of four miles between the farthest bait to the west and the farthest bait to the east.

It was sunset before I returned to the bungalow. A cold dinner appeased my appetite, eaten on the small bungalow verandah and washed down with two steaming mugs of tea. After lighting my pipe, I sat with my back to the wall, listening to the subdued rush of the river as it sped along its rocky bed. It was a dark night and fairly cloudy. Such stars as could be seen peeping occasionally between clouds would be insufficient for night-watching, so I went inside and fell asleep.

Early next morning we checked the baits. They were all alive. I walked up the road down which I had come the previous day, climbing up the hairpin bends and ghat section. There were no panther tracks to bee seen. A herd of spotted deer and three sambar—singly and at different places—had crossed the road during the night, but no other animal had passed.

When returning to the bungalow, instead of coming back along the road, I cut down the hill through the jungle and came on to the dry bed of the Arkravarthy, where I turned southwards and walked in the sand, looking for possible pug-marks. There were none to be seen, but the same herd of spotted deer that had crossed the road had also traversed the sands. In due course, I passed my bait number four, and came to where the Arkravarthy joined the Cauvery.

A day and a half, out of the three days at my disposal, had now passed, and I had not even seen the panther's pug-marks. The situation seemed hopeless.

After lunch, I decided to walk in the easterly direction, downstream along the Cauvery for about three-and-a-half miles, to a gorge where the river narrowed to about twenty feet. At this spot it roared through a chasm, known as Meke-Dat. The meaning of that word, in Kanarese language, is 'the goat's leap'. Legend records that, years and years ago, a jungle-sheep pursued by wild dogs on the Coimbatore side and driven to the brink of the river, performed the prodigious feat of leaping those twenty feet to safety on the Mysore side.

Here, all other sounds are drowned by the roar of the turbulent waters, hurling themselves through the narrow opening, and a man can hardly hear himself even when he shouts his very loudest.

I sat on the edge of the rocks and watched the troubled, racing river. A hundred yards away, downstream where the surface had become placid again, an occasional fish broke water, leaping into the air, as if evincing sheer exuberance and joy of living. A fish-eagle circled in the ethereal blue of a clear sky. After a while, I rose and retraced my steps to the bungalow. I had still not found any panther tracks.

The night was clear. Although there was no moon, there were none of the previous night's clouds and the starlight was enough in the jungle to enable one to see for a few yards.

The watchman in charge of the bungalow owned a 'piedog' —the name by which mongrels in India are known— and against my custom and only because time was so short, I asked him to lend it to me till midnight. He hummed and hawed at first, but when three rupees had changed hands he agreed.

While walking along the road that day, I had noticed a rock at its edge hardly a mile away. I took the dog, tied it at the foot of the rock and walked away down the road. When out of sight of the dog, I turned to my right and cut into the jungle, coming back to the rock on its 'off' side. Silently I clambered up, and lay flat on its top. The rock was still warm from the sun that had been shining on it all day.

Thinking it had been abandoned, the dog began barking, whining and howling by turns. Dogs are too intelligent, it is unfair to tie them out as bait. Unlike cattle and goats, they sense danger at once and, even if not attacked, go through hours of mental agony. I have known a dog which was tied out as bait for a panther—although it was not harmed— become so nervous that it fell sick the following day and died within a week.

I watched from the top of the rock. Nearly an hour passed, and then suddenly a shadowy, grey shape came scampering down the road. It moved fast till about ten feet from the dog, then it stopped. Could it be the panther?

The stars shed just enough light to prevent the darkness from being total, but not more than that. I could just see the grey shape looking at the dog. The dog growled furiously as it turned round to face the intruder. It must be a panther, I thought, as I aligned my rifle in its direction preparatory to depressing the switch of my torch which was fastened along the barrel.

'Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha!' said the intruder, followed by a disparaging but loud 'Cheey! Shee-ay! Shee-ay!'

It was a hyaena, the common striped hyaena of southern India. The dog growled still more ferociously; then began to bark frenziedly..

Now began an amusing drama, such as watchers by night are sometimes privileged to witness in a jungle. The hyaena darted off the road into the undergrowth, where he began to say, 'Gudda! Guddar! Garrar! Gurr-rr-aa!' ending with his usual disparaging 'Cheey-ar! Shee-ar!'

The dog faced the noise and barked loudly. The hyaena reappeared on the road, beyond the dog but watching him, and crackled, 'Ha! Ha! ha! Guddar! Garrar! Shee-ay!'

Unlike his African cousins, the spotted and the brown hyaena, the former being the familiar 'laughing hyaena' we have all heard about, the Indian hyaena is generally a silent animal, hunting alone or at the most in pairs. Spotted hyaenas move in packs. As a rule, all hyaenas are cowardly animals, although they are extremely strong for their size and have enormously powerful jaws, which can easily bite right through a man's arm, bone and all.

Quite rarely, they display extraordinary courage, of which I once saw an example. I had been sitting over a panther kill. The owner turned up and began to eat. I had held my shot, as I wanted, if possible, to learn the sex of the animal before killing it. This was because I had been told a male and a female panther lived in the vicinity, and that the female was accompanied by two cubs about six months old. I wanted to make certain I did not shoot the mother.

While I hesitated, a hyaena had arrived on the scene, and his arrival, on that occasion, had been dramatic. He came as if from nowhere, and the first I knew of his arrival was when he had scampered boldly up to the panther, voicing the same medley of sounds I have just described. The panther, sprawled across its kill, had glared at the newcomer with blazing orbs, snarling and growling furiously. The hyaena had approached to within five feet, just beyond reach of the panther's paw-sweep, and had set up such a cacophony of hideous sound as to resemble a chorus of the demons of hell.

The panther had added to the noise by growling still louder, and every now and then striking at the hyaena with its claws. The latter just rocked backwards, out of reach of each blow, after which it would feint with a short rush forward, while gradually working around to the rear of the panther. At first the panther had turned around correspondingly, to keep the hyaena in view, growling even more loudly while making short jabs and slaps with its paws in the direction of the hyaena. But the hyaena, always out of reach, had haw-ed and sneered, gargled and gurgled with unabated zeal.

Frightened—or perhaps just disgusted—at the unseemly racket, the panther had finally risen from its kill and then walked slowly away with many a backward glance, amidst snarls, at the hyaena, who continued his weird din till the panther had vanished in the undergrowth. Then he had fallen upon the kill himself, with the greatest—and, no doubt, thoroughly deserved—enthusiasm.

But the hyaena which I continued to watch from the rock was undoubtedly a little scared of the mongrel dog. Frequently he would disappear to one or the other side of the road. Then would come a pitter-patter amongst the dried leaves as he doubled back and forth, this way and that, to reappear at all places while continuing to make his unseemly, weird and often comical sounds.

The lesson I learnt from these two experiences was that hyaenas try to frighten their opponents with their continuous, unseemly crackle. The first hyaena had frightened the panther off its own kill while this one was trying to frighten the dog, perhaps just to clear it off the road or into the undergrowth, where he could pounce upon it more easily.

But the dog was tied up, and so could not move away, which the hyaena could not understand. An hour of this sort of thing ceased to be amusing to me, and I realised the racket, especially the part played by the hyaena, was almost certain to drive away any panther in the vicinity, man-eater or otherwise. So, groping for a small piece of rock, I hurled it at the hyaena. My aim fell short of its mark, and the stone thudded on the hard surface of the road. The hyaena jumped nervously, and scampered into the bushes, while the dog stopped barking and began to whimper. I thought I had rid the scene of a most unwelcome visitor.

Perhaps a quarter of an hour had passed when I heard the furtive pitter-patter again, shortly followed by the hyaena's queer notes. The dog barked and growled. I threw another stone at the hyaena. He stopped; only to start again after ten minutes. Once more a stone; once more a silence, followed by a new beginning. Only after about the fifth stone did the hyaena feel that the spot had somehow become unhealthy, and with a final, 'Ah! Ah! Ah! Chee-ey! Shee-ay!' took himself off. It was past ten o'clock.

My watch showed five minutes to midnight when I heard the approach of human voices. A little later, I saw the twinkling lights of two lanterns, illuminating from that distance the walking feet of many men. The dog saw them and stopped its moaning.

When the party drew level with the dog, I counted eleven men, two of whom were carrying lanterns, and all of whom, except one, carried staves and lathis of some sort or another.

The one exception was armed with a matchlock. They had obviously come in search of me. I answered their call and came down from the rock.

The men then told me that, scarcely an hour earlier, the panther had made its way into one of the huts of the very village where the dog-keeper had been attacked by burrowing through the thatched wall, and had seized one of the five sleeping inmates, a woman about twenty-five years old. She had shrieked aloud as she found herself being dragged away, waking the other four persons in the room, who were her father, two brothers and mother.

Meanwhile, the panther was trying to drag her out through the opening in the thatch by which it had entered. The girl struggled violently. The panther dropped her and bit her viciously. One of the brothers struck a match to lighten the darkness of the hut's interior. Her father, with commendable bravery and presence of mind, hurled the only missile which came to his hand, at the panther. The missile happened to be a brass water-pot of some weight, and it struck the panther full on its side. Man-eaters, whether tigers or panthers, invariably have a streak of cowardice in their natures and this panther was no exception to the general rule. Leaving its victim, it had dashed out of the hut through the opening in the thatch.

The screams of the mauled woman and the general pandemonium had awakened the whole village. The menfolk came out with lanterns, armed as best as they could. The party of eleven had then come to the rest-house to find me, and the watchman from whom I had borrowed the dog had directed them to where I was sitting.

Telling one of the men to untie the rope and bring the dog in tow, we hastened back to the bungalow, and I brought out my first-aid kit from the back seat of the Studebaker. We then hurried on to the village, where an appalling sight awaited me. The poor girl had been bitten right through her right shoulder, and again in the abdomen, where the panther had seized her the second time when she had struggled to escape. One breast and her chest right down the side were in ribbons where the foul claws had buried themselves deep in her flesh, raking it open with their downward sweep. Her jacket and sari were torn to pieces, and she lay in a welter of blood, blissfully unconscious after her experience.

I saw at once that such meagre first-aid equipment as I had was totally inadequate to meet the situation, but we quickly washed the wounds with strong solution of potassium permanganate and roughly bandaged her chest and abdomen with strips torn from another sari. Her father, two brothers, and three willing men from the village then carried her on a rope-cot to the Studebaker. Placing her as comfortably as possible in the 'dickie', I took her three male relations aboard and set out for the town of Kankanhalli, which boasted the nearest village hospital. We reached there after three-thirty in the morning, when I awoke the doctor and handed over the injured woman. Her condition appeared to be very low, owing to the great deal of blood she had lost.

By four-thirty, I was in the bathroom of the traveller's bungalow at Kankanhalli, where I removed my blood-soaked clothing and took a cold bath. I had no change of clothing with me, having left them behind at Sangam in the confusion of the moment. So I borrowed a clean dhoti and a blanket from the bungalow-waiter.

Dawn was breaking when I knocked at the Post Office, awoke a most obliging postmaster from his sleep, paid the necessary late fee and despatched an urgent telegram to Bangalore requesting extension of leave for four more days.

When I returned to the bungalow I found the younger brother of the injured woman awaiting me in tears. He had come from the hospital to tell me his sister had just died. Shortly afterwards, the father came to ask me to take his daughter's body back in the car to Sangam for cremation by the banks of the river Cauvery, in which the ashes would eventually be scattered. It was a request I could not refuse. The bungalow servant told me he wanted his dhoti and blanket back. So I had to dress again in my blood-smeared clothes.

We drove back to the hospital, placed the still, limp body of the girl in the back seat, and set out on the return journey to Sangam, delayed by two hours at the Police Station, where we reported the occurrence.

After a bath in a quiet pool beside the river, free from crocodiles, a change into fresh clothing, a cold lunch and two big mugs of tea, I lay back in a rickety old armchair to review the situation. My loaded pipe, from which the comforting smoke arose in spirals to the roughly-tiled low roof, helped a great deal to soothe my ragged nerves after the events of the previous night and to prevent my eyes from closing with sleep.

What should I do with the remaining four days and five nights at my disposal, to rid these poor village-folk from another, and still another, and God only knew how many more repetitions of these terrible events. Facts appeared to indicate that: (1) the panther would not take animal baits, (2) it had a wide range of cover, and (3) it was predisposed to dragging people out of huts. Then, while I pondered, I fell asleep.

At 3 p.m. I awoke and a possible line of action appeared to have presented itself while I slept. It was this:

The small village of Sangam, with about a dozen huts, had been constructed in the usual fashion, on both sides of a central lane. I remembered that on the southern side of this lane, and not far from the river bank, small herds of cattle belonging to the villagers were corralled in a common enclosure, surrounded by a fence of bamboo, intersticed with cut lantana brambles. The only dogs left in the village, which had belonged to the man who had been killed, were enclosed in the shed-like room where he had been slain, which room happened to adjoin the larger cattle enclosure on its western side. The idea came to me that, if I posted myself at night in the midst of the cattle, not only would I be perfectly safe from unexpected attack, as the cattle would grow restive and give ample warning should the panther approach, but this very restlessness, and the fact that the dogs too would join in the alarm, would help me to learn of the panther's presence, should he enter the village. Meanwhile, I would keep my five live baits tied out on the off-chance that one of them might be taken instead.

With this plan in view, I dressed warmly for the night, wearing a khaki woollen 'balaclava' cap to keep off the dew. My usual night equipment included, this time a large flask of tea, some biscuits, and my pipe, as I knew that smoking, in this case, would do no harm.

Because of the panther's presence, the villagers were inside their huts, behind doors barricaded and reinforced with freshly-cut thorns, long before six o'clock. I took up my position in the middle of the cattle enclosure. About me was a space of about fifty yards in every direction, with nearly hundred nondescript cattle scattered around.

At fist the animals resented my presence and crowded to the corners away from me, leaving me isolated in the centre of the pen. I started trying to make friends with them. One kicked over my flask of tea and nearly broke it! Moreover, some of the bulls were rather truculent and made short jabs at me with their horns if I came too close. After an hour in each other's company, the situation eased a little, and I was able to make my way guardedly to the centre of the herd, about half of whom were now resting on the ground. I got down also.

As the hours dragged by, the silence was unbroken, except for an occasional snort from one of the animals, or the trampling of another as it altered its position. One cow became friendly and insisted in nuzzling her muzzle against my chest as a gesture of companionship. Eventually she flopped down contentedly on the ground beside me.

Then cattle-ticks began to bite me in many places and mercilessly. I scratched myself vigorously, although I knew that by doing so I would only increase the irritation. It grew colder, and soon I was glad to nuzzle myself, in my turn, up against the warm body of the cow who had chosen to open this strange friendship with me. Now and again, one of the herd would 'moo' contentedly, or snort, or kick, or flop down to the ground, or struggle to its feet.

The hours still dragged by, and the ticks continued to bite. At one o'clock a sambar belled on the small hill to the north of the village. It was a doe that had called, and she called again and again. Then her call was taken up by a kakar, whose hoarse bark resounded across the nullahs which furrowed the lower slopes of the hillock.

The sambar doe had stopped belling by this time, while the kakar climbed up, giving occasional vent to his guttural call. Whatever it was that had alarmed them had come down the hill.

Some twenty minutes later spotted deer began their warning cries, answering one another from the jungle that slopes from the base of the hill to the edge of the river. Either a tiger or a panther was afoot, and the next few minutes would tell whether the carnivore was just a normal animal or the marauder I was awaiting.

It was almost pitch-dark when the cattle grew restless. With one accord, those lying on the ground scrambled to their feet, and I did the same, keeping close beside the friendly cow. Some of the bulls snorted, and the herd were all turned towards the lane that divided the small village and passed by the thorn hedge that bordered the cattle stockade.

The animals became very restless and began to gather in a mass at the further end of the stockade, away from the hedge and lane. The four dogs in the neighbouring shed had been barking furiously; they now began to whimper. Whatever had frightened them was passing down that lane at that very moment.

I had got myself wedged in the midst of the cattle and had to watch carefully against being impaled on one of the many horns that were nervously tossing about me. I began to force myself through the herd to reach their front rank, hoping that I might be able to see something, but the darkness and the hedge revealed nothing.

I could hear the dogs howling and whimpering in the shed in which they were locked. My ears were attuned to catch the slightest sound, but the noise made by the cattle and the dogs gave me little chance. Some minutes later, I caught the faintest of scratching noises. Listening carefully 1 located it as coming from further down the lane. They became louder and more impatient. Then I realised that the panther was scratching at a door of one of the huts some distance away.

Breaking through the remainder of the cattle, I approached the fence on tiptoe, hoping to be able to peep over it and catch a glimpse of the panther when I switched on the torch at the end of my rifle. The inmates of the hut at which the panther was scratching chose that very moment to set up a bedlam of shrieks and shouts; the silence was broken by the most frightful din.

Thinking that the man-eater had succeeded in forcing his way into the hut, I threw discretion to the winds and rushed for the bamboo-and-thorn door that formed the entrance of the stockade. At dusk I had firmly wedged a huge Y-shaped log into place, and it took some precious moments to release its base from the big stones against which I had jammed it.

Dragging it aside and switching on the torch, I heaved the clumsy door back and stepped into the lane. Nothing was to be seen in any direction.

Keeping my back to the thorn fence to guard against attack from the rear, I shone the beam in all directions, but I still saw nothing. The panther had disappeared into thin air. Meanwhile, the shrieks and shouts continued unabated.

Then it occurred to me that perhaps the panther was inside the hut all this time, mauling and killing the inmates, and with this alarming thought in mind I began carefully to cover the intervening twenty yards.

When I came abreast of the entrance, I found it was shut fast. I called out to the inmates. At first, due to the noise they were making, they could not hear me. Then I called again, louder and many times. The the hubbub gradually subsided.

I shouted to the occupants to open the door. They would not do so. Then a tremendous voice from inside asked whether I was a man or a devil. I called back that it was I, and that the panther had gone. The voice replied that the inmates would open the door only when morning came. Meanwhile, my torch beam clearly showed the fresh claw-marks on the door of the hut, where the panther had just tried to effect an entrance.

I returned to the stockade, reclosed the door, replaced the Y-shaped log and the stones and went back to the spot where I had been lying against the cow when the alarm had begun.

To my horror, I found that the milling feet of the herd had smashed my thermos and it was now impossible to drink the hot tea for which I longed. My biscuits also had been devoured, and as I watched her ruefully, the friendly cow devoured the last of the paper in which they had been wrapped. Fortunately, I had kept my pipe and tobacco in my pocket, and with this I spent the rest of the night in comparative comfort, once again nestling against the side of the cow.

I returned to the bungalow at dawn, tired and disappointed. Worst of all, my body was a mass of tick-bites and itched abominably. Further, I knew only too well that each bite would fester during the coming ten days, and that I was in for a most uncomfortable time.

A cold bath and change, followed by hot tea, tinned bacon and bread and butter helped to ease my gloom, and by 7.30 a.m. I was asleep. I awoke for lunch at midday, and slept again till 3 p.m. Then I got up and began to work out another plan.

It would be impossible to sit with the cattle again, for if I was to get bitten once more by as many ticks as in the previous night, I might end with a dose of tick fever. Yet it was undeniable that both the cattle and the dogs had helped admirably in giving me the alarm when the panther had passed down the lane.

At last I had a fresh idea, that appeared to be the only compromise in the situation. The roof of the dog-shed consisted of scraps of zinc sheeting. I decided that I would lie on that roof, suitably camouflaged and overlooking the lane, so that I should be able to shoot the panther if it walked down the lane again. The cattle and the dogs would still help me by giving the alarm. I could protect my rear and both flanks by heaping stacks of cut thorns on to the roof. Any heavy body, like the panther, that leapt upon the zinc roof would necessarily give its presence away by the noise that would follow. Not only did this appear to be the only solution, but actually a good solution of the problem.

So I hurried towards the village, carrying my night-kit, biscuits, tea (poured into an empty beer bottle, borrowed from the bungalow watchman). After telling the villagers of my new plan, willing hands soon stacked piles of cut thorn branches on to the zinc roof of the goat-shed in the form of a square. Others brought dried straw, which they placed on the roof within the square of thorns for me to lie on.

At 6 p.m. I took up my position. There were two disadvantages that almost immediately began to show themselves: the first, that having to face the lane all the time, I would have to lie so that my legs would be slightly higher than my head, for the zinc roof sloped slightly downwards from back to front, to allow rain-water to flow off easily; the second, that I would have to remain lying on my stomach for most of the time, since my slightest movement sounded distinctly on the zinc roof. But the advantages were that I was safe from surprise attack from the rear; that I had a clear and unobstructed view of the lane and could hear distinctly, particularly if the cattle or the dogs became uneasy; lastly, that I was away from those awful ticks.

But that night was a peaceful one, without any indication whatever that the panther had come within two or three miles of the village. Back at the bungalow next morning I had another bath, and another daylong sleep. Each day I had had my live baits checked by a group of men, but none of these beasts had been harmed.

That night I took up position on the roof once more. It was past 2 a.m., and there had been no alarms from the surrounding jungle, and I felt very drowsy. Suddenly, as in a dream, I heard the cattle begin to stir restlessly. One of the dogs in the shed beneath me growled. Then all four of them began to bark or howl together.

Peering forward slowly, I began to scan the village lane in both directions. Starlight was not good at that moment, only enough to prevent the night from being obscure. The lane to the right and left appeared as a faint blur and of a slightly lighter shade than the surroundings. I could hear nothing and see nothing.

Then I caught the faintest of sounds. It appeared to be a hiss such as a cobra might make. Yes, there it was again! And it came from in front and directly below me. Was it the hiss of a snake or the faint noise a panther makes when he curls back the skin of his upper lip?

I peered downwards and at first could see nothing. Seconds later a faint elongated shape registered itself on my vision in that difficult light, a smudge of an infinitesimally lighter shade than the surrounding blur of the lane. I stared at it, and thought I saw it move. The hiss was repeated more distinctly this time. It appeared to come from this lighter smudge. The dogs inside the shed below me now started to whine and whimper. The cattle were very restless.

I realised that I could not point my rifle downwards from where I lay, I would have to move forward another foot perhaps, till my head and shoulders completely cleared the edge of zinc sheet on which I was lying. I began to do this, but despite my utmost care, the straw rustled and the zinc creaked faintly.

There came an ominous growl from that lightish smudge, and I knew that I was discovered and that within the next few seconds the panther would probably jump on the zinc roof and on to me.

Kicking myself forward the remaining six inches, I lowered the rifle over the side of the roof and depressed the torch-switch. Two gleaming orbs reflected the light from a spotted body, crouched for the spring. Only a single shot was required at that point-blank range and the spark of life slowly faded from those blazing orbs: from fiery white they became a dull orange, then a faint green, then an empty glimmer, and finally a purplish blue as the light was reflected back by the now lifeless retina.

It was an old female that I saw next morning, with canine teeth worn down almost to their stubs. Her coat was extremely pale; even her rosettes were ill-formed and dull. Her claws were blunt and worn. There appeared to be no other signs of deformity of any sort about her, or indication of an earlier wound. It seemed that only old age, and the prospect of gradual starvation through her physical incapacity to kill animals, had caused the Sangam panther to make war on the human race—a war which, however ghastly and fearsome while it lasts, invariably ends in the death of the feline. Modern firearms and the human intellect are heavy odds against the jungle instinct, cunning and pangs of hunger.

The Ramapuram Tiger

This is the story of a tiger that for three months held sway over nearly half a district, an area some sixty miles long by another sixty or so broad. Although his reign was comparatively short, it was nevertheless hectic, for during this short time the Ramapuram tiger was literally here, there and everywhere within the 3,600 square miles of his domain. Like the Scarlet Pimpernel he was sought by all, yet found by none, till his end came in an unexpected manner.

The district of North Coimbatore is largely made up of hills and forest. Bounded on the south by the low-lying plains of Coimbatore proper, it rises abruptly to the Dimbum escarpment. On the southwest are the jungles of the Nilgiri or Blue Mountain range. On the west, the forests of Mysore. To the northwest is another high range of hills—the Biligirirangans. North, northeast and eastwards flows the Cauvery river, clothed on both its banks with heavy jungle, the northeastern and eastern portions abutting on the forests of the district of Salem.

There is only one town worthy of that name in the district of North Coimbatore: Kollegal, which lies at the northwestern corner, scarcely eight miles from the Cauvery. Four roads branch out of Kollegal. Those that run westwards and northwards into Mysore play no part in this story. The third leads southwards and is more or less straight and runs along the eastern base of the Biligirirangan hills. Seventeen miles along this road brings one to the large village of Lokkanhalli; thirteen miles beyond Lokkanhalli is Bailur, where the 'Bison Range' begins and reaches to Hasanpur at the forty-eighth milestone, and to Dimbum, at the top of the escarpment, fifty-two miles from Kollegal.

The fourth road leads in a southeasterly direction and cuts through the village of Ramapuram, about twenty-five miles from Kollegal, where it turns southwards and leads to Bargur, twenty-four miles further on, then to Tamarakarai, another five miles, and finally to the southeastern end of the Dimbum escarpment, where it drops sharply to the village of Andiyur on the plains. This road totals about eighty-one miles in length.

The Kollegal-Lokkanhalli-Bailur-Dimbum road carried sparse lorry traffic and a daily bus service; whereas the road to Ramapuram, Tamarakari and Andiyur was unfit for motor traffic, except jeeps or old-fashioned high-clearance American cars, over the last sixty miles of its length. The terrain is fearful, consisting of sharp rising and falling gradients strewn with boulders. It becomes a narrow track, cut deeply by the wheels of bullock-carts and hemmed in on both sides by dense forest. The sandy—and often rocky-beds of forest streams cross and recross this track at intervals. In the deeper valleys vast areas of the mighty bamboo prevail, the drooping stems touching the hood of the car as it labours and chugs along in low gear with its radiator invariably boiling. Occasionally a fallen bamboo stem, or the broken branch of a tree, lies across the track, torn down to appease the ravenous appetite of an elephant. The driver then halts, and with his axe, or 'chopper' as it is here called, cuts away the obstruction and drags it aside, then moves on until he meets another similar obstruction. Without the handy 'chopper', this track would be impassable.

Tigers normally dislike very dense vegetation, and keep to low scrub jungle, but it is preferred by elephants and bison. The tiger has various reasons for its preference, one being that almost impenetrable undergrowth prevents the tiger from carefully stalking his prey and hinders his terribly effective last-minute charge. Another reason is that the tiger's legitimate prey — deer of all kinds, wild pig and, of course, village cattle — do not enter very dense jungle, which is mainly inhabited by elephants and bison of which the tiger generally keeps clear. A third reason is that thick undergrowth harbours insect pests, such as leeches, many species of animal-ticks, and the horse or animal fly, as it is called in India; tigers have a great aversion to these pests.

The Ramapuram man-eater was reported to have come from the banks of the Cauvery river, from the region of a mountain known as Ponnachai Malai, over six thousand feet in altitude. A few minor coffee-estates, owned by Sholagas and other Indian planters, exist on the slopes of this mountain. It is said that the Ramapuram man-eater began his career as an ordinary cattle-lifter that made a habit of raiding these estates for what he could pick up in the way of domestic cattle belonging to the planters and the coolies. He is reported to. have killed and eaten several cattle, till one planter, more enterprising than his fellows, went down to Coimbatore city and purchased a gin-trap of truly formidable appearance.

This trap was made of iron with two semicircular rows of teeth, which when opened and held apart, had a spread of almost two-and-a-half feet. The teeth were about two inches long. The jaws were kept apart by a hair-trigger arrangement, which, when released, allowed an exceptionally powerful spring to bring the jaws noisily together at lightning speed, so that the wicked teeth meshed with each other.

Soon afterwards, the tiger killed a milch-cow which it dragged into a ravine and concealed beneath a heap of dried leaves, without starting to feed. The kill was followed and discovered, and the trap was carefully set near the hindquarters of the cow, at which place the tiger would normally start operations when he returned for his meal. The same dried leaves that concealed the kill were used to hide the trap. The tiger returned, and to his bad luck and the future ill-fortune of others—got his head in the trap, which caught him firmly on both sides of the neck, just behind the ears.

The trap had been anchored to the ground with a stake. The tiger tore at the trap and succeeded in uprooting the stake, while the jaws held firm in his neck. He then rushed away into the jungle, dragging the heavy trap with him, till at a spot almost two miles distant the trap got itself firmly wedged between two big rocks. The tiger tried to drag itself free, but only succeeded in wedging the trap more firmly than before.

The tiger roared with pain, and struggled desperately. The roars were heard for half the night by the planter and his frightened coolies, two miles away at their plantation. Finally, the animal broke loose losing its left ear and eye in the process, with very severe injuries to the rest of the neck and face. It was heard in the area moaning with pain night and day for quite a week afterwards.

Then came a period of absolute silence. Everyone thought the tiger had died of its wounds. The planter and his hirelings kept a careful watch for vultures, who would doubtless spot the carcase and betray the whereabouts of the dead animal by swooping to earth for their meal. But the only vultures seen were those soaring in the high heavens, carefully scanning the earth below for the signs of death; but none swooped, for the very good reason that the tiger was not dead.

A fortnight passed; then one afternoon, along the path to one of the smaller coffee-estates, climbed Jeyken, a Sholaga, and his eighteen-year-old spouse. In accordance with the established Indian custom, Jeyken walked in front, with the woman about a yard behind him, carrying a sack of grain balanced on her head. They had crossed a dry streambed, and were just climbing its slight embankment, when, out of a clump of grass like sugarcane that grows only along river banks in these areas, a tiger pounced upon the girl, throwing her to the earth.

Turning, Jeyken saw his wife lying on the ground gazing at him with terror-stricken, pleading eyes. The tiger crouched upon her back, its two paws overlapping her shoulders, the wide-open mouth just above her head. It was a tiger with no left eye, and no left ear, while the wounds on its neck and face had not yet healed!

Jeyken was turned to stone. He could not move and he could not speak, but remained rooted to the spot in horror and amazement. The tiger snarled horribly, contorting its already lacerated features into a still more horrible mask. Then it grabbed the girl by her right shoulder and walked across the stream with its prey—the girl hung head downwards, her loose hair and left arm and legs dragging in the sand. A moment later, the tiger and the girl had disappeared in the jungle on the further side.

Evidentally the poor woman had swooned, or may already have died of fright. That was the last Jeyken ever saw of his wife, nor had she uttered the slightest cry, even at the moment of attack.

A month later a herd-boy was killed by a tiger within two miles of Ramapuram. In this case the half-eaten remains were found in a bush. The third human kill occurred about three weeks later, almost at the twenty-first milestone on the Kollegal-Lokkanhalli-Bailur-Dimbum road. This time it was a road-coolie, a middle-aged woman, who was attacked in full view of her companions just before five in the evening. She had stopped work for a few minutes, and had gone some yards into the jungle, when a tiger pounced upon her as if from nowhere and carried her away. She had screamed frenziedly, and those who were in the vicinity had clearly seen the tiger. It had a scarred face and no left ear or eye!

It so happened that my game licence for the North Coimbatore area had at that time expired. This area is divided into two forest divisions: North Coimbatore proper and the Kollegal Division. For although Kollegal fell within North Coimbatore district for administrative purposes, the Forest Department had recently subdivided the district into two distinct Forest Divisions. My licence, which had expired, covered North Coimbatore proper and Dimbum; while Lokkanhalli, Bailure and Ramapuram fell within the Kollegal Division. I had intended renewing my old licence, and was about to send the required fee when I read in the papers about the latest outrage committed by this tiger. That decided me, and with ten days' privilege leave at my disposal, I left Bangalore early in the morning, reaching the Forest Department office at Kollegal, eighty-seven miles away, even before it had opened for the day. It did not take me long to get the required shooting licence, and all available information regarding the tiger.

The area where the man-eater had operated was comparatively new to me, so I decided, for a start, to camp in the small forest lodge at Ramapuram, twenty-five miles away, which I reached in an hour and a half, after negotiating an extremely bumpy road.

Obviously, the first thing to do was to try and win the confidence of the inhabitants of Ramapuram by telling them I had come to try to rid them of the tiger. The people did not know me and gave somewhat garbled accounts, indicating that the tiger might be anywhere between Ponnachai Malai, where it had struck down it first victim, and Bailur, a distance of about sixty miles as the crow flies.

Bailur, as I have told you, was a small village some thirty miles from Kollegal, on the Kollegal-Lokkanhalli-Dimbum road. Thus, I could either return to Kollegal by car and motor thence to Bailur, or I could leave the car at Ramapuram and cover the third side of the triangle by walking from Ramapuram to Bailur, a distance of nearly nineteen miles. I decided to follow the latter course, as it would give me the opportunity of passing through several Forest hamlets bordering the Reserved Forest, where I hoped to get some news of the tiger.

Accordingly, at dawn next morning I left the little Forest Lodge at Ramapuram and began my walk to Bailur. The path led in a generally southwesterly direction, alternatively through sparsely cultivated country and scrub jungle, which skirted the ranges of small hills lying a couple of miles southward, within the boundaries of the Reserved Forest proper.

I passed a few hamlets, but all the inhabitants were either indoors or squatting at the entrances of their huts. Their few cattle were kraaled outside or grazed at will on the scant herbage in the immediate vicinity of the huts, for the story of the man-eater had spread far and wide and the usual scare that attends such visitations had already set in.

I walked slowly making inquiries wherever possible. Almost all the Sholagas inhabiting these hamlets reported that they had heard a tiger roaring in the vicinity, either the previous night or within the past seventy-two hours. At one spot I was shown the clear pug-marks of a tiger as it had crossed a recently ploughed field, just a hundred yards from the owner's hut. I took detailed measurements of those pugs for future reference before moving on but it soon became evident that the people in this area were either so nervous that they were making completely false and exaggerated reports, or else that an unusual number of tigers were operating along the nineteen miles between Ramapuram and Bailur. For, according to the information obtained, a tiger appeared to have visited each hamlet within the last three or four days!

At about 5 p.m. I approached Bailur, a village of some twenty huts. Here I met members of the road gang who had witnessed the killing of the woman near the twenty-first milestone. They told me what I have already recorded and particularly stressed the tiger's deformities, which they had all clearly seen while they stood rooted to the spot with terror, while the tiger made off into the undergrowth with its still-screaming victim, the road-coolie woman.

The nearest Forest department Lodge was some three-and-a-half miles farther along the motor-road in the direction of Dimbum. The Reserve lay along both sides of the road. It was now 5.30 p.m., and I knew that night would fall in an hour, so I covered those last three-and-a-half miles at a brisk pace, reaching the little Forest Bungalow shortly before dark.

The sun had gone down behind the towering range of the Biligirirangan Hills, which lay some three miles west of the bungalow, and the twilight calls of roosting peacock and junglefowl welcomed me as I sank into an old broken armchair which I dragged on to the verandah. The distant challenge of a sambar stag, descending the western range, was music to my ears as it floated across the dense valley separating the bungalow from the foothills. The myriad tree-tops of this valley were like a dark carpet in the deepening twilight.

Scarcely half-an-hour had passed before total darkness prevailed, punctuated by the incessant flicker of a million fireflies. They floated everywhere, like tiny elfin spirits in the gloom, carrying their lanterns of pinpoint brilliance to every bush tree-top in the vicinity. At rare intervals their flashes would synchronise, and the tree or bush around which they clustered would throb and pulsate to one big and unanimous flash of light, made by thousands of these little creatures. The blackness of the jungle night would disperse before a phosphorescent and ethereal glow—but only for a moment— until that rare interval of synchronisation occurred again.

I made an early night of it, sleeping on the floor of the small central room of the lodge; but at about 2 a.m., the moaning call of a tiger woke me. I heard it call at intervals as it traversed the valley, until it died away in the distance.

Early morning found me back in Bailur village, where I enlisted the help of two local shikaris and purchased three young bulls for bait. One of these we tethered in the bed of the stream that traversed the valley west of the bungalow, where I had heard the tiger calling in the night. The second was tied in a small forest-glade a bare 100 yards from the roadside, midway between the village and the Forest Bungalow. To tie the third, we walked back to the twenty-first milestone, where the road-worker had been killed. Close to this spot the road was crossed by a forest stream, known as Oddam Betta Halla; its banks were clothed with bamboo, except for a small clearing made by the Forest department, in which seedlings of various forest plants were being experimentally grown. My helpers told me that a tiger often walked through this clearing, and I found this statement to be true, in that pug-marks both old and comparatively new were visible at three different place. I examined the most recent of these imprints, and compared them with the measurements of the pug-marks taken at the hamlet on the previous day. Both sets had been made by a male tiger, but those in the departmental plantation belonged to a much older and heavier animal.

We tied the third bait on open ground just where the Oddam Betta Halla stream flows past this plantation.

When all this had been done it was 5.30 p.m., and on our return to Bailur village I was approached by a sturdy, good-looking Sholaga, who introduced himself as Jeyken, the husband of the girl who had been the man-eater's first victim. He said that a party of travellers who had passed by the coffee estate on the slopes of Ponnachai Malai, where he worked, had informed him that a Sahib had come to Ramapuram to shoot the tiger. Filled with the idea of revenge for his wife's murder, he had obtained the planter's permission to go to Ramapuram to offer me his assistance. At Ramapuram he was told that I had gone to Bailur, whither he had immediately followed me, all by himself.

I thanked Jeyken for his offer, and the trouble he had taken to find me, and immediately recruited him as my personal helper. I liked his appearance and his calm determination to leave no stone unturned to bring the tiger to book. Jeyken smiled at my acceptance and thanked me in turn, but he staunchly refused to accept any payment; indeed, he made it abundantly clear that this was the condition of his offer.

I returned to the Forest Lodge, instructing Jeyken and the other two helpers to make an early start next morning and visit the bait near the twenty-first milestone. For myself, I would visit the other two baits. This I did next morning, first visiting the bull tethered on the streambed in the valley, then the bait that was tied midway between the Forest bungalow and Bailur village. Both were unharmed and no traces of pugs were to be seen in any sand that existed near the spots where they were tied. I then walked the remaining distance to Bailur village, where I awaited the return of my three scouts; within an hour they arrived, to tell me the third bait was alive.

Leaving Jeyken and one of the Sholagas at the village, I took the second man, who claimed to be well acquainted with the forest gamepaths in that area, and walked westwards till we entered the foothills of the Biligirirangans. As all this area was unfamiliar to me, I got him to walk in front, while I covered him from the rear with my rifle ready in my hands. Sholagas are born jungle folk, and my guide showed no signs of nervousness while we threaded our way thus, in single file, up one game-path and down another, across dark nullahs, often bending double to avoid overhanging fronds of bamboo or outcrops of wait-a-bit thorn. But no signs of a fresh tiger track did we see.

A large male panther had crossed at one spot, and at another spot a female, accompanied by her cub; but it was evident that the tiger we were looking for had not passed that way.

It was nearing 3 p.m. before we got back to the Forest Lodge and a late cold lunch. The Sholaga made a fire, on which I boiled some water to brew us several cups of tea. Then I drew water from the little well in the compound, to give myself the luxury of a cold bath.

At five I returned with the Sholaga to Bailur village, where I left him with instructions for Jeyken, himself and the third Sholaga to visit the bait on the twenty-first milestone early next morning. It was well past seven by the time I got back to the bungalow. I slept soundly that night, nor did the moaning call of any tiger disturb me. Early morning found me on my way to visit the other two baits. Both were unharmed.

Returning to the Forest Lodge, I ate a frugal meal and then walked towards Bailur, carefully watching the road for pug-marks. No tiger had passed that way and 9.15 a.m. found me awaiting my henchmen. They returned before ten, this time to report that the bait had been killed and removed by a tiger, which had contrived to bite through the tethering rope.

Fortunately I had come prepared for such an eventuality and had brought my torch and other night-shooting kit with me in a haversack. Back we went as fast as we could, and shortly after midday had reached the spot where the bull had been tied. The tiger's pug-marks, in approaching the bait, were apparent in the soft earth some twenty feet away, and an examination showed that the killer was a tigress and not a tiger. From there she had launched her final attack that had killed the bull, biting through the rope by which its leg had been tied.

We could not know how far the kill had been taken, so I told my companions to wait for me by the twenty-first milestone till 3 p.m., while I would follow the drag-mark. If the dead bull had been taken for some distance, I would try to build myself a hide-out to await the return of the tigress, and would make it an all-night affair. Under such circumstances, I would not be back by three and they were to return to Bailur. On the other hand, if the tigress had dropped the kill not far away, I would return to my companions and get them to put up a proper machan.

I found the tigress had half-dragged the kill for the first two hundred yards, by which time she had got clear of the bamboo jungle that grew on the lower land and in the vicinity of the stream. Then she had encountered some heavy lantana undergrowth, which had obviously been an obstruction to her passage, encumbered as she was with the dead bull. Here she had evidently slung it over her shoulder, as tigers sometimes do to carry their kills, and it then became extremely difficult to follow the trail.

A dragging hoof, or the horns of the bull, had here and there broken a twig, and these were the only visible signs of passage. The carpet of rotting vegetation, and fallen lantana leaves, effectively did away with any hope of finding pug-marks. Necessarily, the going was also very slow, nor did I like the situation at all, as almost my whole attention had to be given to following the trail, which prevented me from being fully on my guard against a sudden attack. Finally the lantana gave way to more open forest, sprinkled liberally with trees and a carpet of the dwarf date palm.

Twice I came across the spot where the tigress had laid down her burden and then picked it up again. It was now evident that she had some particular destination in view, most probably a lair where she had cubs to whom she was taking the meat.

Up and up led the trail; the terrain became more and more rocky, till finally, in a break among the tree-trunks, I saw a hillock, perhaps a quarter-of-a-mile beyond and about 200 feet above the spot where I stood. The trail led directly toward the hillock. By now I felt reasonably certain that the animal I was following was not the man-eater, because all the data gathered about the man-eater had classed it as a tiger and not a tigress, although the sex factor was not an established certainty. As it was a known fact, however, that the man-eater had lost its left eye and ear, if I could but catch a glimpse of the animal I was following, I would soon know whether it was the right one or not.

How to catch that glimpse was the problem. The obvious answer to it was to keep advancing till we met, but it was scarcely to my liking, as even if the tigress was not the man-eater, she certainly was unlikely to welcome any human being who knocked at the door of the lair where she had her cubs.

But I went forward. The trail was now easier to follow, as the tigress had brushed against boulders and rocks, where smears of blood betrayed the passage of the dead bull.

Half the distance was covered now; the other half would bring me to the summit. The boulders lay in heaps, and the trail I was following wound in and out between them, as the tigress picked her path to avoid any part of her burden becoming jammed between the rocks. It was ten minutes to three; the sun beat down mercilessly on the bare rocks, which in turn threw the heat back in my face as from the door of a furnace. My clothes were soaked with perspiration, which ran in rivers down my face, getting into my eyes, which burned and smarted, and into the corners of my mouth. I licked my lips and I remember that almost unconsciously, in the excitement of the moment, I noted the salty taste.

My rubber boots made no sound as I negotiated the heated rocks. One corner after another was turned, and at each turn I knew what lay beyond. Then I came upon a shelving rock which met the rising ground at an angle of perhaps three hundred forming a shallow recess rather than a real cave. Two large balls of russet brown, striped with black, white underneath, were tumbling over one another in a vigorous game of 'catch-as-catch-can'. They were two tiger cubs, and they were playing!

I stopped in my tracks; the only movement being an imperceptible cocking of the rifle, with the faintest of clicks. But it was enough! Although they were only cubs, generations of instinct were behind them. They stopped playing, disentangled themselves, and looked at me in alarm.

Even now, I can picture the scene: one cub with a look of innocent surprise, and the other with its features wrinkled to emit a hiss of consternation.

That hiss was the signal for all hell to break loose, for it awoke the tigress, who was sleeping. With a series of shattering roars she dashed out of the cavern, vaulted over the cubs and came straight at me.

The distance may have been twenty yards. I covered her between the eyes as she advanced. Then five yards away she stopped; she crouched with her belly to ground, eyes blazing and mouth wide, while her roars and snarls shook the very ground on which I stood. She was a perfect specimen but certainly not the man-eater!

Wonder of wonders, she had not charged home. Her courage had failed her at the last moment. She was telling me, in the simplest of languages: 'Get out quickly, and don't harm my cubs or I will kill you.'

I was glad to oblige. Step by step, I retreated backwards, while never removing my eyes from hers, never allowing the rifle sights to waver in the slightest, my forefinger still on the trigger.

And she remained where she was! It was as if she understood that I was going. I realised at that moment that she did not want to harm me; that she was only protecting her cubs. Perhaps she was afraid. I was afraid too! But I did not want to harm her, nor destroy that lovely happy little family.

So I continued to retreat backwards. The tigress continued to roar. Now I had turned the corner of the first rock that hid her from view. Only then did I dare to take a hasty glance backwards, to see where I was walking, although I still faced towards the tigress, who had now stopped roaring, but was still growling. I knew that, as long as she continued to make those sounds I was safe; I would know where she was.

Another big boulder was passed; then I turned and beat a hasty retreat before she had time to change her mind and come after me. She stopped growling, and I knew that the real danger had come. She might have gone back to her cubs, or she might be following. I made down the hill as rapidly as possible, glancing frequently behind me. Soon I came to the trees and the date palms, then the lantana belt, up which I had so laboriously followed the trail, and finally to the bamboos and the road.

It was 4.30 p.m. and as instructed, my companions had returned to Bailur. I had nine miles to cover, and only two hours before darkness fell. Nevertheless, I sat by the roadside for five minutes to enjoy a quick smoke. I felt I deserved it. I was thankful, too, that I had not been forced to shoot the tigress, for the sight of those two cubs was still fresh in my memory.

It was past six-thirty before I reached Bailur village. There my three companions awaited me, eager to hear my story. When I had told it, they agreed that it was unusual for a tigress to have failed to press home her charge.

Darkness had set in by the time I left the little village on the last lap of my journey to the forest bungalow. But as one of our baits was tied at a point about half-way between the village and the bungalow in a glade not far from the road, it occurred to me that I would pay it a visit. Why this idea came to me, I cannot tell particularly as I had already looked at it that morning on my way to Bailur. It was an impulse, and I have spent my life responding to impulses. I turned off along the little footpath that led away from the road towards the clearing where the bait was tied. It was quite dark, except for the diffused glow from the stars that shone brightly in a clear blue-black sky. The bushes around me assumed ghostly shapes, and the wind sighed fitfully among the branches of the 'rain-tree' that bordered the road. Now and again, a large teak-leaf fluttered to the ground with the softest of sounds, like some huge moth of the night settling down to rest.

I came up to the small wild-fig tree beneath which my bait was tied. The shadows were deeper there, and the bait was, moreover, a brown one. I could not see it till I came very close, when it lumbered to its feet, as if startled at my approach, even as I was startled by its sudden action. It was still unharmed. I walked around it to the other side, to inspect the rope that held it by the hind leg, in case it had become twisted.

And at that moment the man-eater charged.

It was fortunate for me that I had moved to the other side of the bull, which consequently came between me and the tiger. But I confess that I was taken totally by surprise.

There was tremendous ' Woof from the jungle from which I had just emerged. The bull swung round. I leaped behind it, with my back to the trunk of the fig tree almost tripping over the tethering rope. A huge grey shape vaulted on to the back of the bull, which collapsed beneath the sudden weight.

But the tiger had not seized the neck or throat. It had simply leaped upon the bull in order to reach me beyond it. Luckily, in falling the bull ruined the tiger's spring, which otherwise would have followed within a split second.

The tiger was extricating itself from the heaving body of the fallen bull when my bullet smashed between its eyes. Convulsively it twisted backwards, still lying across the bull, which now staggered to its feet with the tiger over its back, the head and forequarters sagging forwards.

Automatically, and without thinking, I fired my second shot at a spot which I judged to be behind the tiger's left shoulder. The bull collapsed! The tiger rolled off the bull and towards me, as my third shot took it in the throat.

The bull never moved. The tiger kicked convulsively. And then at last all was still.

The light from the torch on the rifle revealed that my first bullet had smashed the tiger's skull. My second had been too low. The heavy .405 missile had ploughed through the end of the tiger's chest and blown a tremendous hole in the bull's side. My third bullet, a quite unnecessary one, had passed through the tiger's throat, leaving a gaping hole. But I had killed the poor bull that had unwittingly saved my life.

My hands were trembling, my knees wobbled, and suddenly I felt very, very sick. The reaction, after the events of that evening, was sudden. I sat on the ground, with may back to the fig tree, and raised my hand to my forehead, which I was surprised to find icy cold to my touch.

How long I remained thus I do not know. Then I groped for my pipe, filled and lit it. The first few puffs steadied my badly-shaken nerves and I was soon able to get back to the road and retrace my steps to Bailur Village.

I found the inhabitants gathered in the streets, agog with excitement and anticipation. For the surrounding hills had carried the sound of my three shots, which had reverberated across the valleys and stony ridges. They had guessed I had been attacked on the way to the bungalow, but were wondering whether it had been by the man-eater, or some bear or elephant.

Seeing me emerge from the gloom, they rushed forward to welcome me, my three servants well to the fore. I sat down by the roadside and told them the story. Gasps of amazement and incredulity broke from their lips, to be followed by congratulations and a fervent expression of thanks for my safety.

A 'chattie' of fresh hot milk was set before me, and a bunch of bananas. As gifts go, it was not much, but it conveyed the heartfelt thanks of the villagers.

In another half-hour practically the whole village had assembled with lanterns and kerosene torches, a stout pole and coils of rope, to bring in the tiger. Back we went to the spot and over fifty people surveyed the strange scene, their eyes wide open with amazement. Jeyken was especially pathetic to watch. With his knife he started to stab the dead tiger— to my dismay, for he was doing further damage to a skin already well-nigh ruined by my bullets. Gently, but firmly, I drew him off; then he began to weep unrestrainedly, thinking of his dead wife.

The deep-hearted weeping of a strong and brave man is not pleasant to witness; it is infectious, and I felt a strange lump rising in my own throat—a lump which refused to subside for quite a time.

Not much remains to be told, except for a strange sequel. Next morning, when coming to the bungalow, Jeyken passed the spot where I had left the road the previous night. Fifty yards further on he decided to answer a call of nature and stepped behind a star-plum bush for the purpose. There he discovered for the first time that the tiger had been lying in wait for me the previous night; evidently it had been in the vicinity, and had either seen or heard me approaching along the road.

Jeyken told me what he had discovered, and I walked back with him to check it for myself. I found what he said was true. There clearly impressed on the soft sand, were tiger's pug-marks while the soft grass and rank weeds beneath the star-plum bush were still partly flattened by the weight of the tiger's body, although more than twelve hours had passed since he had lain there in ambush, awaiting my approach.

Yet some people tell me that there is no such thing as Providence, a guiding-spirit, intuition, or a sixth sense; call it what you will. I find it more difficult to understand the disbelievers than understand Providence itself!

The Great Panther of Mudiyanoor

Mudiyanoor is the name of a small village nestling near the southeastern end of a fertile valley that lies north of the Moyar river and the frowning crags of the Blue Mountains or Nilgiri range, and south of the foothills of the smaller mountain chain known as the Biligirirangans.

This little valley comes as near as possible on this troubled earth to the elusive 'happy valleys' of fiction, or of which we dream during our restless slumbers. Certain it is that rainfall is assured, even in a season of weak monsoons, due to the abutting mountain ranges at either end. The earth is very fertile, being particularly rich in leaf-mould and a fine red loam, for it was until recent years part of the primeval forest which is slowly, but ever steadily, being pushed back by the inroads of civilisation. The climate is temperate during the days and rather chilly at night, due to the cool breezes that blow down the mountain ridges.

Most of the people of Mudiyanoor are farmers, although a few are cattle-grazers, who maintain vast herds of animals which are driven during daylight into the surrounding forest for grazing. The milk from these animals is entirely used in the manufacture of 'ghee' which is simply melted butter, and is employed for cooking throughout India. Kerosene tins, filled with this stuff, are sent up the ghat, as the winding cart-track up the hillside is called, till it meets the main road from Mysore to Satyamangalam at the little hamlet of Dimbum. There the tins of ghee are loaded on to cart—and sometimes lorries—and taken away for sale. There are good markets for it in Mysore and Satyamangalam, and particularly in the more distant town of Gobichettipalayam.

So the population is happy and prosperous. Few strangers visit the valley, because the cart-track is practically unmotorable.

The herds occasionally suffer from a marauding tiger or panther: at other times the farmers awake to find sections of their fields trampled flat by elephants which have fed there during the night. Wild pigs and deer take a moderate toll of crops, but these are considered minor calamities and are accepted as the dictates of inevitable fate.

The 'great panther' earned that name because he was quite outstandingly large. He was suspected of having come from the fastnesses of the Blue Mountains, perhaps from Anaikutty or Segur, and across the Moyar river, or Mysore Ditch as it is more commonly called. He began his depredations on the village cattle, killing in true tiger style by breaking the neck, and was therefore mistaken for that animal for some time.

Then, with increasing boldness, this panther started to harry the herds of fine milch cows that were part of my friend Hughie Hailstone's estate. This estate, the Moyar Valley Ranch, is an outstanding farm which is natural, for its owner is an outstanding character. A brilliant engineer by profession, he has the quick brain of an inventor—quick at thinking and quick at assessing values—and from his cleverness have originated many devices and mechanical improvements. In addition, Hughie is a born shikari. He loves the forest and its animals, and he is never happier than when handling, or tinkering with, a firearm. From this rare combination of mechanical genius and a love of the wild, Moyar Valley Ranch was born; for with herculean effort and skill, tenacity of purpose and the will to surmount all obstacles, Hughie literally carved his ranch out of the heart of the virgin jungle.

Mighty forest trees had to be cut down and cleared. Hughie exploited this circumstance by converting them into charcoal, which he then sold by lorry-loads to the far distant towns. Bricks, cut-stones, cement, mortar, and all the other items used in building construction had to be brought from the same places. Carpenters were also imported, who, under Hughie's able directions, soon utilised the better forest-woods for building purposes. A modern building rose in no time. With a windmill battery-charger, the house had electric lighting, a refrigerator and many up-to-date conveniences. In addition, farm machinery was imported, so that in almost the twinkling of an eye Moyar Valley Ranch became a flourishing farmstead.

Hughie has many business interests and frequently travels abroad. Sometimes he returns in a few weeks, but at others he is absent for months, and the following story concerns one of his long absences. He had very kindly offered me the privilege of visiting his farm at any time, and has especially asked me to keep a watchful eye on his livestock. So one day, when we received a letter from Hugh's caretaker, a man named Varghese, that the big panther had killed Hugh's finest Alsatian, something had to be done.

At that time I was immersed in some heavy and urgent work and it was impossible to get away for the next fortnight. Varghese's letter, having travelled by village post, had already taken six days to reach us. But my son Donald volunteered to deal with the panther, and I gladly delegated this job to him. The Studebaker had broken an axle a month earlier and I was still awaiting a replacement from Bombay, so Donald rushed off to his friend's house to borrow a car.

From this point I feel I had better let Donald relate the rest of the story himself, as I took no further part in the affair, beyond giving him a piece of my mind when he returned from the expedition.

'When Dad told me to go to Mudiyanoor, the first problem was to find a car to travel by, as his Studebaker was laid up. So I thought of a friend who had been with me at school, named Rustam Dudhwala. Rustam is a nice fellow and owns three or four cars. So with a bit of sales talk I had no difficulty in getting him interested. It took me just four hours to get together the odds and ends necessary for the trip, and to borrow Dad's lucky tiger-charm, which was given to him years ago by a jungle man named Budhia. I know Dad does not talk about this charm, as he thinks people will make fun of him, but I also know that he appears to have much faith in it. The charm is actually wrapped in a small piece of bamboo, tied with a strand of hair from an elephant's tail. What is inside it I do no know. The whole thing can be worn around the neck, as the bamboo is tied to a piece of string, but Dad generally stuffs it into his pocket.

'Just before leaving I thought of taking another friend along with me, a fellow named Cedric Bone, who is a keen photographer and good sport, and can rough it out splendidly. Cedric was ready to come, and soon the three of us were on our way to Mudiyanoor. I carried my .423 Mauser, which is a far superior weapon to Dad's old-fashioned .405 Winchester. He knows this himself, but like all old-fashioned people prefers to stick to something that is out of date. I also brought my .3006 Springfield as a reserve rifle for shooting deer for the pot. My old man lectures me against killing deer and I pretend to listen to him. When he is around, of course, such killing is taboo; but when he is not there it is quite a different matter.

'The last seventeen miles of the track to Mudiyanoor is really bad, and it took us almost eight hours to get there. Varghese greeted me with a broad smile, although I felt he was a little disappointed because Dad had not come along. That is the trouble nowadays. Young people like me are often not appreciated and the older men seem to regard us as being somewhat irresponsible. They forget that they too were young once.

'Anyhow, Varghese told us that, apart from village cattle, the big panther had also killed a cow belonging to Mr. Hailstone three days ago. The immediate problem was therefore to buy some live bait in the form of half-grown bulls, and for this purpose Rustam came in very handy.

'Let me tell you something about this Rustam. He is twenty-two years old and a Parsee, which community are the descendants of early Persian settlers in India. He comes of a very rich family, who owns lakhs of rupees worth of property in Bombay, bringing in enough income in a single day to buy me several times over. Apart from this, Rustam's Dad is a shrewd businessman, who earns an income even larger than what comes in each month from the property. He is a very sporting chap and very fond of his son, but sometimes he gets unreasonably strict about letting Rustam go shooting. When that happens, Rustam and I generally contrive to invite my father to visit Mr. Dudhwala, for when these old men meet and talk things over for an hour or two, our hunting trip is assured.

'Well, to return to what I was telling you. Rustam bought four young bulls, which we tied out in different places near where the big panther had recently killed. The first of these we tied near the forest boundary line which runs beside Mr. Hailstone's estate. The second we tied about a quarter of a mile away, near a small lake surrounded by heavy bamboo jungle. The third we tied on the outskirts of Mudiyanoor village proper, and the last on the cart track itself, coming into Mudiyanoor. Dad always makes a practice of setting up his machan along with the baits; but as Varghese had offered the use of Mr. Hailstone's portable machan, I decided to set mine up only after a kill had occurred.

'We took care to secure our baits by tying the hind legs to stout stakes driven into the ground, for it is a mistake to pass a rope around the neck of a live bait. Sometimes panthers, and tigers especially, are reluctant to attack an animal with a rope around its neck. They kill by grabbing the neck, and they feel suspicious of a rope, which would get in their way.

'At the last moment Varghese informed us that a tiger had been calling in the vicinity of the bungalow for the past two days. So as an afterthought, instead of a rope I used Mr. Hailstone's chain for securing the bait tied on the forest line near his bungalow. This was because I felt that if the tiger killed this bull he might break the rope and carry it away. As there were no other chains, the other three baits had to remain roped.

'Rustam wanted to go shooting wild pig that night in the fields around Mudiyanoor village, but I stopped him, as a shot might disturb the panther. Next morning, all four of our baits were alive and we were disappointed. But shooting is a game of patience, as Dad has taught me, so I told Rustam to be quiet and not expect developments for another day or two. On the third night the big leopard killed the bull tied on the forest line near the bungalow. It so happened that the tiger also killed the second bait tied among the bamboos near the forest pool the same night.

'Now I was faced with a problem. "Damn the panther," I said to myself "I will get the tiger." But there were other circumstances to be considered: Rustam reminded me that my purpose there was to shoot the panther which had killed Mr. Hailstone's livestock. It was my business, therefore, to sit up for the panther. I knew that he was right and that Dad would say the same. Still, it seemed a bit thick to lose the opportunity of sitting up for the tiger, and I tried hard to persuade Rustam to take on the panther. But he has some of his father's business instincts, and clung to his previous arguments. So, realising I was cornered, I had to give in.

'Cedric elected to come and sit up with me, as he felt that there were more chances of seeing the big panther by being with me, than of seeing the tiger by going with Rustam. He thought Rustam would make too much noise and would drive away the tiger before it ever appeared at the kill.

'So I got to work and had Mr. Hailstone's portable machan hung in the tree that grew about thirty yards from the dead bull. Rustam, for his part, got the villagers to erect a machan in a tree that grew close to where the other bull had been killed by the tiger. I forgot to mention that, in tying all these four baits, I had taken the precaution of tying them close to trees, so that there would be no trouble later in erecting machans.

'Both parties left the bungalow at about 4 p.m. Rustam had a longer distance to cover, so he and Varghese, complete with sandwiches, water bottle, torches, warm mufflers, blankets and what not, started off at a brisk pace. Cedric and I strolled along to the forest line with our packet of food and a single water bottle. We felt blankets were unnecessary as the weather appeared to be warm.

'Sitting in any machan is a tiresome business, and I always find it difficult to remain still. My old man has told me many a time that sitting like a graven image is absolutely essential, but how he does it I don't know. I have sat with him often and his style is to fold his legs beneath him, settle himself very comfortably, smoke his pipe, drink a little tea from a flask, and then become a graven image for the rest of the night. But all sorts of things happen to me. I get pins and needles in my feet, my back feels stiff and begins to ache, and the mosquitoes worry me considerably: not only do they bite me, but they find their way into my ears and nose and the only method of getting rid of one is to wait till it settles down to feed, and then give it a smart slap. Dad tells me that this is not the thing to do when on a machan; but perhaps he forgets that my blood, being young, is probably more attractive to the mosquitoes than his. You will understand, I am sure, that old men take quite a delight in telling younger people what not to do.

'Anyhow, by the time it grew dark at seven o'clock, these mosquitoes were already very busy on both Cedric and myself. I had already told Cedric to abstain from slapping mosquitoes, which was probably why he nudged me, once or twice, when I did so myself.

Time passed, and then, at about a quarter to eight, we saw a longish object, that looked grey in the darkness, appear as if from nowhere. I must explain that, although there was no moon, there was a diffused glow all around from the stars that always seem to twinkle much brighter in a forest. There was enough light, at least, to show up the bigger trees and this grey object, but not the dead bull, which happened to be black. Well, the grey apparition moved towards where the bull lay, and shortly after we heard the rattle of the chain, followed by the sound of eating, and the crunching of bones. Slowly, I raised my rifle to my shoulder, but as luck would have it, my torch, which was fixed to the rifle barrel, struck against the tree and made the slightest of noises. There was a loud growl from the direction of the kill and the same grey object began walking across the forest line towards my left. Soon it disappeared, and then, after about ten minutes, reappeared to my right, but almost beneath us. I heard the sound of licking, and it seemed that the panther was seated there on its haunches. This time I got the rifle levelled properly and pressed the switch of my torch. The bright beam lit the panther, sitting on the ground in a dog-like attitude, hardly twenty yards away, It looked up at me, and taking a quick sight, I pressed the trigger. My best friend, the .432, roared, and the panther fell over sideways. I thought it was done for, but then it suddenly picked itself up again and sprang into the forest below the tree where we were sitting.

'Cedric had been very excited while all this was happening, for no sooner did the panther disappear than he prepared to climb down. I restrained him, and he said, "Come, let's go after it". But I told him not to be a fool and that we had better wait till morning.

'We sat there for nearly another hour. The mosquitoes became so unbearable that we decided to get down and return to the bungalow. I descended first, and Cedric handed me the rifle. Then he followed with the water bottle. The last six feet he took at a jump, and as he hit the ground with a thud there was an awful roar from very near. I swung around, pointing my rifle, with the torch burning, in the direction of the sound, but we could see nothing. After waiting for some minutes, we went forward a few paces, but the lantana undergrowth was very dense here and it seemed unsafe to follow up in the darkness. We then went to the spot where the panther had been seated when I fired, and began to look around for blood.

'There were no traces to be seen by the light of the torch and the alarming idea occurred to me that perhaps I had made a complete miss. I discussed the matter in undertones with Cedric, but he was certain that my bullet had struck the panther. Still, I was doubtful and we eventually decided to go back to the machan, on the very slim chance that I might have missed and the panther might later return to its kill.

'The rest of the night was extremely uncomfortable, what with the mosquitoes and the intense cold that began to set in with the early hours of the morning. We stuck it out, however, and dawn found us a very dejected and disappointed pair. We climbed down from the tree and stretched out in the green grass below it for nearly an hour, in order to give the sun a chance to rise, and to relax our stiffened muscles. Then, shortly after seven, we began to look for blood tracks in earnest. In a little while I was heartened to find a few drops where the panther had entered the lantana, and then quite a considerable amount at a spot about forty yards inside the undergrowth. It was now quite evident that he had been badly hit and had lain down here; also that it was he who had growled so loudly the previous night, when Cedric had jumped down from the tree. In fact one realised that the panther had not driven home a charge at the time and caught us napping.

'Cedric photographed the spot. He is one of those camera-enthusiasts who take photos of practically anything and everything.

'I found that from this point a blood trail was visible for upwards of another hundred yards. Within this distance he had lain down once more, which confirmed the fact that he had been badly hit. Then the blood trail became less distinct, probaly because fat, or a piece of membrane, had covered the bullet hole and stopped the external bleeding.

'The undergrowth was fairly dense and we searched carefully everywhere, but there was no panther to be found. The forest line continued, and I walked along the edge of it, peering into the lantana in the hope of seeing the beast.

'I had gone perhaps another hundred yards, Cedric following with his camera at about twenty paces, keeping to the open of the forest line, when it suddenly happened. Evidently the panther had been lying concealed beneath a bush on the opposite side of the clearing and had escaped my notice. He waited till I had passed and then, with a characteristic coughing grunt, he charged me. Cedric was almost level with the place where the panther had been hiding, and how it had not seen him and charged him, instead of me, is a mystery and very lucky for Cedric. Probably the panther was too busy watching me and preparing to make his surprise attack. Anyhow, he charged, but hearing that coughing grunt, I sprang around in time to see him coming. Fortunately, my bullet of the night before had smashed his right foreleg, which dragged as he came on.

'Throwing my rifle to my left shoulder—from which I shoot—I pressed the trigger and sent the bullet crashing into his throat. He lurched forward on to his chest, still snarling vigorously, and this gave me time to put in a second shot.

'Only then did I notice that Cedric was close behind, and was fairly dancing with excitement. He had been in my direct line of fire, and I might have shot him instead of the panther. But this incredible enthusiast had actually taken a photo of the charge. How Cedric had the nerve to take it, when ninety-nine men out of a hundred, completely unarmed as he was, would have turned tail and fled, beats me. It only goes to show that an enthusiasm for photography enabled him to forget everything else. He tells me he just aimed the camera and depressed the shutter mechanically, without thinking what he was doing.

'When we returned to the bungalow to tell the good news, we found that Rustam and Varghese had already come back, having sat up till about 2 a.m. The mosquitoes had by this time got the better of them, and as the tiger had not put in an appearance, Rustam and his companion had decided to call it a day, and get back to the bungalow for a nap.

'We carried the panther in by nine o'clock and had skinned him in about an hour. It proved to be quite a large male, measuring 7'8" from nose to tail.

'After an early lunch, I suggested to Rustam that we should go and see about the bull over which he had sat. I must not forget to tell you that, in the meantime, Varghese had sent out men to see what had happened to the third and fourth animals. These men returned to inform us that both were still alive.

'When we reached Rustam's machan, we found that the tiger had returned to its kill, probably in the early hours of the morning after Rustam had got down. Perhaps it had been watching, and had come to know that he was up there. Later when the coast was clear, it had come back for a late meal. About three-quarters of the bull had been devoured.

'Rustam was extremely disappointed, but was determined to sit up again. Then I had an inspiration. Wisely, or unwisely, I sent Varghese with one of the men to fetch our fourth bait, which had been tied on the track approaching Mudiyanoor village. It took about two hours to bring this animal, and we tethered it about thirty paces from the remains of the old kill. My hope in doing this was that the tiger might be induced to attack it, in case he hesitated to return to the old kill, which had been dead for two days and was stinking horribly. Rustam opposed this plan, because he felt that the tiger would be frightened away by finding a live bull where he had left a dead one the day before. But I felt the chance was worth taking.

'At about 5.30 p.m., the three of us, Rustam, Cedric and myself, got into the machan , having already arranged fresh green leaves for concealment, those of the previous night having been withered by the heat. Rustam was to have the first shot, and I would follow up. Cedric had fitted a flash bulb and reflector to his beloved camera, in the hope of securing another exciting photograph.

'With the approach of dusk myriads of insects of all kinds came from the nearby pool to make our existence a torture. But we were young and extremely keen. Rustam had long been waiting for an opportunity to shoot a tiger.

'Eight o'clock came, then nine and ten, but a little later we heard the moaning call of the tiger, as it descended a hillside beyond the pool about a mile way. About forty-five minutes passed, when a kakar gave forth its hoarse call from the denseness of the bamboos to our left. It was clear the tiger was coming, and we were all keyed up with intense excitement.

'We waited. It was much darker here than it had been at my machan of the night before, because of the bamboos. I whispered to Rustam to wait till the tiger either attacked the live bull or came back to its old kill, when I would use my torch to help him aim. Fortunately, the live bull was a white one, and we could see it faintly, and hear it snorting and struggling, as it tried to free its leg from the tethering rope. It was clear that the creature must have had some inkling of the approaching danger and its ultimace fate.

'There was a silence for ten minutes. Then there was a deep "Woof" and the tiger sprang on to the live bull. Rustam was trembling like an aspen with suppressed excitement, but I gripped his shoulder firmly to keep him quiet. There followed a hoarse gurgle from the bull, and a sharp snapping sound as the vertebrae of its neck cracked and the carcase thudded to earth.

'I maintained my grip on Rustam's shoulder. Another period of silence followed for almost ten minutes, before the tiger began to bite the rear of the bull in its first operations to tear out and remove the entrails.

'Still we waited, and then we heard the scratching sound made by the tearing of membrane as the tiger started to pull out the bull's intestines. I judged that by now its attention would be fully occupied by its kill; so gently releasing my grip on Rustam's shoulder, I nudged him to prepare for the shot.

'He raised his rifle, as I did mine. After about ten seconds I pressed the button of my torch. As the beam shot forth, the tiger, which had been lying on its kill sideways to us, turned around and looked up. At the same moment Rustam switched on his torch too, and in the two beams the tiger was distinctly visible as he stared back. Seconds passed, and I began to wonder whether Rustam was going to fire. Then, just as I was about to press my trigger, the roar of the double-barrelled .405/400 rent the night.

'Rustam had fired both barrels simultaneously, and the kick from the heavy weapon must have been considerable; I felt him lurch violently backwards. Nevertheless, both bullets had sped true to their mark, smashing into the tiger's neck just above the shoulder. The animal shook violently and then sank forward, just as if it was going to sleep. The tail twitched a few times and then was still. Rustam had shot his first tiger.

'We waited for another half-hour, but there was no movement from the animal; so we got down from the machan, still keeping the torch focused on the tiger. But it never stirred. It was evident that the tiger was dead. Upon examination, Rustam was jubilant at finding he had killed a fine male, which measured 9'4" from nose to tail-tip.

'And so we returned to Bangalore, an extremely happy party. Rustam had got his tiger, and I had succeeded in killing the panther that had been harassing Mr. Hailstone's animals. But of the three of us I think Cedric Bone was the happiest at having taken a marvellously lucky photograph and a marvellously lucky escape from what would have been a severe mauling, if not a painful death, had the panther attacked him instead of me.

'I told Dad the story, and he congratulated both of us. But he never at that time realised the narrowness of Cedric's escape from the panther, as well as from my rifle bullet.

'Next day, when he saw the photograph, he started to say a lot of uncomplimentary things. At the time I felt he was rather harsh and quite unreasonable; but, as I think of it now, the old man was right.

'I had made two major mistakes. Firstly, I had not looked carefully enough in the undergrowth, and had passed the panther without seeing it. Secondly in my excitement I had fired with a human being directly in my line of fire, and about twenty paces away. They say fortune favours the beginner, and it certainly was so in this case.'

The Mauler of Rajnagara

At the moment of telling this story (november 1995), the 'mauler' is still alive, having defeated every effort I made to 'bag' him. And not only my own efforts, but those of several other hunters over a period of rather more than two years.

The mauler is altogether an unusual tiger, in that his habits are very un-tigerish and his haunts are in areas where no tiger has been heard of for many years. His habits are untigerish in that the earlier records of his activities were entirely confined to mauling men by scratching them with his forefeet. There were thirty-three instances of such attacks by this tiger, his victims being mainly herdsmen. In not a single case did he either bite or kill his victim. In every case he severely scratched the man from the crown of his head, down his face and neck, and across his chest and back.

This conduct at first led me to think that the so-called tiger was really a 'panther' after all. But when at a later stage I questioned several of his victims, every one of them affirmed that it was a tiger and not a panther that had attacked him.

I was also led to think that the animal had been wounded or otherwise injured in some part of its jaw, mouth, or face, so that he could not drive home his attack by biting his victim. This theory was entirely refuted by the herdsmen, who stated that during two years, the same tiger had killed and eaten over two hundred of their cattle. They had examined many of these kills after the event, and in no case was any evidence found that the tiger had been unable to use his teeth properly. He had not only killed his prey in regular tiger fashion by breaking its neck, but had eaten each animal in a very normal and thorough manner.

The next strange thing about this animal was that he had begun his depredations in a most un-tigerish stretch of the forest, consisting of low scrub and thorn: very rocky, undulating hillocks with occasional steep boulder-strewn rivulets between them, flanked by long grass and occasional clumps of bamboo. It was known that panthers frequently roamed this area, and had even been seen on the main road that ran through it; but a tiger was unknown to the existing generation.

This stretch of forest lies immediately to the south of the Dimbum escarpment in the district of North Coimbatore. A sharp drop of over 2,500 feet from Dimbum brings you to this region of arid scrub land, dotted with frequent palm trees, and consisting mostly of thorny bushes and lantana shrub. Other game is also scarce, being confined to a few peafowl and an occasional jungle sheep. The area is comparatively small, being about five miles from north to south, and about thirty miles from east to west, where it adjoins the Bhavani river, which eventually flows into the river Cauvery.

We are told that this tiger had originally come from the Nilgiri jungles, had wandered down to the Moyar river and then taken its abode in this region. Its fondness for this locality can otherwise be well understood, for it is an area scattered with small cattle-patties, and entirely devoted to grazing hundreds of cattle. Hence, what it lacks in natural wild game is more than balanced by the large number of domestic animals, which are much easier prey to any tiger.

The story goes that at the earlier stages the tiger killed normally, ate his kills normally, and decamped normally, when he was 'shooed' off his kills by enraged herdsmen. But, as the old proverb says, 'too much of anything is good for nothing'! Or, at least, this tiger seemed to think so. The herdsmen evidently made themselves too much of a nuisance to him, when too frequently they drove him off his kills.

The first attack, as is usually the case, was made on a herdsboy who had had the temerity to throw a stone at him, just as he was in the act of dragging away a fine fat cow he had killed. The stone is reported to have struck the tiger's flank; the tiger is reported to have dropped the cow and charged the boy, whom he severely scratched about the face and chest. Then he went back and carried off the cow, which he thereafter ate in peace.

On several later occasions herdsmen and boys tried to drive him off the beasts he had killed, or was in the act of carrying off, or was actually eating. In each case the tiger attacked and scratched the intruder.

Naturally, as such attacks multiplied, he was left more and more alone. He was evidently a very wise tiger and had arrived at the sensible conclusion that it paid him high dividends to scratch but not to kill the intruders; for they thereafter left him more and more to devour his kill untroubled.

And so time dragged on. Nearly two years had passed and the victims of his scratching rose to thirty-three. Of these eleven died of subsequent blood poisoning, arising from the putrid matter in the tiger's claws. But these deaths, of course, may not be regarded as intentionally caused by the tiger himself. They were only an indirect consequence of the attack.

And then, in July 1955, the first human being failed to return. It was known that he had been attacked by the tiger, for his screams for help had conveyed this information to another herdsman, who had been standing near. This individual, very naturally, had run away. In the earlier instances, the victims had generally managed to stagger back to the main road or to the cattle village, whichever happened to be nearer. But this victim did not return. Some two hours later a search party set out to look for him. They came to the spot where the attack had been made. This time they found the dead cow, but they did not find the herdsman. The party lacked the courage to follow up any further, and the herdsman was never seen again.

A half-dozen more attacks were made, in three of which the victims turned up as usual, badly scratched. But the remaining three did not. Nor were they ever seen again. So the official score, at the time my story really starts, amounted to four killings and thirty-six maulings; the mauling, in every case, only by scratching. Whether the tiger actually ate these four men it had presumably killed, or only dragged them off to some remote part of the jungle, where they had been later devoured by jackals, hyaenas and vultures, there was no means of knowing.

I had read, now and then in the papers, of this animal's doings but had no details until an official report reached me from the forest authorities. Also at about this time I had a few days' leave to my credit and thought it would be best spent in seeing if I could catch up with this tiger.

The forest map I possessed, together with the information received, indicated that the best place at which to make my headquarters would be the small village of Rajnagara, where there was a little forest 'choultry' that would give me and my belongings shelter. This place, via Dimbum, is exactly 147 miles from Bangalore, and the road being quite good, I reached it in my Studebaker in just over four hours time, at about four in the evening.

I had no idea that an exciting time was ahead of me, for I was only two miles from Rajnagara itself, and was driving along the road through the arid scrub area, when I saw three men in front of me, one of them being supported by the other two. As I drew abreast of them, I saw that the man in the middle was covered with blood. Stopping to enquire the reason, I was told that only a few minutes earlier he had been attacked and severely scratched by this strange tiger. Closer questioning elicited the fact that the tiger had attacked him after creeping up on him by stealth. The victim told me that, before he knew he was in any danger, he had heard a low growl; then the tiger appeared beside him, reared up on its hind feet and scratched him severely about his face and chest. He had fallen down with the tiger on top of him, and had shouted for help. The tiger then left him and charged the cattle, which were milling around. As he lay bleeding on the ground, he had seen the tiger kill a half-grown brown bullock, which it had then dragged away. As nobody had come to his assistance, he had struggled to his feet and stumbled towards the road, still shouting for help. His two companions had joined him a little later.

I regarded the opportunity as godsend, to be followed up at once, and asked him to tell his companions the exact locality where the attack had taken place. He did so, and I then asked for one of the men to accompany me to the spot, while the other went on to Rajnagara with the victim.

A heated altercation now took place between them, both pleading urgent business at the village. It was clearly apparent that neither wanted to expose himself to the risk of meeting the tiger. For this I could hardly blame them, as the animal had already established his ferocity, while I was a complete stranger to them. They had absolutely no guarantee that I would not run away when the tiger showed up, and leave my companion in its clutches.

By much pleading, coercion and even threats, I eventually induced one of the men, very reluctantly, to agree to come with me, while the other continued with the wounded man.

My companion and myself then left the road and walked into the jungle. All along the path we came on splashes of blood from the recently wounded man. In crossing a bare stretch of rock these were plentiful, causing me to realise that he had been more severely hurt than I had actually noticed during my hurried conversation. I began to think that I should have taken him in my car to Satyamangalam, where there was a hospital, rather than leave the poor fellow to get there as best he could. Against this admitted negligence on my part, however, was the fact that I had a unique opportunity to meet this tiger face to face and settle the score once and for all.

A little later we came to the spot where the tiger had attacked the man. The sand on the trail clearly told its own story. We began to look around for the place where the tiger had killed the brown bullock, and soon found it some thirty yards away. My companion now refused to go any further, nor did I want him to, as he was understandably in a state of abject fear and would be much more a liability than an asset. So I left him standing nervously and began to follow the dragmark clearly made by the tiger as he had hauled the brown bull downhill towards the ravine that lay between the hillock down which I was creeping, and another and much higher hillock a quarter of a mile away.

Unfortunately, I had not anticipated such early action, and was wearing ordinary leather shoes instead of the rubber-soled boots I favoured for stalking. Try as I would, these shoes made some noise on the hard ground and the rocky boulders that were scattered there.

Nevertheless I proceeded as silently as I could, till I had almost reached the nullah. Then I stopped and gazed about me. The scrub just here was very thick, and grew thicker where the rivulet was actually winding. My eyes roved over the slopes of the opposite hillock, which were fairly open. No signs of the tiger or the bullock were visible, and it was obvious that he must have hidden it somewhere in the nullah, and most probably would be eating it at that very moment. Even if he was not actually eating it, he would certainly be lying somewhere in the vicinity.

My shoes put me at a distinct disadvantage, and would betray my further progress towards that nullah. If I removed them and attempted to advance in my stockinged feet, I was almost certain to step on a thorn, not to speak of the sharp stones that lay everywhere. At the same time, I realised the opportunity was too good to be lost, and should be pressed home somehow. It was a chance in a thousand, which I might never get again. The time was just 5 p.m., and there was an hour and a half before sunset.

While I stood debating the odds, the tiger made the first move. He had quite obviously heard me; probably he had seen me too. Anyhow he had, after the manner of a great general, decided to make a flank attack. Quite unsuspected by me, he had already crept up the very slope down which I was moving, but at a slightly different angle, which brought him above and behind the spot where I stood thinking. Then he had evidently crept on his belly towards me, and was hiding behind a large bush, scarcely ten feet away, all unknown to me. In this particular case, my sixth sense of impending peril quite failed to register. I had just decided to advance towards the nullah, when there was a shattering roar behind me, and the tiger sprang out; I spun around and fired at point-blank range, missing him completely.

Probably the noise of the explosion, perhaps the strangeness of meeting someone who was obviously not a herdsman, or maybe rather the loud scarlet-and-blue check bush-coat I happened to be wearing, scared him off. For with a series of loud "Woofs' he bounded into the thicket and towards the nullah. I followed as fast as I could, reaching the bed of the nullah, where I almost fell over the brown bull. Examination showed that the tiger had already begun his meal before he had heard or sensed my approach, and had come forward on his own to the attack.

There were no trees in the vicinity, so I sat under the thick bush till it began to grow dark, hoping against hope that the tiger might put in a second appearance. But this he did not do, and at 6.15 I cautiously retraced my steps the way I had come. Reaching the place where I left the herdsman who had accompanied me, I found him missing and concluded he had gone home. So I went on to the road where my Studebaker stood, and shortly after reached Rajnagara.

Here a considerable crowd had gathered, and from a forest guard who was among them I found that the wounded herdsman had already proceeded to Satyamangalam hospital, together with his wife and brother. The herdsman who had accompanied me, whom I had left standing at the spot where the tiger had made his attack, while I had followed up the drag-mark alone, had failed to return.

I knew that he had not been at the place where I had left him, also that the tiger had run away after I had missed it. Where had the herdsman gone? We all realised that he would not remain in the jungle, or on the road, in a vicinity haunted by this tiger. What had become of him? I pondered this question, while his wife and family, who were also among the crowd and had overheard my enquiries, began to weep and wail.

It was now quite dark, and to search for the missing man would be impossible, as no traces would be visible had the tiger taken him away. Nevertheless, calling the forest guard to accompany me, I drove back to the spot where I had earlier left the car. Here we halted for a while, and I instructed the guard to call the man by name. This produced no results. We drove a further mile along the road and then returned to the village. By now it was evident to me that my companion of the evening before had been taken by the tiger. Evidently, while I had spent an hour sitting in the nullah, watching for the tiger to return to the carcase of the brown bull, the tiger had done some hunting on his own, and had carried off the unfortunate herdsman.

We did not get much sleep that night, having to listen to the weeping and wailing of the man's family, who squatted at the door of the forest choultry and amidst tears, reminded me that I was responsible for his death. This though impinged itself on my conscience very forcibly, for had I not almost forced the poor man to accompany me he would have been alive at that moment.

Early dawn found me retracing my steps to the spot where I had left him. Reaching it, I began looking around for any signs of struggle or other marks of the tiger's attack. Absolutely nothing was visible on the hard ground.

In the course of my search I walked around in ever widening circles, but still could find nothing. What had become of him was a mystery. I knew he had not followed me while I had pursued the tiger the previous evening. It was more likely that, being afraid of standing alone, he had begun to walk back towards the road. Working on this theory, I now turned back and slowly retraced my steps, looking around for possible traces.

About three hundred yards from where I had left him I found the first evidence in the form of an odd leather sandal, and not far away its fellow. At this spot short dry grass covered the ground and so no footprints were visible. But the position of the sandals made it clear to me that he had kicked them off, obviously in order to run faster. Searching around as I walked, I then saw something white flapping in the breeze under a bush to my left. It was the man's loincloth in India known as a 'dhoti'. On the grass, and sprinkled on the bushes, were tiny splashes of blood, while closer inspection showed where the tiger had dashed through the undergrowth and caught up with its victim. From here the tiger had dragged the man in a course almost parallel with the road, towards the same nullah in which I had been sitting all the while the evening before, but considerably further down from where he had hidden the brown bull.

I must have walked a quarter of a mile before eventually stepping on to the rocky bed of this rivulet. Nothing was to be seen and here was complete silence. I knew the tiger must have hidden the remains somewhere in the vicinity.

While watching quietly, a couple of magpies attracted my attention from a spot about one hundred yards downstream. They were perched on the top of a thorny babul tree, where they were jabbering excitedly, frequently looking downward. The signs of the jungle are very clear to those who can read them. The magpies had either found the body, or were looking at the tiger, who in turn was probably looking at me.

Keeping to the centre of the nullah, I began to tiptoe forward, the rubber boots I was wearing this time making no noise against the rocks. Halfway to the babul tree, the magpies saw me, ceased their jabbering and flew off.

I had marked the spot where they had been perched, and approached cautiously. Immediately below the babul tree, a small elongated black rock jutted from the bank on to the bed of the stream, and lying behind this rock were the half-eaten remains of poor Muniappa, the missing man. Soft sand at the spot also revealed the tiger's pug-marks, and a cursory examination of them showed that the animal was a male tiger of no great size or build.

Once again, there was no tree in the vicinity on which I could sit, except the aforementioned babul, which was unusable because of its thorny nature. Nor, as it happened, were there any large bushes or bamboo clumps under which I could shelter. In every way the spot was about the most unfavourable, if not impossible, one for 'sitting up' that I had ever encountered. Still, I would have to do something about it for by this time there was absolutely no doubt in my mind that I was, at least indirectly, possibly directly, the cause of poor Muniappa's death.

I knew the tiger was not likely to return to his meal until the afternoon at the earliest. If I left the body as it was, the vultures would see it within a couple of hours and pick it clean. So I removed the khaki coat I was wearing and spread it over the corpse, weighing it down here and there with small boulders that lay at hand. Then I went back to the car and returned to Rajnagara.

Here I was forced to give the bad news, which not only led to renewed wailing, but a demand from the bereaved wife that the body of her husband be brought back at once for cremation. It took us a full hour to persuade her to give me a chance, that evening, for a shot at the tiger by sitting over the body, a chance which would be entirely lost if she had her way. Eventually, she very grudgingly assented.

After breakfast, I called a 'Council of War', which consisted of the village Patel, the forest guard and myself. Explaining to them the position in which I had left the body, I told them that I would return to it at noon and sit beside the body to wait the tiger's return. They thought this was a foolish idea, and I heartily concurred. But as nobody could suggest a better one, there was no alternative but to carry it out, other than to bring the remains back to the village and thereby lose a possible shot at the tiger.

Shortly after midday found me seated a few yards from the cadaver, from which a distinctly unpleasant odour was now rising. In fact, millions of bluebottles had already settled on my coat, and as soon as I removed it they swarmed over the remains.

I was prepared for the unpleasant situation, having plugged small wads of cotton wool into my nostrils; but despite these measures that awful stench penetrated my defences, and in time I began to feel sick. The heat was terrible. The silence was absolute, except for the chirruping of the cicadas from the branches of the surrounding bushes.

Three o'clock passed, then four and then five. At five-thirty a peacock flapped down to the streambed. As I sat motionless he had not even noticed me, which goes to confirm how invaluable absolute stillness is when out in a forest. He walked up the bed and only when ten feet away did he become aware of the two strange objects before him. He rose into the air, hurriedly and heavily, with a tremendous beating of his wings to gain momentum before he was able to fly away.

As may be imagined, I was by this time in a state of great excitement, and even greater fear, and I was, besides, on the verge of retching from the awful stench that rose from the half-eaten man.

Then followed complete silence for fifteen minutes: a silence that was all-pervading, that envelops one, that is everywhere, even in the very air. There was not even the creak of the wood-cricket, nor the twitter of the tiniest bird, nor even the faintest rustle of a dry leaf falling to the ground. Only a total and absolute stillness. That is what silence feels like, when one sits waiting for a man-eater to appear.

Although I was sitting perfectly motionless, my eyes minutely searched the scrub before me and on either side. All my senses were fully and painfully alert. But no sight nor sound registered on them.

The cheery evening crow of a junglecock, a little further up the nullah, relieved the tension. Six o'clock came, and then six-fifteen. An early nightjar began his peculiar clucking call. I knew that the time had come for me to leave. In a short while it would be completely dark, and then to sit for the man-eater in the open would be suicide indeed.

Getting stiffly to my feet, I walked back to the car, where I had previously arranged for a party of men to meet me and bring back the remains of the unfortunate Muniappa. It was quite dark by the time I collected them. But I knew my torchlight and their numbers would render us immune from any attack by the tiger. We returned to the ravine, where we gathered up all that remained of the unlucky herdsman in an old blanket which the men had brought with them for the purpose. Then, while the little procession wended its way towards Rajnagara, I motored back along the road.

Early next day found me again prowling about near the little nullah. The tiger had not returned to the spot where the body had been, as I could see by the absence of tracks. I then decided to walk along the bed of this stream towards the place where the brown bull had been left two days previously. I did this very cautiously, as the stream bed narrowed in places to hardly more than six feet and at points was nothing more than a pile of boulders or was entirely overgrown with lantana shrub. The brown bull had been hidden more than half a mile from where the man had been eaten. It had been hidden well beneath an overhanging bush I knew was safe from vultures. But when I reached it, it was only to find that the tiger had returned during the night and demolished it completely. Perhaps he had lost interest in his human kill or may have seen me earlier in the evening, sitting beside it, and become suspicious. Anyhow, the fact was that no kill remained and I would have to try other means of meeting the tiger.

Up till noon that day, and again in the evening I roamed about over hillocks and through valleys, across other streams and along their beds. Many times I came across the tracks of the tiger, but never once did I see him, nor catch any sign of his presence in the vicinity.

I spent three days in this fashion, but with entirely negative results. I had taken only a week's leave and had scarcely four days left in which to shoot the tiger.

Next morning I adopted fresh tactics. Climbing to the top of a large hillock in the centre of the terrain, I called as loudly as possible, in tiger fashion. Every ten minutes or so I repeated the call, hoping to hear an answer. Two hours later I did the same thing on a neighbouring hill. No sound came in reply. In the evening I followed the same plan, and yet the tiger did not respond. It was clear by this time that he was not in the immediate vicinity.

On the fifth day the herdsmen went out again with their cattle. You, who read this, may consider it a very brave thing on their part, and doubtless it was. But you must also realise the cattle were dependent for their food entirely on grazing. No grazing meant no food, for no provision had been made in any of the cattle villages for a reserve of fodder.

That morning, I joined the herdsmen and wandered amongst their animals, doing the same thing in the evening. But night fell without any sign of the tiger. The sixth morning found me very despondent, as I felt the animal I was after had moved away and would not give me a second chance to bag him. But there was nothing more I could do, beyond mixing with the various herds of cattle as they grazed in the area.

I covered a number of miles that morning and was about eight miles from the place where Muniappa had been killed when, at about noon a group of men came running through the shrub to tell me that another herdsman had been attacked three miles away.

I hurried with them to where the man was lying. I saw once more the familiar signs: severe scratches across face, chest and sides, but no bite whatever. This man had lost a good deal of blood and was too weak to walk, so I hurried back to my car, instructing the men to carry him to the road. From there I took him to Satyamangalam, where I left him in the local hospital in pretty bad shape. Then I dashed back to the spot on the road to which he had been carried, left the car and went back into the jungle. There was no difficulty in following the copious blood trail he had left behind him, and this led me to the site of the attack.

In this case I discovered that the tiger had not succeeded in killing any of the cattle, which had escaped by stampeding en masse to the road. So searching for the tiger seemed again a hopeless undertaking. I wandered around, and every now and again called in tiger fashion, hoping to attract him. There was no response, and so ended another day.

That night I thought of motoring up and down the road that led through the shrub for about five miles, using my spotlight in the hope of picking up the tiger's eyes, should he be passing anywhere within range. I began to put this plan into practice at about 10 p.m., driving slowly, allowing for a stop of fifteen minutes at the end of each trip. Six hours of this monotonous procedure found me desperately sleepy and with a very low petrol tank.

Thus dawned the seventh and last day of my leave. After the latest attack, the herdsmen had not turned out with their cattle, so for the last time I wandered alone through the scrub, hoping to meet the elusive tiger. Noon found me about six miles from my car, when I turned and began to retrace steps.

I was walking down hillock and just reached the small depression at the foot of it. Before me another hillock rose. No stream traversed this valley, which was dotted with a few stunted babul trees, growing amidst the usual lantana and other shrubs. Hardly fifty yards ahead, the tiger stalked out. We saw each other at the same moment, and then, with a short bound, he disappeared behind a lantana clump.

Raising the rifle to my shoulder I advanced slowly, expecting, and even hoping, for a charge that would bring him to my sights. At the same time I was mortally afraid, and my heart beat a loud tattoo.

The charge never came! A sixth sense appeared to have told him that here was no victim, but one who was deliberately out to destroy him. He must have slipped away before I drew level with the bush behind which he had disappeared, for he most certainly was not there. I walked around it and searched everywhere, but I never saw him again.

Thus ended my seventh and last day. The time had now come for me to return to Bangalore and duty.

Although this is the story of an unsuccessful hunt—indeed, a story of complete failure—I have told it so that the reader may realise that such adventures are not always crowned with success. Failure and disappointment are far more frequent. But the hard work, strenuous effort, the very thrill of the chase, the pitting of human brains against animal instinct— all these factors are there, and to a considerable extent compensate the enthusiast for his failure. For although I was really sorry that I had to leave the herdsmen, at least for some time, to the continued ravages of this animal, I felt satisfied that I had done my best and I looked forward to returning, when I might meet with better luck.

I handed a cheque to Muniappa's widow and started on that five-mile stretch of road on the beginning of my return journey to Bangalore. As the thorn bushes flashed past the car, I bade a temporary farewell to that extremely cunning and quite extraordinary tiger, which had not only succeeded in outwitting me at every encounter, but had also successfully hidden the reason for his peculiar habit of only scratching and not biting his victims—except those he actually killed.

The Call of the Man-Eater

Introduction

In this new book of adventure stories i have striven to do something more than provide an account of the pursuit of some of the larger wild animals of the beautiful land in which I live. I have endeavoured to recapture and portray to the reader's mind not only the events as they happened but also the background in which they took place.

The chapter entitled A Night by the Camp Fire' is a description of what has occurred many times when I have spent such a night in the forest, and I have tried to take the reader with me on such an excursion, and to introduce him to the sights, sounds and incidents that are likely to be experienced. In two later chapters I have let myself go, so to speak, in thinking aloud about the many wonderful days and nights in which strange or amusing incidents, and even some foolish ones too, have taken place. These memories are very precious indeed to me, and I trust I shall never live to outgrow or forget them. If in recording these musings of mine I have been able to bring to the reader even a fraction of the pleasure I have derived from recounting them, I will be more than satisfied.

I have also related some of the habits of a few of the lesser-known creatures of this wonderful land, and of some of the better-known creatures too, in order to bring them to the reader more intimately—my humble friends of the jungle in whose company I am very happy and contented.

A big movement has just started in India, although unfortunately very late, to instil into the public mind a love of the wild creatures around them, priceless living gems in the diadem of India that have all but vanished for ever. Many places that once teemed with game and resounded to their joyful and melodious voices are now realms of silence. Before this unique heritage becomes altogether a thing of the past, it is the duty of the government, and more particularly of every Indian, to put an end to the wanton slaughter that still goes on, night after night and every day of the year. For the sportsman of the future, I would strongly advocate the camera instead of the rifle and gun. It can give you every bit as much fun—clean fun, unstained by the smell of blood, the sight of death, and the pricking conscience of regret.

So I invite you on a wonderful journey to places that may be new to you and are vastly beautiful to behold—the jungle that throbs with life, although hidden from your view. At night you can feel it around you, just outside the range of your flickering camp fire, where the wall of blackness begins and stretches far into the moonlit forest aisles and glades, or into the deep shadows of the jungle on a moonless night, where, to quote Lawrence Hope:

> There was no sound; he gave no cry,
> The careless stars looked on serene.
> The jungle's sudden tragedy
> Remained unheard, unknown, unseen.

The soughing of the night wind through the boughs of the lofty trees, the quiver of a million leaves that whisper like a distant ocean; the flash and flicker of fireflies that dart among the branches; the blackness all around, and the deeper blackness that moves stealthily within it unseen; and the weird, unearthly cry of the distant jackal pack: 'Ooooo-ooh! Ooh-where? Ooh-where? Where? Where?' And the answer of the leader, punctuated by the chorus of vixens: 'Yes, Here! Hee-re! Hee-ee-yah! Yah! Yah! Yah!' Then at last that awesome but thrilling call that sweeps across the hills and echoes through the mist-laden valleys: 'A-oongh! O-o-n-oon! Augh-ha! Ugh! Ugh! U-u-u-gh!' The call of the man-eater!

So put your man-made cares aside and visit these wondrous regions with me, where the jungle presides and the laws of nature hold sway. In the words of still another poet, let the wild places speak to you in the silence of your heart and mind:

> So ye learn within my arbours
> Where the sleeping wild things lie,
> A reverence for nature
> Which the city's streets deny,
> Ye learn the real value
> Of the man made from the loam;
> And ye kneel and thank your Maker
> As ye wend your footsteps home.

The Call of the Man-Eater

It was just after midnight, and the darkness outside was intense. I lay comfortably stretched in the long armchair on the verandah of the forest bungalow at Joldahl, with both feet upon its wooden rests, smoking my pipe and listening to the sound that is music to the ears of every jungle lover in India and a challenge to every shikari and hunter.

It moaned across the forest range; and then, as the creature padded its silent way through the jungle, clearly to my ears came the softer sigh of contentment in the knowledge that it was the supreme lord of all it surveyed. 'Ugh! Ugh! Ughaugh!'

In my imagination I could picture the caller. In that intense darkness its tawny coat, with the bold black stripes and the white spots behind the ears and at the base of its throat and belly, would hold no colour to an observer were he able to see them. Indeed, it would be unrecognizable as a tiger at all. The watcher would only see, if he could see at all, a black shadow, blacker if possible than the surrounding jungle.

If the watcher happened to be a man, unaided by a torch or moonlight, he would see nothing, for human sight is not made to see more blackness where the blackness is already complete. He would know, however, and unmistakably, that a tiger was near. The roars that seemed to make the very jungle tremble would tell him; and the watcher would tremble himself. If he was a trained and experienced hunter with exceptionally acute hearing, he might catch the faint rustle of grass, or the sound of a leaf brushing against some heavy body as it passed. He would not hear the crackle of a twig, because the tiger would not be so careless as to step on such a thing, for he is himself a hunter, and hunters do not betray their presence nor make mistakes.

Should the observer be seated on a low branch of a tree and the tiger pass directly beneath, and should he have a really keen sense of smell, he might possibly wonder at the sudden, very strong 'greenish' odour that might be carried briefly to his nostrils. Then, if he is a religious man, he might be wise to raise a hurried prayer and hold his breath, and not move a muscle nor flicker an eyelid. For although a tiger has practically no sense of smell, he has abnormally acute hearing and marvellous sight, to catch the minutest of movements in his vicinity. Should he hear or see the watcher at that instant, the watcher might watch no more.

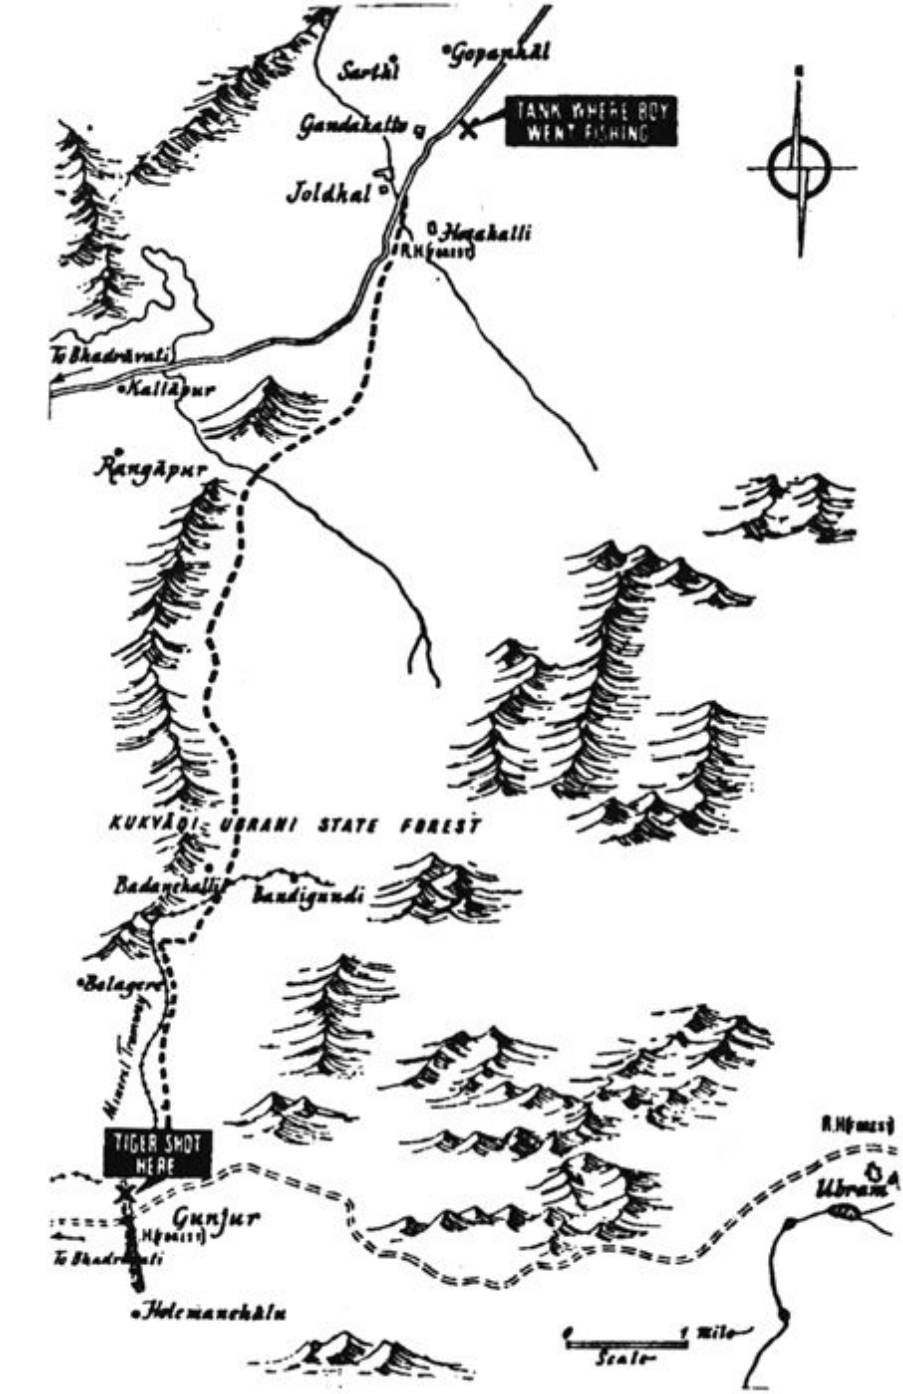
For the tiger to whose roars I was listening was no ordinary tiger. He was a man-eater!

You may well ask what was the use of all this stealth, this wonderful hearing and sight, this uncanny sixth sense that all tigers possess, when the stupid brute was advertising his presence by moaning and sighing and roaring? Which is a fair question, and one which is difficult for me to answer convincingly, not being a tiger myself. I can only make a suggestion. Most strong people, well developed muscularly, good boxers or wrestlers, cannot remain silent and modest about their prowess. All of us are tempted at times to boast of our accomplishments. Even men who 'have a way with the ladies' talk of their conquests and say they are irresistible. Perhaps the tiger is just such an egoist, announcing far and wide that he is the unvanquished, the fearless, the all-conquering lord of the jungle, and finds joy in hearing his own challenge echoing across the hills and valleys, the glades and thickets of the forest, knowing full well that every living thing that hears him will fear and tremble and hide. Perhaps he is morose and lonely, tired of his own company, just as you and I feel at times, seeking company, especially if that company should be a sleek, graceful, beautiful tigress. May be he has just eaten heartily, and he is merely going for a late after-dinner walk to help his digestion; you and I do that sometimes, too, and while we walk we whistle or sing.



But I have started this tale badly and have been rambling, when I should have begun at the beginning. I certainly cannot tell you why the tiger was there, beyond the fact that tigers do live in jungles. But I should have explained how I came to be lying in the armchair on the verandah of the Joldahl forest bungalow at dead of night, smoking my pipe and listening to those awe-inspiring but marvellous and melodious sounds.

It all came about in this way. Just over a dozen miles from the town of Shimoga, which is the headquarters of the district of the same name, in the state of Mysore, is the almost equally large town of Bhadravati, which has become an industrial centre of considerable importance, boasting a large iron and steel foundry. The iron ore, mined at a place named Kemangondi, some miles away on the Baba Budan mountain range, is conveyed downhill by a succession of cable-buckets to the works at Bhadravati. Fuel is provided by charcoal from wood constantly felled in the extensive surrounding forests. The glow from the blast furnaces of Bhadravati is visible for many miles reddening the horizon and reflecting against the clouds in the sky.

Joldahl is about fifteen miles from Bhadravati, on a road that leads more or less eastwards to Chitaldroog. It is completely surrounded by dense jungle and boasts a delightful Forest department bungalow. About ten miles southwest of Joldahl, and also in dense forest, is another forest bungalow, slightly less picturesque. This is situated at a place called Gunjur.

I had often camped at Gunjur in the old days. It is a pretty spot. But the only word to describe-the road that leads directly to Gunjur is 'vile'. It branches off to the east from the main road from Bangalore to Tarikere and Bhadravati, about five miles before reaching Bhadravati. From that point it is no longer a road but a cart-track, and a very bad cart-track at that. I have negotiated it in my Model T Ford in early years, and in my Studebaker since then. In all its twenty miles my sympathies and unstinted praise have gone to Henry Ford and the Studebaker brothers. My nerves were at breaking point all the time, yet I never broke a spring or an axle on any of the trips I made there.

At the Gunjur bungalow there lived a very hard-working and obliging caretaker who did all he could on every occasion to make my stay comfortable. This caretaker had a lovely little daughter. She was about twelve years old when I first met her, and she was very interested in watching the cars and in scanning my firearms at a respectful distance. Also, like her father she was very helpful. She would fill her waterpot at a spring nearly a furlong away and carry the load to pour into the old zinc tub in the bathroom of the bungalow, for my use.

This child grew up into a lovely girl of about seventeen years. Her father had, customarily and painstakingly, made all the arrangements for her to marry a respectable villager at Joldahl, and the marriage was soon to take place.

One day she took her waterpot to the spring to fill it for the use of her father and herself. They lived in the humble outhouse (known as a 'godown'), sandwiched between the kitchen and the garage at the rear of the forest bungalow. But she never returned. For, as she stooped to dip the pot in the spring, the man-eater got her.

He carried her away, screaming, into the jungle that grows to the edge of the spring. Her father heard her. He had no gun. Grabbing a woodchopper as his only weapon, he gave chase, running as fast as he could, till he actually overtook the tiger.

He shouted at it in Kanarese—his native tongue: 'Let go my child, you brute. I will slay you for this.'

The tiger heard and turned. He saw the man running behind. The cowardly streak that is latent in the heart of every man-eater filled him with fear. But the feebly struggling victim in his mouth offered too tempting a meal to be so easily relinquished. So the tiger increased his pace and bounded away into the jungle, while the poor girl's cries grew fainter and feebler and soon died away. I was later told by the bereaved man that he never found his daughter's remains.

There is no road connecting Gunjur and Joldahl, only a winding footpath that creeps down densely forested valleys and across hills for about ten miles. Joldahl itself, as I have said, is fifteen miles from Bhadravati, on the road to Chitaldroog, and roughly northeast of Gunjur. That road at least is quite a good one.

I am told that it was about two months later that a little Muslim boy went fishing in the small lake that lies about six furlongs from the cluster of huts that form Joldahl hamlet. He must have had quite a bit of luck, for a dozen fish, including murral, cat-fish and small carp, were found afterwards in the basket he had brought, together with the two rods he was using.

Fishing in India, by the way, is not done with reels, or by using bait such as 'spoons' and 'fly'. The rod is a thin length of bamboo; the reel a length of string; the float a quill, made from the wing-feathers of a peafowl, horned-owl or hawk; and the bait is an earthworm dug up in the ditch by the wayside.

Perhaps the luck he had met with had caused the boy to dally further into the evening than he would have done had he caught fewer fish. He stayed till it was getting dark. But dusk is the time when tigers come out. And the man-eater was no exception.

The boy never returned home. Eight o'clock came and it was time for food. His father and eldest brother, who knew he had gone to the tank to fish, took lanterns and sticks and went to fetch him. Probably they intended to beat him with the sticks. They found the two rods and the basket of fish. But not the little boy. Instead, the light from their flickering lamps revealed the pug-marks of a large tiger in the ooze. The tiger had come out of the jungle, had slipped in the mud, and had gone back to the jungle. But not alone. The tiger had taken the boy with him.

On the grass was something that looked black and shiny. When they stooped and touched the shiny blackness and looked at their fingers, they found them red. It was blood. Father and son ran back to the village.

Then there was a third killing, but nobody worried about it. A madman had turned up at Joldahl; no one knew who he was or whence he came, and being quite mad he could not tell them. In India, lunatics are treated with a certain toleration. Little boys and girls may sometimes tease them. The elders check the children and give the madman a handful of food. Beyond that they take little notice of him.

So the madman ate such food as was given him in charity and slept by the wayside at night, outside the locked doors of the huts. But one morning he was found to be missing; nobody showed any concern. Two days later, a couple of forest guards patrolling the jungle that surrounds the village, saw vultures circling in the sky and swooping to earth. So they thought at once that some animal had been killed, perhaps a deer, and that there might be some flesh left on the carcase — enough to sell, or anyway to eat. They hurried to the place where the vultures were gathered and found there, not the remains of a deer, but the whitening bones of the madman. Only his head, that lay at a little distance and grinned at them as stupidly in death as in life, provided the clue that identified the bones as those of the missing lunatic. Imprinted in the soft sand around the head were the pug-marks of a tiger, a fairly large one.

I had not even heard of these killings till a friend of a friend of mine, who had been motoring from Chitaldroog to Bhadravati, stopped for a couple of days at the Joldahl bungalow to do a little hunting. There he heard about the tiger and its three victims. The bungalow caretaker at Joldahl, being distantly related to his counterpart at Gunjur, had told him that the first victim had been the promising daughter of the man who looked after the Gunjur bungalow. When he returned to Bangalore, the gentleman told a friend of mine all about it. Knowing I am in the habit of following up such information, Joe Thompson, the friend in question, passed the story on.

The death of the girl whom I remembered so well prompted me to write a letter to the Forest Range Officer at Joldahl, asking for details and particularly whether the rumour I had heard, that the daughter of the caretaker at Gunjur had been the first victim, was really true. His reply, five days later, confirmed the sad tale.

So I went in the Studebaker direct to Joldahl, where I learnt the story I have just related. That had been forty-eight hours earlier. Since then I had walked to Gunjur by the ten-mile footpath and met my old friend, the caretaker, there. He wept bitterly as he recounted his daughter's tragic end. I promised him that I would try to avenge her and asked him to let me know at Joldahl should he hear or see signs of the tiger within the next week.

He had suggested that I should camp at Gunjur, but I said I preferred Joldahl for two reasons. Firstly, there had been two killings there. Secondly, the Studebaker was available for quick transport and the roads were usable. Then I returned by the same path to Joldahl.

I had been sleeping inside the bungalow that night when I awakened shortly after midnight to hear the tiger calling in the jungle, and I had come out to the armchair on the verandah, to smoke and think and listen to that awesome sound. As I heard it I could not refrain from thinking back a few years to the happy face of the pert little girl who had been so interested in my cars and my guns each time I visited Gunjur; who had fetched water for me of her own accord; who had grown into a handsome lass on the eve of marriage; who had now fallen prey to the magnificent but cruel beast to whose call I was at that very moment listening.

It came again! A-oongh! Aungh-ha! O-o-o-n-o-on!'

Involuntarily, I shuddered. The sound faded into the distance, and as far as I could judge the tiger was going towards Gunjur, probably walking along the very footpath that led there. I determined to check this first thing in the morning and fell asleep as I thought about it.

The mosquitoes were active until dawn and prevented my sleep from being particularly sound. But I was up before daylight, and after swallowing some coffee and chappatties, waited for the sun to rise a little before setting out to try to pick up the trail of the animal that had been calling the night before. It would not have been safe to have set out earlier with the possibility of the tiger lurking anywhere in the bushes beside the path. The half-light of early dawn can be as deceptive as the evening twilight, whereas I knew that with the rising of the sun the man-eater, in all probability, would retire till evening to some sheltered and remote spot to avoid the heat of the day.

I found what I was seeking a little over a mile from the bungalow. The tiger had walked along a narrow ravine, then leapt on to its bank and had started to follow the very path I was traversing, which led to Gunjur. His fresh saucer-like pug-marks, that had been made a little after midnight, were clearly imprinted in the powdery earth as he walked along the centre of the track. He had been disdainful of any interference, for he had been calling as he had walked, knowing well enough that every living creature would keep out of his way.

There was no conclusive evidence that this tiger was the man-eater; but something about his haughty manner told me that it was so, and I was reasonably certain that I was correct. I decided to follow the pug-marks to discover whether the tiger had indeed gone all the way to Gunjur or had turned back after covering part of the distance.

I found that for two miles or more the beast, whose pug-marks showed that he was a large male, had walked along the centre of the footpath. Then the tracks dipped to the dry bed of a stream, which the tiger then began to follow. As far as I could judge by the position of the sun, which was climbing higher and growing hotter every moment, the stream led roughly southeastwards, so that tiger track were now moving away from both Gunjur and Joldahl. But this was not for long. After about half a mile he had climbed the right-hand bank of the stream and had entered the forest, where I soon lost sight of his tracks on the hard, dry gound.

It occurred to me that he might have doubled back on his trail and had returned through the jungle to rejoin the footpath to Gunjur which he had been following before he had met the stream. With this idea, rather than flounder about in the undergrowth, I retraced my footsteps till I met once again the pathway leading to Gunjur. I began to follow it and was delighted, after I had walked nearly a mile from the stream, to find the tiger's pug-marks again in the sand before me. I had guessed correctly. He had taken a short cut through the forest to resume his former course towards Gunjur.

This action clearly revealed that he had made up his mind to go there, and I knew from my experience that he would not change it unless something extraordinary occurred to make him do so. My surmise proved to be right for, excepting a deviation here and there, the tiger had followed the footpath all the way to Gunjur. Keeping sight of his tracks had prevented me from walking as fast as I might have done, so that it took me four hours to cover those ten miles, and I presented myself to the caretaker of the bungalow just after eleven o'clock.

This man's name, I must tell you, was Ananthaswamy, and I told him how I had heard the tiger calling at Joldahl shortly after midnight and had followed the pug-marks that morning direct to Gunjur. Ananthaswamy told me he had been awake since four in the morning but had heard no sound from the tiger. However, two or three sambar had belled shortly after 4.30 a.m., while the spotted deer had been restless at dawn, sounding their calls of alarm from the base of a small hill to the south of the bungalow. We agreed that the tiger's silence, together with the alarm cries of the two species of deer, showed that he had come to Gunjur on serious business.

Now it is a mistake to think that every man-eating tiger or panther subsists on human flesh alone. Both species, particularly the former, are voracious eaters, and if they should decide to live on human flesh only, two things would happen. In the earlier stages the number of people who would die would be enormous, as on an average a tiger makes a kill at least twice a week. After that, when people had become so cautious as not to afford the tiger the opportunity of killing them, he would eventually starve to death. What really happens is that the man-eater takes a liking to the flavour of human flesh, encouraged all the more by the fact that he soon finds human prey much easier to catch and kill than wild animals. So a stage is reached when he will prefer killing and devouring a man, woman or child to killing domestic cattle or wild animals like deer and wild pig. But when he cannot easily find a human being he has no hesitation in reverting to his natural diet till the next opportunity offers. Added to this is the strange fact that, no matter how many people he may kill and eat, a man-eating tiger and panther remain basically afraid of the human race. This has been proved over and over again when a man—or sometimes a woman—has resisted or attempted to resist and even retaliate. Often enough the fiercest of man-eaters has turned tail and fled. But never at any time does a tiger fear domestic cattle or the wild beasts he preys upon, with the exception of the adult bull bison and the elephant.

So, not having had the luck to catch another human being at Joldahl, the tiger had evidently decided to come to Gunjur, where the low hills and wide grassy valleys are heavily stocked with deer. The chances were that he would stay there for some days, slay and eat a few sambar and spotted deer, and when well-filled would start thinking once more of indulging his newly-acquired taste for human flesh.

Except for the caretaker, who was now living alone, there were no other people at Gunjur, for there was no village. So after the few days were over, the tiger would probably go back to Joldahl, or try his luck around one of the other small villages bordering the main Bhadravati-Chitaldroog road. There was thus every hope that the man-eater would remain in the vicinity of Gunjur for the next two or three days at least. This hope would be strengthened if he succeeded in killing a deer and satisfying his immediate hunger, when he would lie up and feed on the remains during the following forty-eight hours. And there was no reason why he should not succeed, for Gunjur, as I have already said, abounds in deer: sambar, spotted deer, jungle sheep and four-horned antelope.

It is also a favourable place in which to bait for tiger, because the clearing in which the forest bungalow stands, and also the spring not far away, are encircled by small hillocks, which would afford the tiger a grand-stand view of any bait that might be placed conspicuously in the open valley below.

Unfortunately, apart from my rifle, I had brought no kit with me. My torch, my warm dark clothes for sitting up at night, my primus stove and stock of provisions were all at Joldahl bungalow. But that was ten miles away and I had just covered the distance. To go back for these things and then return again with them meant a thirty-mile trip altogether. The prospect was not enticing. Besides, I could not complete the trip before nightfall.

Ananthaswamy offered to lend me his torch, although it was only a two-cell affair. He also offered free board and lodging if I was prepared to share the only food he had— ragi balls. Ragi balls are prepared from ground ragi grain made into a dry porridge and then pressed together with both hands into a ball about the size of a cannon ball. It is very wholesome and sustaining, but quite tasteless.

Having accepted his invitation, there was another and greater snag to be overcome. Ananthaswamy had no animal of any sort to tie up as bait. He did have a dog—a rank, mangy cur. But a dog is useless as bait for tiger. Besides, as a dog lover myself, I refuse to use one as bait under any circumstances.

There was one more question. Was I not being rather over-optimistic? How did I know for certain that the tiger I had followed was the man-eater? He might be just a normal, extremely well-behaved and inoffensive game-killing and cattle-lifting beast. I talked the whole thing over with Ananthaswamy. His dark eyes glistened with pleasure when I accepted his hospitality and said I would stay with him for a couple of days. He said he was sure the quarry was the man-eater because there were no other tigers in the vicinity at that time. As for bait, he said that could easily be solved. He would himself sit or stand in the open as bait while I hid under cover or on a tree - machan to shoot the tiger—if possible before it leapt upon him. And in the same breath he said: 'Don't think, dorai , that I am doing this for your sake. Don't think I am doing it because I am brave and have no fear—for I am terribly afraid too. But I am doing it—and doing it cheerfully— in an attempt to avenge my little daughter. She was everything to me—all I had in the world after her mother died at childbirth and her elder brother, just a little later, of smallpox. I will gladly sacrifice my life to bring about the death of her cruel slayer.'

His simple and magnificent courage was touching and affected me deeply. But this was no time to indulge in sentiment; nor did I want a brave man's blood on my hands. Remember: the nights were dark and I would be using his two-cell torch. Nor had I brought the clamps with which to fix the torch to the rifle. I would have to hold it in my left hand and try to shine it along the barrel of the rifle while shooting. That would entail delay—at least a couple of seconds in which to get the beam correct. And even one second would be long enough for the tiger to pounce on Ananthaswamy and kill him.

Very emphatically, I answered: 'No.' Then, in order not to hurt his feelings while concealing my real reason, I added: 'I shall need you beside me to shine the torch on the tiger when he comes, while I fire at him.'

Ananthaswamy appeared dissatisfied with the explanation I had given him. He said: 'Dorai can hold the torch in his own left hand up against the rifle, and still shoot.'

Sensing the beginning of an argument I replied: 'No, absolutely and finally, no!'

After that we sat in silence for some time. We were each thinking deeply. Then an idea occurred to me. The man-eater had carried off this man's daughter at the spring where she had gone for water. Perhaps the tiger would remember the kill he had succeeded in making there. Also he had probably seen the girl, and even Ananthaswamy for that matter, go to the spring for water on several occasions. At least he would associate that spring with the occasional visit of a human being. The spring was just a furlong from the bungalow and in a slight depression clearly visible from the surroundings hills. Yes, indeed; the spring would be the best place at which to prepare the bait. As the nights were dark and I had no torch-clamp, that bait could not be either Ananthaswamy or myself. So the only alternative would be to make a dummy to resemble a man in the act of drawing water from the spring, while I would hide myself as near as possible. Near enough for the dim light from the two-cell torch to be effective.

I detailed my thoughts to Ananthaswamy, who was elated. He said: 'Come, dorai; we will go at once to the spring and you can select the place where you will hide and shoot the tiger when he attacks the dummy this very night.'

I looked at him squarely, and he returned my look equally squarely. There was frankness and eagerness in his eyes and not a trace of fear, and I knew that this man would not again take 'no' for an answer.

We rose and walked to the spring. The water trickled out from a crack in a flattish rock that lay on the ground. It flowed down a slight slope to a small pool almost three feet deep and about ten feet across. It was from this pool that both father and daughter had been drawing their water throughout the years during which he had been caretaker of the Gunjur bungalow. The overflow of water spread into the jungle where, being insufficient to form a stream, it was absorbed by the earth. The continuous dampness had caused a growth of lush green grass for about twenty-five yards. Then the jungle began again. Ananthaswamy told me that when he first came to Gunjur the undergrowth grew right up to the pool and had enveloped it. With his daughter's help he had cut this away for about twenty-five yards, so that now only the grass grew there.

The problem that presented itself was: where were we going to hide? The nearest tree in which a machan could be built was well over 100 yards away. That distance was much too great to cover with the beam of a torch that held only two cells that were far from fresh. It appeared that the whole plan we had hatched of sitting over the dummy was about to fizzle out, for there just did not seem any place in which we could hide.

I asked the caretaker if he had any ideas. He replied very ruefully that he had not. One fact emerged as quite unavoidable. We would have to sit on the ground somewhere and conceal ourselves as best we could. Or we would have to abandon the whole scheme. The nearest sizeable tree was too far from the pool and the feeble light of Ananthaswamy's torch could not possibly cover that distance. I had tested it in the caretaker's godown and could see that its cells were already half-exhausted.

By common consent, we walked across the twenty-five yards or so of grassy ground to where the undergrowth began. Neither of us had spoken a word, but it was as if we both accepted the inevitable. Here was where we would have to sit—if at all—to await the tiger.

The undergrowth was of the usual sort; wait-a-bit thorn bushes, lantana and other jungly shrubs, all matted together in close and dense profusion. The wait-a-bit thorn is unpopular with everyone, both human beings as well as animals, as it offers an impossible barrier when it grows really thickly; while even a solitary tendril, should it come in contact with your clothing will hold you up for quite a while. If it comes in contact with your flesh, you must be prepared to leave some of your skin behind, impaled on the numerous needle-sharp, hook-like thorns.

At one spot, just where the undergrowth commenced, there was just a wait-a-bit thorn bush; quite a large one, in fact. No man without a knife could possibly pass through it. No animal could do so either, for that matter, except an elephant. So at that moment I looked upon the bush with great favour. It seemed to have saved the situation.

Ananthaswamy,' I asked, 'are the two iron spring-cots still in the bungalow?'

'Yes, dorai ,' he replied. Then, as the strangeness of the sudden question registered itself in his mind, he added: 'If the master is tired,

I will open the door of the bungalow and he can lie down and sleep undisturbed.'

Apparently quite irrelevantly, I continued: 'Is there a third such cot on the premises?'

I could see his eyes widen with surprise, and I almost laughed aloud. His thoughts at that moment were written large upon his frank countenance. What on earth can this man want a third cot for? There are two as it) is, and being alone he can only sleep on one of them. He did not answer my question.

I repeated it: 'Is there a third such cot available. Ananthaswamy?'

His eyes opened still wider; but he held himself in check admirably, 'No,' he answered. 'Just the two that have always been here.'

'Come, Ananthaswamy,' I said, turning towards the bungalow. 'Open the door. I want to go inside and look over the furniture.'

Sunstroke, undoubtedly; or some other form of madness. The poor dorai! How unfortunate that this should happen at such a critical moment! The caretaker could not disguise his thoughts. This time I did laugh openly.

'Don't be alarmed, Ananthaswamy,' I explained as we retraced our steps to the little lodge. 'I am not going mad. It is in my mind to form a sort of cage for you and me to sit in, right where that wait-a-bit thorn-bush now grows. The two cots turned up on their sides—the longer sides by the way—will form a sort of barrier for us. In between the springs we will weave the wait-a-bit thorn branches and tendrils that you will have to cut. The front will be open, for in that direction we will face the dummy.

'But there is one snag, Ananthaswamy. A mighty big one. We will have to find something, some third article of furniture, to form the third barrier on the third side. For we can only watch in one direction, and not in two, my friend. Don't forget the nights at this time are dark; very, very dark. And your torch is in poor shape.'

It took quite a time for the plan I had outlined to sink into his mind. We were walking while we talked, and when finally he did catch on, he reacted rather unexpectedly. Coming to an abrupt halt, the caretaker bent double, slapped his thighs with the palms of his hands, and laughed and laughed and laughed.

'By Krishna!' he chortled, 'I never heard of such a plan before. We are to make a cage of the two beds and some other furniture and sit inside it to wait for the tiger? And the beds will be covered with the wait-a-bit thorn? Dorai, I will tell this plan to my children, and my children's children, after them. I swear it.'

Poor Ananthaswamy. He quite forgot he had no children. The tiger had devoured his only remaining one. Besides, there was little prospect of being able to make good his intentions. For he did not even have a wife!

He opened the door of the bungalow and we went inside. The two iron spring cots were there, one in each of the bedrooms. The other furniture consisted of a large dining table, two smaller tables, two dressing tables (one with a cracked mirror and the other with no mirror at all), one fairly large almirah, the usual armchair common to all bungalows, and about half-a-dozen old, wooden-bottomed chairs. In the bathroom was an ancient zinc tub, a brass wash-basin on an iron stand, and a towel-rack. There were no commodes; for purposes of that sort one had to go outside to a mud-walled latrine, where there was a hole in the ground topped by two flag-stones.

I looked at this array of furniture with sinking feelings. For one thing, the almirah was too massive and the two of us could not carry it for a furlong to the spring. The small tables were too small. So we had to choose between the dining table and the armchair for our third barrier. The dining table was certainly the safer and more sturdy alternative. But the trouble lay in the fact that its flat top, when laid sideways, could not easily be hidden by the thorns or even with leaves. It would prove a very conspicuous object that would not only arouse the suspicions of the tiger, but might frighten if off altogether. But at least the shape of the armchair lent itself to a little disguising.

'We will take the armchair,' I decided, explaining my reason to the caretaker.

I looked at my wristwatch. The time was 12.25. 'If your ragi balls are ready, Ananthaswamy, we will eat them. Then we must set to work. We have a terrible lot to do.'

I ate half a ragi ball. It was as much as I could manage. Swallowing the tasteless stuff was aided by frequent gulps of water. But Ananthaswamy ate two. Then he put water in a degchie and left it over the remains of his fire. This was to make tea when we returned. We would need it then; we certainly would be tired.

Ananthaswamy brought his hatchet and handed me a spare chopper of sorts, rather a blunt one. We traced our steps to the spring and set to work in earnest. First we cut down the wait-a-bit thorn bush, a task that left us bleeding from many scratches and perspiring from our exertions. Then we went about 200 yards away and cut undergrowth of the same nature as that which was growing at the place where we intended to sit up. This consisted of lantana and other bushes, but certainly no more wait-a-bit thorn. We carried—but not dragged—this stuff to where we had cut down the thorn bush. Dragging would leave a trail that might make the tiger suspicious. It was two o'clock by the time we had assembled all the necessary camouflage.

Next we returned to the bungalow, from which we carried the beds one at a time, one of us at either end, to our selected spot. The rear would naturally be the weakest link in our defence. There we laid one of the cots on its longer side, legs facing outwards. The second cot we placed on its side at right-angles to the first, its legs also facing outwards. Then we returned to the bungalow for the armchair, which we took back and laid on its side, again with legs facing outwards, on the third side of our rough cage—the side facing the bungalow. This we did because we knew it was the flimsiest of our three flimsy barricades, while it was least likely that the tiger would approach from the direction of the bungalow itself. The fourth side of our 'square' was of course open. It faced the grassy patch before the pool where we were going to place our dummy.

Now began the painful task of threading the branches and tendrils of the wait-a-bit thorns into the springs of the two cots, and between the legs and through the canework bottom of the armchair. To conceal the outside of the three articles of furniture completely, we added the undergrowth we had cut and brought from two hundred yards away.

It soon became evident that we did not have nearly enough camouflage to do this task effectively. We had to make another half-dozen trips for more, and even then we had barely enough. Anyway, the task was finished by 4 p.m. Looked at from a distance and from various angles, our zareba appeared to be more or less the same wait-a-bit thorn bush that had been growing there a few hours ago. But I was not happy about it. It seemed too much like wishful thinking to accept to deceive such a cautious animal as a tiger with such poor and very obvious camouflage.

Our only hope lay in making the dummy so realistic as to attract the tiger's attention and keep him from looking too keenly in our direction. Success I knew would also, to a large extent, depend on the angle from which he approached. If this was from either flank, there might be a chance that he would not notice our place of concealment. If he came directly from the opposite direction, our hide would be plainly in view and the chances would be ninety per cent against us. But if he came from behind and discovered us, what then? Well, we would not be long in doubt, anyway. Either he would become afraid and just slink away, or he would attack. The chances were about fifty-fifty.

We had to hurry and make the dummy. It was very late already. Getting back to Ananthaswamy's little room, we ransacked his boxes, his bedding, and everything he had. There was no time, and sufficient material, to make anything like a realistic dummy. His filthy old pillow, black with oil from his hair, formed the torso of the dummy. I punctured this at either side, greatly to his consternation, and stuck a bamboo through the holes; protruding at both sides this bamboo would form the two arms. Another short one at the end of the pillow, into which the rim of a small earthenware cooking-pot was inserted, would be the head. There were no bamboos for the legs, so the dummy would have to appear to be squatting beside the pool; a natural enough position, anyway, for a man to be in when drawing water.

On to the pillow went one of the caretaker's old torn shirts, the bamboo arms protruding through its sleeves. Over that a white coat, to make it conspicuous. Around the earthenware pot, a turban of sorts. That was easy enough, anyhow.

But how on earth were we to keep the dummy sitting up? I looked around desperately. Then an idea struck me and I dived into the bathroom coming back with the wooden cross-member from the towel-rack. A final hole at the bottom of the pillow, which was almost ruined anyway, and the cross-member from the towel-rack was forced through the cotton, past the bamboo that formed the arms, and through the opening at the base of the earthenware head, to reinforce the bamboo that was already there. That made quite a good neck. At least it was strong.

It only remained to plant the other end of the cross-member firmly in the ground. But it was five o'clock already. There was no time for food. Who wanted another dose of ragi ball, anyhow? And no time for tea. That was tragedy. In our hurry we forgot about the tea and the water became cold again.

'Bring the hatchet and the other chopper, Ananthaswamy. Put on a warm coat, too. Don't forget the torch. And bring two water-pots to make it appear the dummy is drawing water. Hurry, man, hurry!'

We hastened back to the pool, at the edge of which the caretaker scooped a hole in the ground with the chopper. I stuck the 'backbone' of the dummy into this hole and pressed the earth back firmly once more. We placed the two water-pots on the ground, one on each side. Mafiz feluce; lo and behold! The dummy sat beside the pool. Very sincerely we hoped that to the eyes of a hungry man-eater it might appear like a human being squatting there and drawing water. To my eyes it looked only a ludicrous mess. One more look around, to see that everything was in order, then from in front we carefully stepped into our 'stronghold'.

We sat down, the caretaker to my right, while I was next to the armchair. I needed him to my right, as he was to shine the torch when the tiger came. For purposes of aligning the sights of the rifle, the light would be too far away if he had sat on my left, for I fire from the right shoulder.

It was just three minutes short of 5.30 p.m. and I knew we should have been in position at least an hour earlier. We were facing east and the sun had already dipped below the rim of hills behind us. In a few hurried and whispered sentences I gave Ananthaswamy his final instructions.

'On no account should you move your head, arms or legs. If the mosquitoes bite, blow them off. Don't slap at them. If you hear or see anything, nudge me gently with your left knee. On no account should you even whisper. If the tiger comes. I will tell you by prodding you twice. That will be the signal. It will probably growl when it leaps upon the dummy and finds no flesh and blood beneath its talons. Then shine the torch and keep it on the animal, whatever happens thereafter. Remember, you should not waver or let the torch go out. If you do that, we are dead men; because I cannot see in the dark and the tiger can.'

His reply was reassuring, 'Do not fear, dorai. I shall not let you down. Certainly not, for Rajamma's sake.'

Rajamma had been his daughter's name. After that we did not speak again.

'Tok-tok-tok-tok.' A green and red woodpecker tapped away with his powerful beak at the bole of a tree in the forest behind us. Then the belligerent little spurfowl began to quarrel in the bushes around. 'Kaaw-wick-a-wack,' said the challenging cockbird, and his challenge was taken up in all directions. 'Kukurruka-wack! Kukurruka-wack!' The quarrelsome little cocks were just spoiling for a fight. Far away a koel, a member of the cuckoo family, issued his plaintive cry, calling for rain, as the jungle-folk say. 'Koel! Koel! Ko-yel! Ko-yel!', he screeched in rising crescendo. His cousin, the brain-fever bird, also of the cuckoo family, decided that the call of the koel was nothing to the crescendo he could raise, if he really tried. And he did, 'Brain-fever! Brain-fever; Brain-fever!' The crescendo was almost hysterical, nerve-wracking, far eclipsing the effort the koel had made. There was silence for a while, and before the brain-fever bird could start again came a fresh and pleasant sound; the clarion call of the silver-hackled junglecock. 'Whee-e-e-ew! Kuck-kaya-kya-kuck'm,' he crowed lustily. That silenced the spurfowl for a second or two. Then they began their wrangling again, while other junglecocks crowed their farewell to the dying day.

Dusk fell rapidly, as it always does in the jungle. At one moment it was daylight. Then the forest before me assumed a hazy, smoky-purplish hue. A few moments later it was growing dark and it was becoming difficult to see.

The final call from the birds of the day came from a peacock roosting on some high tree far away. Mia-a-oo! Mia-a-oo! Aaow!

Aaow!' he cried, and his cry was hauntingly sad. As if to assert that the time for the peacock to be active was now over, a bird of the night gave answer while it flitted like a bunch of brown soft feathers into the long grass before me. 'Chuck. Chuck. Chuck. Chuck-o-o-o-o.' My little friends, the nightsjars, were active and on the wing once more. A moment later it was night.

I have often noticed that the final calls of day-birds are answered by the early cries of the birds of the night. Then for a while comes total silence. The day-birds have gone to sleep, while those of the night are undoubtedly too busy feeding, except for the small insect-eating bats that flit swiftly overhead as they utter their sharp squeaks. 'Chee-e-ck. Chee-e-ck.' I was grateful to the little wood-cricket that started chirping almost at my feet: 'Sizz.Sizz. Sizz-z-z!.Sizz-z-z!'

The stars shone brightly now, the evening star being prominent among them. The sky was cloudless and of a gun-metal hue, a perfect setting for the myriad twinkling gems that shone so serenely, the incomparable lamps of heaven. There were other scintillating gems too, that moved and flitted in the jungle about us; now here, now there; now gone, but only to reappear. They were the fireflies that hung momentarily in the heavy all-pervading blackness of night, only to be gone the next instant. Then they would momentarily reappear to synchronize their flashes into one sudden, fleeting, instantaneous glare, bright enough to outline the trees far away. Once again they were gone; leaving the darkness behind.

We sat motionless. By and by the mosquitoes came, huming and buzzing around us till the air seemed filled with clouds of them. I could feel the faint but sharp pain as one after the other stung me—my face, my neck, my hands; in fact, wherever they could reach my skin. I blew gently against my own face and tried hard not to move my head or arms. Fortunately my pants, socks and shoes protected my feet. I could hear my companion blowing also, just as I had instructed him.

It was very uncomfortable and trying, to say the least of it. But it was not dangerous. For these were not malaria-carrying mosquitoes. When such an insect stings you, it almost stands on its head with its tail in the air, and you do not feel the pain of the sting. By that very same token, how was I to know how many malarial mosquitoes had already stung me that evening, and how many more would sting me before the night was over?

I glanced at my watch. It was nearly 8.30 p.m. There were many hours yet ahead of us. Ten o'clock came very, disconcertingly quiet—almost peaceful. It was as if there were no other living creatures out there in the darkness. But still we knew that the most dangerous of them all lurked in the darkness, a man-eating tiger which had already accounted for several people. But did the silence mean that he had wandered away elsewhere? Was that the reason why we had heard no alarm calls from the frightened deer? It was a cheerless and depressing thought.

As if to dispel such ideas I heard a queer cry. Rather, I should say, a distinctive call, of a kind that I had not heard for quite a while now, and is not always heard in the jungle: 'Ba-oooh-ah! Ba-oooh-ah!'

Unmistakably, it was the cry of the 'lone jackal', the mysterious and unexplainable jackal which the jungle tribes say has entered into partnership with a tiger or panther, guiding the carnivore unerringly to a victim. The jackal's share of the partnership is permission, unmolested and freely, to pick the bones of the kill after the senior partner has eaten his fill.

The jackal was drawing closer with each minute, and rapidly too, for his cry every time was louder and more distinct! 'Ba-ooh-ah! Ba-ooh-ah!'

I thought of the rest of the strange rumour: that no victim could ever escape this terrible and diabolical alliance, once the lone jackal had located him or her and the hunt had begun. I shivered involuntarily, and at that instant felt Ananthaswamy's left knee pressing hard against my right thigh. The knee was trembling very violently.

I stared out into the pitch-darkness, attuning my ears to catch the slightest sound. But I could see or hear nothing beyond that ghastly cry that came nearer and louder with repetition: 'Ba-ooh-ah!'

Had my companion seen or heard something? Or was he trying to tell me about the lone jackal? Undoubtedly, he knew the strange tale himself. Perhaps he was not aware that I also knew it. Maybe he was trying to keep me alert, as I had cautioned him not to speak or even whisper at any cost. I forced my mind to put aside all thought of the rumour—true or false, mere superstition or not. To me, now, just one hard fact remained. A jackal was calling strangely, not at all in his usual manner. It was coming closer each second and would be near us very soon. It was up to me to try to find out if it was alone or was accompanied by another animal — perhaps only a pack of jackals like itself.

Once again, and extremely close this time, came that weird cry: 'Ba-oooh-ah! Ba-oooh-ah!'

Did I imagine a note of malevolent gloating in it? Almost a chuckle of derision? A laugh of triumph? Angrily I checked these absurd thoughts and forced myself to be more alert than ever. After that the weird cry was repeated no more. There was just silence, One could almost feel it. Heavy, oppressive silence, very heavy and very real.

Ananthaswamy was trembling violently. His knee beat a tattoo against my thigh. His whole body, which he had pressed against my right arm and side, shook as if with ague. I could hear him breathing hard; in short, sobbing gasps. I slipped my left arm across my lap, closed my hand over his kneecap softly and firmly, and then patted it reassuringly. I did not want a repitition of my experience many years before at a place called Closepet, just thirty miles from Bangalore. That episode had been rather funny, with little danger attached to it. An experience of the same kind now, but under the present circumstances, would certainly not be funny. On the other hand, it might well be the last experience of this or of any other kind that either the caretaker or myself would ever have.

A certain friend, who incidentally was a lady of some repute, had come to me wanting to shoot a panther. We had motored to Closepet, where we had arranged to tie up a couple of donkeys as bait. Two days later, information was brought that one of them had been killed. We drove to the spot to find the donkey had not been tethered properly, with the result that after killing it the panther had succeeded in dragging the donkey away from the foot of the tree where we had tied it to a place where there were only bushes and no trees. So we were faced with the alternatives of sitting on the ground to await his return or going back to Bangalore without further ado. My acquaintance enthusiastically agreed to sit anywhere I decided.

It was a certificate of high merit that the Shikari Thangavelu and his brother, whom we had brought with us, earned that day. For they built such a beautiful hide that the panther, when he turned up, never dreamed we were inside. Nor did we ever dream he was outside—or at least not for quite a while.

That night, too, had been dark and moonless. We could not see each other in that dense but marvellously efficient hide-out. After some time I began to hear a faint sound that came from the other side of the bush and to the left of my friend, who was sitting to the left of me.

Rub-rub-rasp-rasp. Something rather rough gliding over something rather soft. What could it be? A snake? Bush-mice? No; the first would rustle for a prolonged time; the second would cause intermittent, jerky noises as they scampered in the lantana. Could it be termites, eating the fallen leaves and dried wood? No; for they would make a sound like rain-drops pattering against the leaves of trees, diminished a hundred times in volume. Could it be caterpillars or night-beetles feeding? No; for caterpillars, when they eat, make no sound. At least, no sound capable of registering itself on the human ear. Some beetles make a very faint sound, like the clicking of fairy castnets: the mandibles of the beetles clicking together as they sever a leaf, and cause a sharp and brittle sound.

But this was something different. Rasp-rasp. Pause. Rub-rub. Pause again. Silence for some seconds. Then once more. Rasp-rasp-rasp. What the devil could it be?

Suddenly enlightenment came. It was the panther, licking himself with his rough tongue. And he was seated just outside the hide. What was more, he had no idea we were within less than two feet of him.

I remember that I nudged my friend, squeezed her arm, brought my forefinger close to her eyes and pointed towards the apparent source of the noise. Of course, she did not catch on.

Then I had another idea. I dared not whisper, for the panther would have heard me. So, with my left hand I seized one of hers. I unclenched the fingers and turned the palm upwards. All by the sense of feel. I have often wondered what she must have thought had gone wrong with me, what she must have wondered was coming next.

But I did not leave her long in doubt. With my right index finger I started tracing capital letters of the alphabet on the palm of her hand. I traced a P. Then A. Then N, and then T and H.

Then she caught on. And in real earnest. I have never seen a human being spring quite so fast to a standing position from a sitting one. Literally like lightning, she threw herself into the air, tripped over me, and fell head over heels into the bushes at my back, giving me a nasty kick in my face with her boot.

But that was not all that happened. Not by a long chalk. For the panther emulated her feat—and very creditably. Hearing what could only have been Satan himself, or whatever name Satan bears in the language of panthers, spring from the earth beside him, the panther did likewise in sheer alarm. He jumped into the air, somersaulted, and fell on top of the left side of 'wall' of our hide, next to which my companion had been seated a split second before. Realizing he was terrified and might strike out blindly with his claws or even bite, I then gave the grand finale to the entertainment by springing into the air and toppling backwards myself.

Well, it had all ended very happily and safely. We sorted ourselves out without getting too close to each other, at least, so far as the panther was concerned, and he was good enough to reciprocate. He simply vanished.

We had a great laugh over it. My friend avowed she would not have missed the incident for anything—not even for a thousand rupees. But—and here was a real question—would it have ended thus if we had been dealing with a man-eating tiger instead of an inoffensive panther?

Coming back to realities and the present, I feared the caretaker's nerves might suddenly snap. He might do anything: jump up, cry out, or even scream. And then it might not be so good—remembering we had the 'unholy partners' to deal with, and not just a very ordinary panther. I knew that Ananthaswamy was a brave man and was certainly not afraid of the tiger. But it was the supernatural part of what was happening that was unnerving him—rather, I should say, what he thought to be supernatural: the diabolical partnership, the inhuman, or rather superhuman intelligence of that uncanny 'lone jackal' in leading the man-eater directly to us. I squeezed his knee harder than ever, then tapped it gently, over and over again, to reassure him, to try to calm him.

After that things began to happen fast. I heard the pitter-patter of quick footfalls on the dried leaves of the undergrowth to my left; that was the least fortified side of our absurd little fort, the armchair side, facing towards the bungalow, from which direction we had not anticipated that anything would approach us.

They were coming towards us, and in the undergrowth; for it was the dried leaves that were making the sound. Had it come from in front or even half-left, we would not have heard it, for there the grass was thick and soft and green, and the earth was damp from the proximity of the pool.

The pattering hesitated, came forward again, and then hesitated; forward it came two or three steps, and then it ceased altogether.

The only animal that could have made the pitter-pattering sound was the jackal—that lone jackal. And he had now halted. Why? Was it because he had become suspicious? Had he located us? Or had he stopped for quite another reason? Was his role of 'guide' and junior member now over? Was it the turn of the senior partner to take over?

We had not heard a sound from the tiger. But I was certain—as certain as I was of my own name—that the tiger was there too. Every instinct in me, every fibre of my being, furiously and insistently telegraphed the message. Beware! Danger! The man-eater is close.

Another and still more disconcerting thought flashed to my brain. Perhaps the junior partner, the cunning one, the lone jackal, had deliberately walked through the leaves to make a noise and distract our attention. Perhaps at that very moment the senior partner, the executioner, who meant business, was creeping soundlessly across the damp earth and the green grass in front, to get near enough for the last fatal charge. Worse still, he was perhaps creeping up behind.

I removed my hand from the caretaker' knee, because my hand was trembling almost as much. I stared out into the darkness before me, eyes burning, ears alert. I could see nothing, hear nothing. The seconds ticked away, perhaps the last seconds I would spend on this earth. Sweat ran down my face, trickled from my cheek on to the stock of the .405 which nestled against my shoulder, its muzzle pointing vainly outwards into the black darkness, seeing nothing. My hands, holding the rifle, were clammy with sweat.

How he got behind us we never knew, but suddenly from that direction burst, with startling suddenness, the weird, diabolical challenge: 'Ba-oooh-ah! Ba-oooh-ah!'

And for the first time that evening, the unholy partner answered. We heard the tiger roar as he sprang upon the dummy. In our excitement we had quite forgotten it. We had overlooked the possibility that the jackal—if indeed he had led the tiger to his 'prey'—had led him to the dummy, and not to us. Our ruse had actually worked.

But Ananthaswamy was so frightened that he did not, or perhaps just could not, shine the torch. He appeared to be paralysed as we sat in inky darkness and heard the tiger worrying his 'victim'.

And at that critical moment we heard another sound— but a comforting, reassuring, homely sound, this time. The caretaker's mongrel dog began to bark vigorously. He must have come in search of his master. He had heard the noise made by the jackal, followed by the tiger roaring and tearing at the dummy. But instead of running away as he should have done, he had started barking for all he was worth.

I prodded Ananthaswamy's thigh vigorously with my clenched fist and whispered very faintly: 'Battery Podu (shine the torch).'

He shone it, poor fellow. But not at the tiger. He shone it directly in my face. Blinded, I grabbed the torch from him with my left hand and turned it into the darkness before us, where the dummy had been sitting. It reflected the eyes of the tiger and outlined his form very faintly behind. Raising the torch up with my left hand, I tried to hold it against the barrel of my rifle to outline the foresight while still lighting the tiger and his glaring eyes.

But luck was dead against us that night. Once again the tiger showed the man-eater's inherent fear of the man who pursues him. A loud 'Wr-r-oof!' rent the air, and the next second the tiger had gone.

I shone the torch in all directions, hoping to be able to pick up his eyes at some other spot. But he had disappeared. I shone the torch behind us, hoping to locate that accursed jackal, which most certainly I would have shot had I but seen it. But like his partner he had vanished. Then something small and brown and white ran whimpering towards us. Could it be the lone jackal? At last at our mercy? But it whimpered and barked as it came. It was only Ananthaswamy's little dog.

Fifteen minutes later the three of us got up and started walking back to the bungalow. It was obviously useless to stay any longer. The trick of the dummy had been exposed. Both tiger and jackal now knew that men were there—not unwary men—who would slay them first. So they had decided to decamp.

As we walked back to the bungalow I reversed the conclusion I had made only a few minutes earlier. I had thought that this had been my unlucky night. Now I was sure that it had, indeed, been a very lucky one. For one thing, the so-called cunning partner, the jackal, had not proved so very cunning after all. He had warned us of the tiger's coming. Secondly, when I shone the torch, but was not ready to take the shot, the tiger had accommodatingly decided to run away. Supposing he had attacked us instead? Thirdly, perhaps by his sharp bark the little dog had helped to unnerve the tiger and had made him decide to bolt when he could have sprung upon us very easily.

Yes indeed, it had been a lucky, rather than an unlucky, night! We had both been scared stiff. We had both bungled and therefore lost the tiger. But recriminations are useless anyway. So we went to sleep.

The sun, shining brightly and warmly next morning, helped us to forget our disappointment of the night before. Ananthaswamy was thoroughly ashamed of himself. He assured me, repeatedly, that it was not the man-eater he had been terrified of, but the uncanny evil spirit, the lone jackal, the inexorable brain behind the diabolical partnership. I assured him, in turn, that I had been equally afraid, but of the tiger and not of the evil spirit or lone jackal with the calculating brain. Thus, with the air cleared between us by a mutual confession of cowardice, we started planning afresh.

It was very doubtful if the trick with the dummy could be tried again with any chance of success. The tiger, having discovered that, instead of leaping upon a living man, he had attacked a bundle of old clothes and a water-pot, would not be so foolish as to be taken in a second time within twenty-four hours. So we would have to think—and think really hard—of some fresh line of action.

I studied the pug-marks of the tiger, or such of them as we could find near the edge of the pool. He had leapt upon the dummy and then slipped in the mud as it had crumbled beneath his weight, so that there were just two fairly clear impressions of his forefeet—probably at the spot where he had stood still for a second while I had tried to align the small torch with my left hand along the barrel of my rifle. They appeared to be of the same size as the tracks left by the animal I had followed the previous day along the footpath to Gunjur. On the green grass he left no trail, while the jungle behind was dry and stony, showing no marks at all.

One fact was evident. With or without the aid of the jackal, the tiger had been pretty hungry. He had attacked the dummy straight away, and that had left him more hungry than ever. He would have to eat, and soon. Therefore, either he must have killed some animal during the later hours of the night, or he would do so in the early hours of the night to come. As a rule tigers do not hunt wild game during daylight, and there were no domestic cattle at Gunjur. Alternatively he had already left, or would leave the locality at sunset, because of his fright, and take himself elsewhere.

Together we walked back along the footpath to Joldahl for about a mile. But the tiger had not returned that way. We went back to Gunjur and climbed up a knoll half a mile from the bungalow. From this elevation we carefully scanned the sky and it would betray the presence of a kill, if there had been one. But no vultures were to be seen in any direction.

Midday found us much more disconsolate, and quite unsuccessful; and then we did what seemed a very silly thing. We rigged up the dummy afresh and sat in the same hide. This seemed silly for two reasons. Firstly, it was scarcely likely that the tiger would be taken in by the dummy a second time. But, what was far more important, and what did not occur to us till we had actually taken up our positions, was the fact that, if the tiger did return, he would know where we were because of the episode of the night before.

The spotted deer called shortly after 8 p.m. The jungle at the foot of the knoll we had climbed that morning resounded to their sharp, frightened cries of alarm: 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' A stag started first, and then the others took it up. 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!'

Undoubtedly they had seen or smelt the tiger. This caused our morale to rise greatly. At least he was still here and had not gone away. But not a sound did we hear from the tiger himself, or from his partner, the lone jackal.

Ten o'clock came, and once more it seemed the predetermined hour for the curtain to rise on the tiger's activities. From a direction a little to the south of us we heard an agonizing, pitiful scream; a shriek that was but twice repeated, ending on a muffled, sobbing note. An animal had just been done to death; probably a spotted deer or a young sambar. The tiger had succeeded in finding his meal. We made a mental note of the approximate direction from which the sound had come.

After that nothing happened for the rest of the night, nor did the spotted deer call again. Ananthaswamy fell asleep after two o'clock, while I could hardly keep my eyes open. But just had to remain awake. For both of us to go to sleep would have been very dangerous indeed.

As soon as it was light enough to see, we left the hide and started walking in the direction of the death-call of the previous night. If we were very lucky we might flush the tiger while still on his kill. But there was only one thing wrong with this plan. We had no idea where the kill really was or where to look for it. We searched till nearly nine o'clock. Then the sun began to get hot, and I was very tired. I had not slept the whole night and had slept only half the night before that. So we went back to the bungalow.

Ananthaswamy started to cook his ragi balls, which I had begun to look upon more as cannon balls than anything else. Without waiting for this frightful food, I went to sleep. It was after one o'clock in the afternoon when I awoke to find an unusually large ragi ball left thougtfully beside me on a plate with a bowl of tea that had gone quite cold. Ananthaswamy was curled up asleep in the further corner of the room. Resignedly, I nibbled at the glutinous, tasteless mess. If only it had a little sugar with it, or even salt. I turned to the cold tea and emptied the bowl. At least it had some flavour.

Walking out on the verandah of the bungalow, I looked hopefully towards the south. No vultures circled in the sky. There was not a clue to lead us to the kill of the night before. And that meant that again we could not plan any definite line of action for the coming hours of darkness.

For one fact I was grateful, however. Even if the deer the tiger had killed had been a fairly small one, and he had consumed it all, the chances were that he would linger for another twenty-four hours in the vicinity before hunger again drove him out to seek another kill.

It was too late for me to walk the ten miles back to Joldahl, purchase a live bait, and bring it back to tie up before nightfall. That, I determined, was what I would do the following day. For that night there seemed nothing better to do than sit once again in our old hide near the spring, changing the position of the dummy this time. Meanwhile, as it was not yet two o'clock and the caretaker was still asleep. I decided to spend the next two hours of the afternoon in walking along some of the game-trails that led into the foothills surrounding the little bungalow.

I was sure the tiger had killed the night before, for both Ananthaswamy and I had heard the victim's death-cry. If only I could locate the spot before nightfall and sit up over it, there was reasonable certainty that the tiger would return.

With this idea in mind I once more walked south towards the hillock from which that dying scream had sounded. This time I approached it from another angle, my attention divided between scanning any ground sandy enough to show pug-marks and looking around for vultures or even a crow perched on a tree to indicate the spot where the tiger had hidden the carcass. And all the time I had to watch carefully where I was walking, avoiding passing too close to a thicket or bush that might conceal a tiger lying in wait behind it.

For just as certainly as I was hunting him, the tiger, being a man-eater, would hunt me. It was a game in which neither could afford to make the slightest error, which would mean not only the end of the game but the end of the one that made it. Such caution made my progress very slow. Eventually I reached a sandy nullah that wound around the base of the hillock. Here I stopped and turned to my left to follow the nullah for a short distance to see if the tiger had crossed it. After a while I saw pug-marks in the sand, but they certainly had not been made the night before. These were at least a week old; perhaps ten days. Disappointed, I crossed the nullah and started climbing the hillock.

The ground became pebbly, covered with the red laterite gravel that abounds on so many of the lesser hills throughout Mysore state. Because of this the vegetation became sparse, the undergrowth giving way to isolated 'vallary' plants, dwarf grass, and lantana mixed with prickly pear growing intermittently. I was glad of it because the tiger could no longer spring a surprise on me in this comparatively open terrain. By the same token, he would not have brought his kill up here, for there was nowhere to hide it. So it was useless for me to continue my search. When I looked at my watch I was surprised to find it was 3.20 p.m. I would have to hurry back, for we should arrange the dummy and be in our hide by five.

The return journey was quicker, for I did not look for pug-marks or vultures although I certainly continued to give a wide berth to large clumps of bushes or grass behind which the tiger might be hiding. It was just after four when I got back to a very anxious Ananthaswamy. Fortunately he had prepared some fresh tea, which I drank gratefully, although I could not respond to his invitation to try another ragi ball. We titivated the dummy a little and carried it back to the stream. This time we did not put it at the edge of the pool, but on the grassy patch about twenty yards from our hide. This particular spot had no merit beyond being a few yards closer to our zareba, behind which we settled ourselves shortly after five.

Knowing that, in spite of the hours he had already slept that afternoon, Ananthaswamy would fall asleep again by midnight, I asked him to keep watch till seven, when it would be dark, while I took a short nap to prepare myself for an all-night vigil. Thus it came about that I was deprived on that occasion, of listening to the full-throated notes of the birds of the day gradually fall into diminuendo, giving place to the crescendo of calls of the birds and beasts of the night.

I awoke tardily, with the caretaker shaking my shoulder. Above me, in the clear velvety sky, the stars twinkled serenely. It was inky dark and I knew that Anathaswamy had had compassion on me and let me sleep beyond the time at which I had told him to awaken me. I glanced at my watch. It was 8.12 p.m. Gently, and as soundlessly as possible, I sat up.

And then I heard it. Although far away, the sound carried clearly in the cool night air: 'Ba-oooh-ah! Ba-oooh-ah!'

Involuntarily, instinctively, my hand closed on the stock of my rifle, as the old, frightening thoughts, born of the age-old jungle rumour, once more impinged themselves on my mind. The ghastly partners were on the prowl again. Would that uncanny jackal guide the tiger to us, just as he had done two nights previously?

The answer came, almost like a spoken reply to my unvoiced thoughts: 'A-oongh! O-o-n-ooh! Aungh-ha! Aungh-ha!'

The tiger was roaring, and his voice came from exactly the same direction as had that of the lone jackal, hardly a couple of minutes earlier. The jungle-folk sounded the alarm in every direction. To the north and beyond the bungalow a sambar stag bellowed his deep-throated nasal warning, beginning with a startled 'Ponk!,' then 'Whee-onk! Whee-onk!' Finally he settled down to voicing a steady alarm-call that floated across the hills and far, far away: 'Dhank! Dhank! Dhank!' Far closer to us a muntjac, or barking-deer, uttered the hoarse, almost dog-like bark which has given him his name: 'Kharr! Kharr! Kharr!'

Hearing the calls of fear, a spotted deer hind, hidden in the thickets behind us, screamed her preliminary warning, a grating, sharp, whistling-like sound; 'Phrew! Phrew!' Then the stag, leader of the heard, took it up with a startled 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' Even a peacock, roosting and fast asleep on some distant bough, was disturbed. 'Pe-haun! Pe-haun!', he squawked as he awakened, changing to his usual 'Mia-a-oo! Aaow! Mia-a-oo!'

The whole jungle was alarmed and alert. The frogs in the pool ceased their croaking. Even the crickets in the damp grass stopped chirping. Every living creature, big or small, thinks and knows the same thing: Beware! Tiger! Danger!

But for us there was no fleeing. We were there with a set purpose —to destroy the man-eater. With tensed nerves and muscles we awaited the drama that was to be played out in the next few minutes or hours.

The cries of alarm died away in the distance as the animals that uttered them made for safer regions, as far as possible from the presence of that striped terror which to them, as to every living creature at that moment, spelled violent death. The jungle fell into a silence that was full of menace. I thought about Ananthaswamy's feeble two-cell torch, the light from which had become even weaker after the use we had lately given it. It was the one and only means of showing up the tiger to enable me to take a shot.

Nothing happened. An hour passed, an hour of utter, complete silence. Even the frogs and crickets had not begun their relatively homely noises again. More time passed, and with the lessening of tension I stole a glance at my watch. It was 10.5 p.m. and I was feeling inordinately hungry.

Then the hair at the back of my neck seemed of its own volition to stand on end. Ananthaswamy's cold and clammy hand reached out to catch my arm. He was trembling violently.

Pitter-patter. Pitter-patter. Pitter-patter. The noise came from behind us this time, once again in the undergrowth. The same undergrowth in which we were hiding, protected by our flimsy cage. Some animal was walking swiftly over the carpet of dried leaves that covered the ground. A few twigs snapped as it forced its way through the bushes and shrubs.

What could it be? Certainly not the tiger. The footfalls were too light, too swift. Could it be the lone jackal showing the way once more? Wistfully I longed for the little mongrel that yapped and so, perhaps, saved our lives only forty-eight hours before. Alas, we had made certain he would not again interfere at a critical time by locking him in the caretaker's room.

Then silence fell again. The glow from the stars enabled me to distinguish the dummy faintly, only twenty yards away: a dim, white object, almost invisible to my tired eyes. It was impossible to penetrate the undergrowth behind us from which the pitter-pattering sound had come.

After a while we heard the quick light footsteps scampering to our right, south of where we were sitting. Again silence and then a grey, wraith-like shape seemed to flit across the grass in front of us, and between us and the dummy. It seemed rather small, and it moved in a swift, peculiarly jerky, manner. It came to a stop almost opposite us.

The reflected glow of the stars did not shed enough light to enable me to see clearly what the animal was up to. It seemed suddenly to shrink to half its size, but I realized this was because the creature had turned to face us. What was apparently the head seemed to bob up and down quickly as the eyes strove to pierce the screen of undergrowth that hid us, to determine what manner of creatures we were.

One thing was certain: our position was no longer secret. The animal knew there was something or someone behind the camouflage. This was corroborated by the fact that it took no notice whatever of the dummy. It had turned its back upon the dummy and was staring at us intently.

The next moment I not only heard the cry of the lone jackal but saw the animal raise his head towards the sky to utter it: 'Ba-oooh-ah!

Ba-oooh-ah!'

Immediately after, as if galvanized into action, the jackal sped some yards away, where it stopped abruptly, turned around and stared intently in our direction.

So interested had I been in this animal's movements that it was Ananthaswamy's hand, squeezing my arm in a vice-like, painful grip, that made me half-turn my head towards him. And as I did so, my glance took in an apparition that momentarily paralysed me with shock. On the very spot where the jackal had been but a second before was a beast of apparently colossal size. In that unreal light it looked as big as a horse.

I knew that I was gazing at the tiger as he stood before us in the grass, broadside on, looking at us intently, just as the jackal had done a moment earlier.

Twice I nudged Ananthaswamy, hard and quickly. It was the prearranged signal for him to shine his torch on the animal. There was no response. The caretaker could not move. Ruefully I realized that once more he had failed me just when I needed his help. I nudged him again, with the same lack of response. With closed fist I pummelled him. But Ananthaswamy just sat and gaped. I cursed myself for having left my own torch behind. But how could I have foreseen events as they happened?

The tiger spotted my movement. Or he may have heard the infinitesimal sound of my fist on Ananthaswamy's thigh. He growled menacingly and his silhouette grew smaller and seemed to merge with the grass. I knew he had sunk to the ground preparatory to charging upon us. Two or three bounds and he would be on top of us, through the unprotected front of our hide.

The tiger's action and my conclusions were almost simultaneous. Perhaps it all took less than ten seconds.

Grabbing the torch from the caretaker's nerveless fingers, I pressed the button even before I had aligned it against the barrel of my rifle. The beam certainly did not show up my foresight, but did shine directly into the tiger's eyes. Although it was a far from powerful light, the tiger baulked appreciably. Perhaps it associated the light with the surprise it had received two nights earlier, when it had leapt upon the dummy. Whatever caused it to hesitate gave me the split-second I needed to put the bead of the foresight in a direct line between the backsight and the gleaming eyes.

Such a shot is by no means ideal, particularly as I was holding both torch and rifle together with my left hand. If placed too high, the bullet was apt to glance off the receding forehead of the tiger. But there was no time for anything else, and I squeezed the trigger.

The report of the rifle was followed by an ear-splitting roar as the tiger reared on its hind feet, its front paws clawing at its smashed face. Feverishly I worked the under-lever and fired into the exposed white fur of its chest.

It came down to earth after that, floundering around blindly while clods of mud and grass were torn up by the threshing talons as they struck wildly into the ground, and by the gaping jaws as they bit savagely in agony. Roar after roar rent the air, while I fired every bullet the magazine held. Losing count of my shots, I heard the click of the firing-pin against the empty chamber. The tiger was still writhing and squirming, but the roars had given place to a gurgle, the unmistakable death-rattle of an expiring tiger.

'Hold the torch.' I whispered hurriedly, thrusting it into the caretaker's numbed hand, while I feverishly loaded three rounds into the magazine.

I could just see the heaving flank of the tiger as it lay on its side in the long grass. The gurgle became irregular. Suddenly it ceased and I knew the tiger was dead. We waited another fifteen minutes, but there was no further movement.

The lone jackal never reappeared. Perhaps he knew by instinct that he had led his partner to his death and was sorry. Maybe he hurried away after that to find another partner, remembering that the association had hitherto brought him easy and big dividends.

We examined the tiger carefully next morning. He was a very old male with worn canines. But apart from that he appeared to have no other defects. What had turned him against the human race? Maybe it was just a whim in the first place. Perhaps he had felt old age creeping up on him and had discovered a convenient way of procuring his food. Possibly it was the jackal that had in the first place tempted him by leading him to easy prey—the caretaker's unfortunate daughter. Who can tell?

Two

The Evil One of Umbalmeru

The golden-brown of the jungle grasses, mellowed at first by the rains and then burnt dry by the merciless heat of the midday sun, covers the sides of the sloping hills that appear to have raised themselves haphazardly in this jungly corner of the land. At the base of each hill, narrow, sharp valleys have been formed by the rain-water during centuries of storms that have burst against the steeper heights and then cascaded in turbulent, muddy streams down the jungle-clad slopes to the valleys below, where, joining together, they have eventually formed the northeastern branch of the little Kalyani river.

These small valleys are choked with undergrowth: cane-bamboo, lantana and the clinging vines of the 'killer' creeper, which certainly has earned its name.

Years ago some little bird may have eaten a few of its brown berries and had then rested on a leafy perch. The meat of the berries was soon assimilated, and the little bird passed out the undigested seeds. One such seed would have fallen at the foot of the mighty tree where it had rested. Then the rains came and the little seed sprouted and a baby 'killer' was born, no bigger at first than the nail on your little finger.

But the seedling grows apace and puts out its tendrils when a month old, thus revealing itself for the first time as a plant that creeps and supports its weight on other plants and trees. It grows and grows, and by the end of the first year it has perhaps climbed a third of the way up the big tree which has sheltered it. But its stem is still no thicker than your middle finger. Within two years it has reached the top of the tree, whence its tendrils reach out hungrily towards the neighbouring forest giants, all of them, like the host tree, possibly two or three centuries old. And the stem of the creeper is now about the thickness of your wrist.

The years roll by and the creeper has completely covered and enmeshed the old tree that supports it. The stem, which was as thick as your finger and then your wrist, has now become as thick as your thigh, and it continues to grow till it becomes as thick as your body. Its weight is colossal. It has wound even tighter around the trunk and branches of its host, biting through the soft outer bark into the very heart of the wood.

Slowly, inexorably, it strangles its host to death. Years later the rains and storms come again. Perhaps on a night very similar to the one on which the 'killer' was born, the grand old tree that had played host to the innocent-looking killer crashes to earth, devoured by the 'baby' to which it once gave shelter. From amid the fallen debris the tendrils of the 'killer' reach out voraciously towards the stems of neighbouring trees, there to repeat the grim story and to earn its name of 'killer' over and over again.

Because of the heavy undergrowth in the narrow valleys, it is impossible for a man, and almost out of the question for an animal of any size to penetrate the leafy tangle. It is the home of rodents and other such tiny creatures, and the many species of snakes that prey upon them. It is always green there, despite the driest summer months and hottest tropical sun. For the weight of the surrounding hills seems to press the moisture out of the very earth itself, to make slushy marshes in the tangled verdure where the crickets chirp all day and there is perpetual twilight. No rays from the sun can penetrate the canopy of greenery. A moment's delay in sprouting and upward thrusting means that the neighbouring bush, vine or shrub has seized the opportunity and the laggard is doomed to an existence of perpetual shade and eventual death from rot and decay.

But above the valleys, on the slopes of the hills, it is different. There the sun beats down mercilessly, and in the summer months the leaves of the trees dry up and fall to the ground to form a rustling carpet upon the earth, till the rains bring decay and turn them into mould to feed the very trees from which they have fallen.

Higher up on the hills it is cooler and rockier: a region of tumbled boulders and lichens and mosses, while orchids hang from boles and branches, and the large blue-black bird, known as the 'whistling schoolboy', thrills the listening ear with his wondrous, rambling, warbling notes, carrying never quite the same melody twice.

It is shortly after midday when my story begins: and the whistling schoolboy, together with most other birds and nearly all the beasts, both large and small, is taking his afternoon siesta under some shady boulder overlooking the crystal-clear icy-cold water that trickles from a crack in the face of a rock at the foot of an overhanging escarpment. Hardly a puff of air can be felt, and the twigs on the trees and the barbed stems of the tall grasses are motionless. It is strangely quiet at this noonday hour. Even the crickets are silent, and not a leaf stirs or rustles in the neighbourhood. It is as if all the world had been lulled into a deep torpor.

But there comes a faint sound after a while, audible above the gentle murmuring of the waters of the stream as they glide over the smoothly-worn, moss-green, slippery rocks that form their bed. It is a staccato, intermittent sound. The noise of someone or something digging, and it comes from the farther bank of the brook and about fifty yards away.

A human figure can be seen there, crouched on its haunches and almost hidden from view among the huge leaves of the 'elephant-ear' lily that grows in profusion along the banks of the stream. Only the jerky movements, as the man wields his short crowbar, and the sound of the digging itself, betray his presence; for his jet-black body, naked except for a small strip of dirty loincloth, blends perfectly with the dark shadows beneath and around the huge leaves of the lilies.

Old Kothanda Reddy has come a long way from his village—the village of Rangampet—nearly twelve miles distant, to dig up the rare bulbs of the kuloo water-plant, famed as an aphrodisiac of rare and magical power, that grow here and there among the giant lilies. He has to search carefully for the kuloo water-plant, with its three-petalled, shamrock-like leaf, so tiny as to be almost completely hidden from view by its huge bedfellow. And when he finds one he has to dig deep into the mire after levering aside the movable stones in order to reach the slender bulbous white roots of the little plant. These roots, when dried thoroughly and later powdered and mixed with male semen and finally treated with magical incantations on the night of the new moon (called 'Amavasa night'), assume their full potency.

It is said that a pinch of this powder, mixed with the loved one's food, or better still administered in coffee without milk and liberally sweetened with jaggery or brown sugar to hide the slightly acrid taste, would so excite the woman as to cause her to throw all modesty to the winds, and incidentally herself, unreservedly and unashamedly, into the arms of her eager and already-prepared lover. The concoction evidently has some value—or at least a reputation for value—for old Kothanda Reddy had been selling it for some years for one rupee per pinch. He is secretly proud of the number of illegitimate children in the village of Rangampet—living testimonials in his opinion to the efficacy of the kuloo roots.

So Kothanda Reddy bends himself to the task and digs deeply, while the dull and intermittent sound of his crowbar is almost drowned, but not quite, by the gurgling and burbling sounds from the hurrying waters of the rivulet. And being thus engrossed he does not notice the malevolently cruel eyes that glare down upon him from a point immediately above and higher up the bank of the rocky little rill.

The creature that watches him makes not the slightest sound that might betray its presence. No growl of any sort issues from the cavernous chest and throat. Nor do the eyes blink once in their searching and merciless gaze.

The point of the crowbar finally lays bare the tender white roots. Old Kothanda Reddy sets it aside and stoops forward to reach with both hands into the hole he has made to disentangle the roots from the surrounding ooze.

The silent watcher above, who has been observing his every movement, notices the action and knows that the man, with his head bent forward and downward, cannot possibly see it now. A red tongue swiftly licks the lips of the upper jaw. Then the creature crouches lower before committing the first of a series of murders that will give it the name of the 'Evil One' in a score of villages and hamlets that border the three forest ranges known as the Bhakarapet Reserve, the Chamala valley, and the Mamandur High Range forests of the Chittoor district, now belonging to the state of Andhra Pradesh.

A moment later the deed is done. Kothanda Reddy never saw the massive form that hurtled through the air and down upon him, although for a second he did feel its stupendous weight, and the agony from the deep wounds inflicted by its talons as they embedded themselves in his exposed back and sides. But that was only for a moment, because the next instant powerful jaws, armed with massive fangs, crunched through his neck and the back of his skull. So Kothanda Reddy died, and he did not know the moment of his passing to another realm where aphrodisiacs are not in demand and the kuloo roots have no value.

It was quite a long time before the old man was missed at Rangampet. It had been his habit to wander off into the jungle to look for his mysterious roots and herbs, or go on a round of the neighbouring villages to sell his concoctions and magical powders and charms and amulets which had spread his reputation far and wide as a great magician or mantramkara, as he was called. And when eventually he was missed his bones were never found to associate his passing with the Evil One. But, weeks later, two wandering forest guards, who had climbed the slopes of the hill and stopped at the little brook for a drink of its icy-cold water, noticed the crowbar and beside it a dirty cloth bag that had been partly devoured by termites which, however, had not eaten the evil-looking and mouldering roots that now spilled out and lay scattered on the moist ground of the streambed. Then they remembered that Kothanda Reddy had been missing for quite a long while, causing some people to say he had left Rangampet suddenly and for good. Now, for the first time, the forest guards knew why he had never returned.

The tragedy had evidently taken place quite a long while before, and there were no traces to indicate the nature or identity of his murderer. The forest guards duly reported their find to the police chowki at Rangampet, where a note was made of what they had said.

No very definite or proper record was kept of the activities of the Evil One, at least at the beginning of its career; but reports say that the next event occurred in the following manner.

It was again afternoon and around three o'clock, when a line of seven bullock-carts were returning from the jungle along the rough forest track that led to Rangampet from a well seven miles away in the jungle at a place called Pulibonu. About a quarter-of-a-mile off the roadway, and almost opposite the fourth milestone from the village, is a perennial water hole known as Narasimha Cheruvu. The seven men halted their carts beside the fourth milestone and descended the two furlongs to the water hole, chatting as they went, to wash their faces and hands and legs in the limpid, lukewarm brown water, and then their mouths by the simple process of holding a handful of water to their lips, gargling without swallowing it, and ejecting it into the pool.

Finally, the seven men squatted down beneath a babul tree near the water's edge for a brief smoke of beedies. The beedies finished, they got up and returned to their carts in single file. They reached the carts all right. At least, six of them did— but there was no sign of the seventh man. What could he be about, and where had he got to? His half-dozen companions, with the stoical indifference and patience of the Indian villager, time being of no consequence anyhow, sat down at the roadside to wait for him and smoke some more beedies. Idly one of them remarked that Puttoo Reddy, the missing cartman, had been walking last in the file. The speaker had happened to turn around for a moment and had noticed Puttoo Reddy stop to light a beedi. He was a very heavy smoker.

Time passed and the missing man did not put in an appearance. It would have been safe to wait for him indefinitely under normal circumstances. But if they now dallied too long it would be dark before they were out of the jungle and among the fields surrounding Rangampet. That did not appeal to them.

They began to call him: 'Puttoo Reddy! Hurry up, man; where the devil are you?'—'Puttoo Reddy!'—'Puttoo Reddy!' Puttoo Reddy did not appear.

Panic seized the six cartmen. It was unthinkable to go back the short distance to the water hole to look for their missing companion. Perhaps some evil spirit had seized him. Maybe a snake had bitten him. Perhaps he had been taken by a tiger. Or a panther. Or a bear. But the majority of them ascribed his disappearance to supernatural agencies.

Within a few moments each of them had scrambled into his bullock-cart and the six pairs of bullocks rattled off with their carts as fast as they could, urged on by constant whipping. Left alone at the fourth milestone was the seventh cart— Puttoo Reddy's, the bulls waiting patiently for their owner. He never came.

During the night it grew cold and the dew was heavy. The two bulls that were still yoked to the cart forgot their owner and remembered their dry, cosy stalls at Rangampet. They travelled through the night and reached the village at about 4 a.m. There could be no tigers about, for they were unmolested.

Nevertheless Puttoo Reddy—just like Kothanda Reddy before him—had apparently vanished into thin air without leaving a trace. When a third man, and then a fourth, disappeared within the next two months, people began to say the Chamala Valley was haunted by an 'Evil One', who left no evidence of his coming or of his going, except that he took a human being with him on each occasion.

The third victim was a petty trader who had been driving a pack of ten or twelve donkeys, laden with gram, from Rangampet to a small hamlet thirteen miles away to the northwest. He had been seen eating his midday meal at the well at Pulibonu, which was just beyond the seventh milestone along this track. In fact, he had requested one of a number of bamboo-cutters who had been camped there to draw some water for him from the well, as he had no rope. The man had obliged and the petty merchant had drunk his fill. Then he had been seen reloading his donkeys and had finally moved off, driving them before him.

The following day some other travellers, coming from the opposite direction, had found the pack of donkeys scattered but browsing contentedly in the vicinity of the tenth milestone. They were still carrying the sacks of gram on their backs. But there was no trace of their owner.

The fourth man to vanish had done so at Pulibonu itself. And by a quirk of fate he was the very bamboo-cutter who had obliged by drawing water from the well for the owner of the donkeys. A party of cutters, engaged on contract to fell bamboos in what is known as a 'coupe' in the vicinity of Pulibonu itself, had been camping there for over a month. Just a few days after he had obliged the vanished merchant, this very bamboo-cutter had assembled with his companions beside the Pulibonu well to eat his midday meal and drink water. Thereafter all of them had returned to their respective tasks. But later in the evening, when the day's work was over, he had not rejoined his companions in the small huts they had temporarily built close to the roadside. Nor was he ever seen again.

The other bamboo-cutters had not immediately panicked. In fact, the following morning they set out in a body to look for him. They had come to the place where he had been lopping bamboos. A short distance away they had found his koitha or chopping-knife. Close to it was the white cloth of his turban where it had fallen off, still shaped to his head. It looked just as if he had taken off the turban carefully and set it aside on the ground, rather than as if it had fallen off.

Spreading out fanwise, his companions had thoroughly searched the jungle, the ground, even the leaves of the trees and blades of grass for a clue to his mysterious disappearance. If he had been attacked and killed by a wild animal there would surely be some traces, a smear of blood, a pug-mark, or a drag-mark where his body had been hauled through the undergrowth. But there were none of these things.

It looked as if he had just taken off his turban deliberately and neatly, laid it on the ground, and then decided to vanish into thin air. But no one would, or could, do that, and in the absence of any trace of violence, the only other conclusion that could be reached—at least in the minds of the other bamboo-cutters—was that supernatural agencies had once again been at work and had whisked away their companion just like the petty merchant before him, and the cartman before that. Even their reputed village magician, Kothanda Reddy, had been helpless before these evil spirits or spirit— this Evil One—which had now come into their jungles, and had come apparently to stay.

Once panic had seized the inhabitants of Rangampet, it gripped them in real earnest. From alarm it soon turned into terror, and it spread through all the villages. The police were alerted, as were the officials of the Forest department. Even the Collector at Chittoor was informed. But the ancients living in Rangampet wagged their heads sadly, if not amusedly. What could the police and other officials do against the Evil One?

Obviously, the only remedy was to appease the Evil One. And the only method of appeasement was by sacrifice—by blood! The police officials in the vicinity grew apprehensive. When the question of sacrifice in a case such as this arose, it was a moot point whether the frightened villagers would consider the life of an animal, such as a fowl or a goat, which were the creatures generally used for a sacrificial ceremony, of sufficient importance to propitiate this Evil Spirit that now haunted the jungle. They might get the impression that a sacrifice of a higher order was called for. A human sacrifice; perhaps a child. Such things had happened before.

So the police daffedar (head constable, who ranked as a sergeant) incharge of the tiny Police Chowki at Rangampet warned Krishnappa Reddy—the new village voodoo-man, magician and witch-doctor combined, upon whose shoulders the mantle of old Kothanda Reddy had automatically fallen as he was the only eligible candidate in the vicinity—that they would lock him up and then hang him if any of the village children were found missing.

Faced with this curb to his professional activities, Krishnappa Reddy was not easily upset. Whatever conclusion he reached is not known. It was not long afterwards that Adiraj, the nine-year-old son of a Harijan woman named Adima, who was of the 'scavenger' or

'sweeper' class, was reported by his mother as missing from the town of Chandragiri.

Now Chandragiri is hardly six miles from Rangampet, and is the headquarters of the district. A weekly market-fair, called a shandy , is held there every Monday. The people from the surrounding villages are in the habit of attending this weekly shandy to buy such provisions and other odds and ends as are not procurable in their own hamlets. What was more to the point, Krishnappa Reddy had been seen by several people at the shandy on a Monday morning. The small boy, Adiraj, had slept the previous Sunday night beside his mother. On Monday morning he had told her he intended to wander off to the shandy to see what was to be seen, and he had not been seen by anyone after that.

It was not till Friday that Adima screwed up enough courage to report to the police that her son had been missing since Monday morning. The sub-inspector, hot on the scent, requisitioned a jutka —a two-wheeled conveyance drawn by a pony—and ordered the driver to make his pony go at a gallop all the six miles to the hamlet of Rangampet. There he searched Krishnappa Reddy's hut very painstakingly, hoping to find some clue to the missing lad's fate—perhaps a bloodstained cloth or knife, or some part of his anatomy, such as his liver or heart or other organs, as these are known to play an important role in sacrificial rights. But he found nothing.

Very indignant and disappointed at his failure, the annoyed sub-inspector took Krishnappa Reddy back to Chandragiri in handcuffs and kept him there over a week. But nobody had come forward to say they had seen him talking to the missing boy, Adiraj. Worse still, nobody could be found who would at least say he thought he had seen the man and the child together. After all, remember, Krishnappa Reddy was a magician! Suppose he laid a curse upon the man or woman who volunteered such witness, false or true, against him?

So on the ninth morning the sub-inspector released the magician and told him to walk back the six miles to his village, where he was to remain and not leave without the permission of the police. To this Krishnappa Reddy had said enigmatically: 'The fox is cunning; but can he outwit a jackal?'

The sub-inspector pondered over those words for several days. Had he been alluded to as the jackal? Or was he only the fox? Whatever fate befell Adiraj was never known. But if he had, indeed, been used as a secret sacrifice, apparently the Evil One would have no part of him. For within a week the fifth victim disappeared.

This time it was a woman. And she vanished near the turning where the footpath, leading to a nullah named Ragimankonar, branches off the road from Rangampet to Pulibonu. This turning is within three miles of the village.

The woman, whose name was Venkatamma, had prepared the midday meal for her husband, who had left earlier in the morning with their cattle to graze them in the jungle where he had grazing rights. She set forth at noon to take the meal to the rendezvous they had agreed upon before he left—the sacred peepul tree that grew on the bank of the Ragimankonar nullah, where it dropped some thirty feet into a wide sandy hollow where water only gathered during the rainy season.

The man grew angry, because he was hungry; and his anger increased in direct proportion to his hunger, when his spouse never showed up with the long-overdue midday meal. He decided to beat the lazy wench soundly when she did appear. That would encourage her to be more prompt in future.

But the beating never took place. Venkatamma never came to receive it.

It was a highly indignant and furious grazier who drove the herd home much earlier than usual that afternoon, both to eat a belated lunch and to administer the thrashing his wife would long remember, instead of just a normal beating, which was the usual corrective. Once again he was doomed to disappointment. There was no lunch awaiting him—and no Venkatamma. His little daughter told him that mother had left exactly at noon, carrying the meal in an earthen 'chatty' pot.

Some days later searchers found the chatty pot lying broken beside the footpath less than half-a-mile from the peepul tree beneath which the herdsman had been waiting all afternoon. But of Venkatamma there was not a trace.

I came one day with an Indian friend to camp for a week at the Forest Bungalow at Nagapatla, which is built near the outskirts of the jungle one mile from Rangampet, on the track that led to Pulibonu. The manner of my coming and the purpose of my visit on that occasion had certainly been unusual. Although I had brought my rifle and gun as a matter of course, we had not planned a serious hunting trip. My friend, Deva Sundram, was in trouble, and I had brought him to Nagapatla to help him out of it. For, of all things, Deva Sundram had contracted whooping-cough, and by his own admission he was thirty-eight years of age.

I know little of sicknesses and far less of doctoring. But I understand that whooping-cough is a child's complaint and seldom, if ever, affects adults. Nevertheless, Deva Sundram had most certainly contracted it in real earnest from his own little son. All the known remedies had apparently not helped the poor man, nor had they allayed his fits of coughing and wheezing and whooping. I had happened to visit him one evening at his home in Bangalore. He was crouched on a sofa, his eyes popping out of his head, spluttering and making strange noises in his throat. Between spasms he waved me frantically away and stuttered: 'Go away. I have whooping-cough. If you come near me you will catch it. Go away—go away.' His wife anxiously explained that they had tried every remedy on the market and several doctors, but Dev seemed to be getting worse.

Now it so transpired that not so many years previously my own daughter, June, and son, Donald, had contracted whooping cough. I had planned to go to Nagapatla on a hunting trip about that time. My wife, who is a bit of a nurse, had thought that the dry, hot climate of the place would shorten the malady and suggested we take the children along. We did so, and she had been right. Both of them had stopped whooping within forty-eight hours.

I mentioned this to Mrs. Sundram. Dev ceased trying to choke to death long enough to listen. Being a lover of the jungle himself, he had just been able to stutter: 'Capital; let's start today,' when off he went into another paroxysm of whooping. It was rather funny to watch him and I could barely repress a smile. Later, he told me he did not think much of my sense of humour.

However, as a result of all this, we left for Nagapatla the following morning in the T Model Ford I owned in those days. We left Bangalore rather early in order not to expose Dev to the chill of the night air. For the Model T, in spite of all its virtues, is not a fast-moving vehicle, and we would never have reached Nagapatla till late at night, the distance being about 170 miles. By leaving in the morning and chugging along at an average twenty miles an hour, stopping now and then to pour water into the radiator, and for lunch, we got to the bungalow shortly before five in the evening. It was noticeably warm even then, and Dev was delighted that I had suggested coming to this place. In spite of the long and somewhat uncomfortable and bumpy journey on the hard springs of the Model T, he had been coughing less since the time we had reached low country after passing Chittoor.

Eating dinner by lantern-light on the wide verandah of the thatched bungalow, I began to chat to the 'bungalow-keeper', a humble servant of the Forest department and an old friend of mine, and asked him for jungly khubbar, the latest news of what had been happening in the jungles surrounding the little bungalow.

He was absolutely bursting with excitement and in a torrent of speech began to tell of the exploits of the Evil One that had come to the forest during the past few months and had accounted for the disappearance of five people already.

Mixed with what he had picked up in the way of rumours, and his own conjectures, plus the centuries-old background of superstition and the tales of witchcraft he had learned as a child, the old bungalow watcher told us an interesting and romantic tale, filled with fantastic details of how each of the five victims had disappeared.

Dev and I were thrilled; and to make it even more thrilling as we listened, a panther began its sawing call as it walked down to the Kalyani river that skirted the forest less than half a mile from where we were sitting. 'Ah-hah! Ah-hah!' he called, uttering a sound almost exactly like someone sawing wood, only it was far louder and deeper.

By his calls we could follow the movements of the panther in our minds, padding softly from bamboo-clump to muthee tree, and from the sheltering bushes through the long grasses to the waving belt of rushes that border the banks of the Kalyani and its softly rippling stream of water, that speeds on its way through the dense, silent and mysterious labyrinths of the darkened forest, with only the stars in a velvety-black sky to cast their reflections upon the restless current.

We tried sleeping inside the bungalow that night, but it was far too hot, with not a breath of air to relieve the stifling atmosphere. Further, the gambolling rats in the grass thatch above our heads squeaked as they chased one another about. Suddenly one of them cried out in fright and then pain. We were both lying awake on the hard-boarded cots that furnished the room. The rat had squealed loudly and pitifully for a few seconds and then stopped. Dev asked me if I could think why it had cried out. To me the answer was only too obvious. It had been bitten, caught, and was now in the process of being swallowed by some snake which had crawled into the thatch for that very purpose.

When I told him this, Dev scrambled out of bed and suggested pulling the cots on to the verandah. I thought that a good idea, too. The verandah was not only cooler, but it had a zinc roof where rats would not gambol all night, and snakes would not pursue them.

We fell asleep after that, and Dev did not disturb me much during the night. His cough was already better.

'Whe-e-e-ew! Kuck-kaya-kaya-khuck'm.' It was the old familiar call of the junglecock that awoke me next morning, just as the false dawn was fading, to give way to a short renewed spell of darkness. Then came the real dawn, spreading over the eastern horizon, to outline the distant jungle-clad hills in all the glories of shell-pink, vermilion, red and indigo blue, blending into peacock green, tinged with yellow, orange and purple. I had watched many dawns and sunsets before, but I have never tired of seeing another as the golden orb of the rising sun dispels the wreaths of mist that rise from the rich damp mould of the forest.

'Cock-a doodle-doo.' The cry came from south of the bungalow, where the hamlet of Rangampet nestled a mile away. The village rooster, hearing the challenge of his jungle cousin, could not resist the impulse to reply, although nearly two miles of cultivated lands divided them. The forest, a mile to the north, awoke to the new life of another day as Deva Sundram shook his sleepy head and raised himself on his elbows to listen.

'Mia-a-oo. Mia-oo,' called a peacock, fresh from roosting on some far distant forest tree. Spotted dear, frightened by something, insistently cried, 'Aiow! Aiow! Aiow!' Perhaps the panther we had heard the night before was returning homewards and had alarmed them.

I fried some bacon on my primus stove, which we ate with the chappatties we had brought from Bangalore, while waiting for the hot water to boil for the special coffee that Dev said he was going to make that morning. And he carried out his promise. It was delicious.

We took a walk into the jungle a little later, going as far as the peepul tree on the bank of Ragimankonar, near which the woman, Venkatamma, had so mysteriously disappeared. I scanned the ground on the outward journey and the sandy bed of the nullah at Ragimankonar itself, to see what animals had passed in the night. We picked up the trail of the panther as soon as we came to the bank of the Kalyani River. He had been a large male. A mile further on a female sloth bear had rested under a jumlum tree, while her two cubs had frolicked around her. Their tiny childlike footpads were quite distinct on the sand. Isolated sambar, spotted deer and wild-pig tracks showed the other beasts that had been abroad during the hours of darkness.

But I entirely failed to find what I had particularly sought and had hoped to discover: tiger pugs. No tiger had passed that way. Dev and I returned to the bungalow, swallowed more coffee and then walked southwards to Rangampet. We wanted to hear other versions of the strange tale that old Dadoo, the bungalow-keeper, had recounted over our dinner the previous night. Both the patel and village munsiff made us welcome with more coffee, and the villagers clustered around. The advent of visitors, especially from afar, was always an occasion for a chat.

'The Evil One, dorailu?' queried an ancient, bent and tottering and leaning on his staff. 'Aye, he is in the jungle in real earnest, and has taken five people already. But he will never fall to your firearms, sirs, for he will never give you a chance by appearing before you. He is cunning—very, very cunning indeed. Although your bullets would have no effect on him even should he show himself, he will never do that. For you are strangers, foreigners, and different from us. But he will lurk in the jungle, hiding behind a bush or in a hole in the ground, or perhaps he will shrink to the size of a beetle and climb to the top of a lofty tree, where he will watch, watch for one of us; man, woman or child, whoever happens to pass alone. Then in the twinkling of an eye he will change in size and shape. From a tiny beetle he will become a giant ogre. He will seize the unfortunate and eat him up and leave not a trace behind. It will go on like this till we are all taken or leave this accursed forest to him and never enter it again.'

The throng of onlookers nodded their heads in melancholy agreement. Face to face with such deep superstition, we felt very helpless indeed. I tried to appear disdainful and said: 'Nonsense, ancient one; I am surprised that a man of your years and wisdom should talk like a little child. Doubtless it is a tiger or panther that has turned man-eater and is causing all the mischief.'

He smiled superciliously. 'Man-eaters, dorailu, I have met before. When I was a youth one attacked me at the foot of the escarpment beyond Umbalmeru. Fortunately I was carrying a wood-cutter's axe at the time and threw it at the brute. By still greater luck the blade struck it full between the eyes. That tiger's liver turned to water that day. It whirled around and fled. So I am here to tell the tale. Ho. Ho. Ho.' He cackled toothlessly at the recollection of the incident.

'But this is entirely different, sir,' he went on. 'Look: you know something about tigers and panthers, and we know you are a hunter who has visited these forests before. Have you ever met a tiger or a panther that leaves no pug-marks; no trail of any kind? Not a drop of blood is to be found where any of the five victims were taken. Not even a drag-mark, where he pulls or carries their bodies into the jungle. If there is a tiger in these parts just now, particularly a man-eater, would we not have found his tracks in the forest, or along the dusty footpaths, in the sandy nullahs, or the moist earth on the banks of the Kalyani river? Would we not have heard his moaning calls at night while searching for his prey? And the same goes for a panther, too, although there are some harmless ones around. Resides, as you know well enough, dorailu, it is not the habit of a panther to drag his victim very far from the place he kills it. For one thing, he has not the strength.

'Finally, man-eaters invariably strike during the hours of darkness or in the evening, when the shades of night are not far off. But in this case every one of the five victims has been taken in broad daylight, and that, too, in the blazing heat of the noon or afternoon, when all carnivora are resting.

'You can't explain that, can you, dorailu ? But I can; and the explanation is simple and obvious. We are up against the Evil One himself—a spirit that can appear and disappear at will, and can assume any form or shape he wishes, from that of an insect to that of a monster, which he is. Your guns will be useless, sirs. For you are not dealing with any flesh-and-blood tiger or panther. I advise you to go home. Perhaps if you annoy him too much, he may even take one of you; maybe both of you.'

And so saying the ancient again grinned mirthlessly. To signify he had spoken the last word, the old man spat a mouthful of betel-nut and pan-leaf against the foundation of the wall of the munsiff's little brick-and-mud villa with unerring aim. There was a chorus of assent and approval from the bystanders. Even the patel and the village munsiff nodded their heads dolefully.

Dev and I made our way back to Nagapatla in silence. The old man's words rang in my ears. What manner of creature was this that left no pug-marks, no blood-trail, no drag-mark of any kind, that operated in complete silence, that murdered at the hottest hour of the day? No man-eaters in my experience had behaved in this manner. Yet I knew there was no such thing as an evil spirit responsible for the attacks. There must be a rational explanation.

The five people had been done to death at irregular intervals. The common factor in each case was that the killing— or disappearance—of every victim had always taken place soon after midday. Secondly, there had been no other human witness to the incident. The disappearance of Kothanda Reddy was largely a matter of conjecture; but certainly the cart-man, the trader, the bamboo-cutter, and the woman carrying food to her husband, had each been alone. In the case of the petty merchant, his donkeys were with him when it had happened. They, of course, could not speak. Significantly, none of them had been attacked, hurt or killed. And apparently they had not even been alarmed unduly when their owner vanished, for they had all been found grazing closely together the next day. If they had received a fright, they would naturally have scattered in every direction. And most certainly the sudden advent of a tiger, or even a panther, would have scared the wits out of any donkey.

We got back to the bungalow where we prepared our frugal lunch. Dev asked me: 'Jock,'—he always calls me 'Jock' for the twenty-eight years I have known him—'what do you think it is?'

'It can't be anything but a tiger or panther, Dev,' I replied, 'although I must admit it is certainly a peculiar and unusual beast. There are no elephants or bison in this particular forest, and the only other animal that might attack without provocation would be a sloth bear. And a sloth bear is a stupid, clumsy beast. He would certainly have left some sort of trail. Besides he would not have carried away the bodies of his victims. He would have left them where he had killed them.'

After lunch I said to Dev: 'This mystery intrigues me. I would certainly like to solve it. Tell me, would Leela'—Mrs Deva Sundram —'object to you staying another ten days?'

He was enthusiastic about it. As a matter of fact, since hearing about the Evil One, Dev had completely forgotten his whooping-cough, which had almost subsided anyhow. So each of us wrote to his better half saying we were staying rather longer than originally planned. Although we did not say so, we hoped they would conjecture that Dev's whooping cough attack was the only reason for prolonging our stay.

By three o'clock in the afternoon we were back in the jungle, searching for evidence of a tiger. We found none. We walked up the roadway as far as the fourth milestone and then broke off into the jungle to the east, walking the two furlongs to the water hole known as Narasimha Cheruvu. Even on the muddy edge of the pool we found no tiger pug-marks. A panther had come for water recently and, of course, quite a number of deer of varying sorts.

Instead of returning by the road, we came back along the banks of the Kalyani River. Here we picked up the trail of another panther in several places. He was quite a large beast, and certainly not the animal whose tracks we had found at Narasimha Cheruvu. Perhaps the large panther had been the one that had been calling the previous night.

Of one thing we were now almost certain. No tiger appeared to be in residence at that time in that part of the jungle. But there were definitely two panthers; probably more.

Was one of them a man-eater? If the answer to this question was 'yes', then there was all the more reason that at least in one or more of the five instances of the vanished people, some evidence of the attack should have been found. For a man-eating panther, although a deadly antagonist, lacks the great physical strength of a tiger to carry his human prey away bodily. Occasionally he will begin to eat it on the spot, but generally drags the remains into a thicket to consume them there. In either case there would be ample signs for even almost inexperienced searchers to pick up a trail of some sort.

We were immensely intrigued.

Early next morning we walked the seven miles to Pulibonu and pursued our inquiries at the bamboo-cutters' camp, which was still there. Nobody could suggest a rational explanation, and that some malevolent evil spirit was responsible was the universal belief.

We searched the banks of the Kalyani, the game trails, and the footpaths that bifurcate from Pulibonu. One of these leads in a northwesterly direction, and it was along this track that the petty merchant had parted company with his donkeys. The other footpath branched off towards the northeast, skirted a rocky pool known as Gundalpenta and led to another pool, named Umbalmeru, at the foot of a lofty, frowning escarpment. It was somewhere in this latter region that the first victim, old Kothanda Reddy, the village wizard, had disappeared.

These two pathways, branching off at Pulibonu, form a letter Y with the main track leading from Rangampet to Pulibonu. We had walked along the tail of this letter Y for the seven miles from the village of Rangampet to Pulibonu. From there we followed each of the top branches of the Y for more than a mile. On the section leading to Umbalmeru we came across the first tiger pug-marks. They were some days old, but they confirmed that at least one tiger was in the area. On both the bifurcating sections, as well as along the tail of the Y, we had seen the pugs of panthers, and the imprints of what was undoubtedly an outstandingly large hyaena, but no tiger tracks whatever.

Dev asked me if I thought the hyaena might be responsible for what had occurred, and I very definitely rejected the suggestion. I had met hyaenas many times and in many places, and had found them not only quite harmless towards human beings, but particularly cowardly. They would eat only carrion, such as the kills of tigers and panthers, or animals that had otherwise died. I have heard rumours of them encroaching on village burial-grounds and exhuming corpses, and I had read once or twice in the newspapers that in certain jungles in Madhya Pradesh they were credited with carrying off children from the outskirts of villages. But in all my experience in southern India I had never heard of even a single case of this sort. The hyaenas of the south appear to confine themselves exclusively to a diet of carrion, excreta of any sort from beast or bird, and filth of every description, together with such small animals as rodents, lizards and nesting birds as they were able to surprise and catch. Once or twice they have been reputed to have attacked goats and sheep.

We were dead-beat when we got back to the bungalow at Nagapatla after dark that evening, having walked a distance of over eighteen miles. And we were ravenously hungry, too. Dev and I slept so soundly that night that the sun was shining brightly the next morning when we awoke.

Three days later our friends, the bamboo-cutters, provided the first tangible clue to the identity of the Evil One. They had finished their felling operations in the coupe near the well at Pulibonu, and the bamboo-contractor, who employed them, shifted the whole party to the next coupe at which he had secured the right to cut. This coupe was at the very end of the right-hand branch of the letter Y, after leaving the main path at Pulibonu. It was within half a mile of the rocky pool that bore the name of Umbalmeru, and almost at the base of the lofty escarpment which formed the natural northeastern boundary of the Chamala Valley Reserve Forest, where the Evil One at last revealed his identity.

The whole region abounds in bamboo and the Forest Department had apportioned it into blocks or coupes. When the stems grow to a certain height and thickness, that particular block or coupe is auctioned for cutting, and the contractor who employed the party of bamboo-cutters, as the highest bidder at the auction, had obtained the right to fell and sell the bamboos in that area. Time meant money to him and so he did not delay in shifting his employees to the site where they were to begin felling operations at once.

The very first afternoon, one of the men resting from his task had happened to look up. On top of a shelf of rock, and regarding him malevolently, he saw the head and face of a tiger. He fled.

The bamboo-cutters refused to camp in the forest that night, or any longer for that matter. They told their employer that they would rather walk back all the twelve miles to the safety or Rangampet each evening and return next morning until the coupe was cleared.

The contractor was not impressed. He argued that, even walking very fast, it would take them two and a half hours each way. That meant the loss of five working hours every day, which in turn implied that so many less bamboos would be cut daily. The less bamboos, the less money for him, he reminded them. They replied that, if he did not agree, they would quit in a body. Then no more bamboos would be felled and there would be no money for him at all. They stressed that their own lives meant more to them than the bamboos they cut and the money he earned. The contractor tried to compromise by saying he would agree if they consented to a proportionate reduction in the daily wages he was paying them. But the men seemed to him unreasonably determined. They demanded the same scale of wages, threatening again to quit work.

'Ah, yes,' the contractor thought to himself. 'Times are certainly bad. Labour is getting more unreasonable, more troublesome and more difficult to manage all the world over. If I don't give in, these fellows will leave and then there will be nobody to cut bamboos for me. My curses on this beastly tiger. May it die a very painful death, and that soon.'

So he agreed to their demand and that evening at dusk the whole band, including the contractor, came home to Rangampet. On the way they had to pass the gate of the Nagapatla forest lodge where Dev and I were camped. All of them trooped inside and the man who had seen the tiger told us about it. The contractor also poured out his tale of woe. We were elated. The mystery was solved at last. The Evil One was no evil spirit, intangible and unreal, as everyone had thought. It was a flesh-and-blood tiger, as I had more than half-anticipated it would be.

The tiger chose to strike the very next day. The bamboo-cutters had returned in the morning and were working at their allotted tasks. By common consent they gave the spot, where one of them had seen the tiger the previous evening, a wide berth. The maistry, or foreman in charge of the coolies, announced the midday hour for them to stop work and gather beneath the grove of tamarind trees for their meal, by a series of long, sharp whistles, which he made with the aid of his tongue and teeth. One hour was allowed for this purpose and the bamboo-cutters made the most of it. After eating their curry and rice, washed down by bowlfuls of muddy water drawn from a passing stream that trickled from the pool at Umbalmeru, they sat and smoked, or chewed betel leaves, or dozed.

At the end of the hour the maistry gave the signal for them to return to work by a similar series of whistles, and soon the sound of the chop-chopping of bamboos, and the crash of falling stems, echoed from the glen in which they were working.

But the story of the man who had reported seeing the tiger the previous day made them nervous and kept them unusually alert. And to that fact alone did one of their number owe his life that day. For as he chopped he glanced apprehensively around him now and then. Thus he noticed the slight shaking of some fronds of tender bamboo that sprang from the ground at the base of a larger clump, and the glaring, greenish-yellow eyes that gazed at him hungrily from a background of russet brown and black and white.

The man whirled around with raised koitha just as the tiger leapt. The movement of its quarry told the feline that it had been discovered and the man was ready to defend himself. It checked its spring in midair by a convulsive twisting of its spinal cord and tail, landing just short of its victim whose sharp-bladed chopper swished harmlessly through the air, missing the animal by a hairsbreadth.

But the tiger had no stomach for this kind of reception. It had hoped to seize its quarry unawares. When it landed on the ground it snarled viciously, crouched for a moment as if about to attack again, and then turned tail and leapt back into the bamboos from which it had come and was immediately lost to sight.

The man raised the alarm by screaming at the top of his voice,' Aiyo! Aiyo! Pilli! Pilli!' (Help! Help! Tiger! Tiger!), and then made a run for the sheltering tamarind grove. His fellow workers in all directions, hearing his cries, joined in the general pandemonium and stampeded for the tamarinds. The contractor, who had just fallen asleep there, was rudely awakened by the hubbub and the men running headlong through the bamboos till they reached him.

There was no thought of work for the rest of the day. The coolies, this time headed by the contractor himself, put their best feet forward to place as great a distance as possible between themselves and the dreaded feline that lurked in the fastnesses of Umbalmeru.

Dev and I had had an early tea and were near the third milestone on the road to Pulibonu when we met the chattering batch of men making at a jog trot for the safety of the village. They all began to jabber at once and it took at least a minute to sort things out and find the man who had been through such a harrowing experience. He described the tiger as having stood 'that high' on its four feet, indicating his chest as he did so. Truly a brute of mammoth proportions.

It was 3.45 p.m. when all this happened. I told the man to hurry, because he was to come back with Dev and myself and show us the spot where the tiger had appeared. I had a reason for wanting to do this. In plain words, I wanted to verify his story if possible, by seeing the tiger's footprints for myself. You must remember that up to that time we had only heard the most exaggerated tales about this weird beast, without the smallest shred of evidence as to its factual existence. And I know from experience to what lengths exaggeration can go when allowed to run riot in the minds of the simple jungle folk.

The man was aghast. Go back to that fearsome place? Not on your life! To hell with the very idea! He said all this and much more to me in his vernacular, and I really could not blame him for feeling that way about it. But I just had to have verification of his story. So I got tough.

I will not tell you what I said, but in a little while Dev and the bamboo-cutter and myself were walking at our best pace up the road that led to Pulibonu, and from there along the righthand branch of the letter Y to Umbalmeru.

We had nine miles to cover and we did it just before 6.30 p.m. It would soon be dark, but that did not worry us unduly as both Dev and I had brought our electric torches with us in case we might return late from our long walk. Also it would not be particularly cold at night except for Dev, who, as a whooping-cough patient, really should not expose himself to the night air and the dew-fall that went with it. I muttered a word of warning to this effect.

'Whooping-cough!' he exclaimed. 'Who said I have whooping-cough? I did have it, but that was long ago.'

The coolie pointed out the place where he had been cutting bamboos, and the fronds of young bamboo that he had noticed moving and from which the tiger had emerged. We examined the ground around and behind it. In spite of the growing dusk we clearly saw the pug-marks of a tiger. Not a very large one it is true, and whether a male or female I could not distinguish because of the fading light and the wisps of fallen, rotting bamboo leaves on which it had trodden. But they were the footprints of a tiger all right.

From scrutinizing the ground I stood up a happy and satisfied man. The mystery was indeed solved. The Evil One that had puzzled us for so long was nothing supernatural or uncanny. It was just a tiger; but an extraordinarily shy, cunning and elusive tiger at that. Also a coward.

We had no bait; nothing to sit up over. Water was to be found in abundance in all directions. To go back to the bungalow meant walking twelve miles in darkness and exhausting our torch cells. So, why not spend the night in the jungle just for the fun of it? We might hear or see something, or we might hear or see nothing at all. At least it would be fun. Better than spending another night in the rat and snake-infested rest-house at Nagapatla.

I made the suggestion. Dev was enthusiastic. The man we had brought with us was shocked. But there was nothing he could do about it, poor fellow, unless he chose to walk back alone—which he most definitely did not.

The next question was where to sit. The pool at Umbalmeru itself would be as good a place as any. At least I hoped we could find a suitable spot there. The jungle where we were was too dense and the bamboos were too close. With nightfall we would be enveloped.

It was getting decidedly dark by the time we covered the short distance to the pool. There was no time to construct a hide on the ground, much less to build a platform or machan of any kind on a tree. But a banyan grew not far away, and it was quite a large old tree.

The banyan is a tree that drops roots from its branches. These in turn reach the ground, penetrate, and in due course form the trunks of other trees. So the banyan grows ever wider, covering more and more ground, and consists of many trunks, the original parent one and any number of others that have taken root subsequently. A beautiful specimen of this tree—the largest of its kind in India—grows in the Botanical Gardens at Calcutta. It covers an enormous area. It is one of the landmarks for which the Gardens there have become famous. A similarly mighty banyan grows about forty-two miles from Bangalore and two miles from a village named Thali. A stone temple originally stood at its base. The pendant roots have entirely covered the stone walls of this temple, although its entrance has been kept clear. At a casual glance the roots appear to have formed a natural cave. Incidentally a black cobra, supposed to be a hundred years old, is reputed to live in a hole at the back of the cave. He is fed with bowls of milk and half a dozen eggs at a time by the Brahmin priest who looks after the temple. The priest told me the tree is 2,000 years old.

But to return to Umbalmeru. A banyan grew not far from the pool. Not nearly such a large and old one, but it had quite a number of root-trunks which had started growing in the ground around the main stem. Two of these grew about four feet apart; in diameter each may have been about eight feet.

We took up our position sitting on the ground between the two root-trunks. I kept my rifle and faced the jungle. Dev sat with his back to me, facing the pool, and on his lap lay my .12 bore shotgun, loaded with a lethal ball in the right barrel and an L.G. cartridge in the left. The bamboo-cutter sat on Dev's right and faced in the same direction. Dev and I each had our own torches, but whereas I had remembered to bring the clamps which held the torch to my rifle, there were no clamps for Dev and the shotgun. So the woodcutter was to hold the torch for Dev and shine it if occasion arose. Except for our two flanks, protected by the root-trunks of the banyan, we were completely exposed and visible.

In front of Dev lay the pool. Unless the tiger came along the nearer bank, he would have to cross the water, which afforded some protection. At least we could hear him. In front of me was the jungle into which I could not see once it had become dark unless I flashed my torch. All three of us would have to rely on our sense of hearing alone. The tiger, if he approached either from the side of the pool or from the jungle I faced, would immediately see us. What happened next was a matter of chance and depended on the tiger's courage. Would he attack three men together or slink away?

Dev was as elated and as excited as a schoolboy at a fair.

In no time it was pitch-dark. My feathered friends, the birds, had gone to roost long before we had taken up our positions. After a while the only audible sound was the faraway hooting of a horned owl. Somewhere high above us, in the fastnesses of the towering escarpment, maybe a mile away, he sat complacently regarding the valley that stretched below him. And as he sat he hooted: 'Whooo-oooo! Whooo-oooo!'

Suddenly a bull-frog began to croak in the pool. 'Khor! Khor! Khor! Khor! Khor!' Others joined in, one by one. It became a throbbing pulsating chorus.

'Skitch! Skitch! Skitch! Skitch!' The bamboo-cutter, whose back touched my left arm, started violently. I could imagine him staring hard into the darkness. But it was only a water-frog.

Much smaller than the bull-frog and with long, slender hindlegs, this species of frog sits half-submerged at the edge of pools and lakes. Occasionally one of them will skim across the top of the water, barely touching the surface with violent kicks of its hind legs for some yards, before coming to a halt and floating with its eyes and half its head out of the water. It was this act of skimming or leaping along the water that had made the sound that had caused the coolie to start so violently.

I knew that so long as one such frog skimmed the surface of the water now and then, there was nothing to worry about. But if several of the frogs were to do that together, it would be a very reliable signal that something was coming and had frightened them, causing them to take shelter in the middle of the water.

The Umbalmeru pool itself is not very large. Oval in shape, it is about sixty feet by thirty feet. At the northern and narrower end it is bounded by rock, being a continuation of the terrain that lies at the foot of the escarpment. On the other three sides is jungle. We were sitting on the eastern bank. It was too dark to see now, but before settling down I had looked up and noticed the escarpment looming above us, perhaps to a height of 500 feet.

The bull-frogs croaked noisily beside the water behind me. Otherwise there was silence. Then the horned-owl began his eerie call again: 'Whooo-oooo! Whooo-oooo! Whooo-oooo!'

In the dell below us a plover suddenly started screeching: 'Did-you-do-it! Did-you-do-it! Quick! Quick! Quick! Quick!' Something had alarmed the bird. What could it have been? Almost together, I felt the backs of Deva Sundram and the coolie straighten and tauten behind mine. But I knew there was time yet. Whatever had frightened the plover, if it happened to be coming towards us, would take at least another five minutes, maybe ten, to arrive.

A small animal rustled the leaves in the jungle before me. Perhaps a mongoose, or one of those creatures that are distinctly rare in south Indian jungles—a ratel. The rustling alternated with silence as the small mammal stopped its search for food every now and then and listened for possible enemies. Then it began again to scratch the earth and scrape the leaves.

All at once it stopped and remained quiet. The five minutes were about up. Could it have sensed something approaching? Coinciding with the thought I felt the elbows of both my companions excitedly digging me in the small of my back.

Very slowly I turned my head. At first I could see nothing. And then, forming a silhouette like a shifting black blur against the faint lighter outline that was the surface of the water, something seemed to be moving towards us.

It merged into a black background of shadows cast by the outer fringes of the main banyan tree and was completely lost to sight. But it had been approaching us when this happened. The thought was a most disconcerting one. I felt certain it was the tiger, and to be helpless in the dark while a man-eater came on and attacked us at close quarters would indeed be an ignominious end.

I turned around, balancing on my right knee. Placing the stock of my rifle to my shoulder, I pointed the muzzle in the direction where I judged the killer would be and quickly pressed the button of my torch with my left thumb. The bright beam lit a ghoulish head, from which two bluish-green eyes stared back at me in surprise, fully reflecting the torch-light. But they were cowardly, sly, scheming eyes, albeit a bit foolish in their startled expression. The enormous head, out of all proportion to the sloping body of a large hyaena, looked up at us. I could clearly see the long, upright ears, the dark muzzle and the black patch under its throat, although being head-on to us, most of the grey body, with its straggling black stripes, was hidden.

I kept the torch burning. All three of us remained motionless and silent.

'Grr-rr-rr! Goo-doo! Goo-doo! Goo-doo!' growled the amazed beast, not being able to understand for a moment the origin of the light, nor its association with human agency.

Then perhaps his nose, or maybe just instinct, told him.

'Pfoof! Pfoof!' he snorted, darting to cover with his peculiar undulating gait, caused by his ridiculously short and weak hind legs trying to keep pace with his long and powerful front ones. He ran with an awkwardly loping motion, while the mane of hair along his neck and back stood erect, giving the illusion that he had suddenly grown to twice his size before our very eyes. His grey tail, bristling all over like the rest of him, fanned out behind like a feather-brush.

The hyaena vanished in the undergrowth, but he certainly did not leave the scene. He scampered around us in a wide circle, crackling the thickets as he forced his way through them, while making the most curious and disconcerting medley of sounds imaginable: 'Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha!' he cackled, 'What-have-we-here? Ha! Ha!'

When he came to the windward side of us and finally got our scent, he was able to realize at last that human beings sat close by. He changed his cries to a series of disdainful remarks: 'Cheey! Shee-ay! Shee-ay!' as he scurried about hoping that we would go away. But we did not go away and he was not happy about it. In fact, he grew displeased. 'Garrar! Garrar!' he growled, then breaking into a gargling-like series of protests, 'Guddar! Guddar! Guddar! Guddar! Guddar!'

In his indignant displeasure at our persistent refusal to budge, he fairly made the jungle ring, scampering around and around and making his ridiculous noises till we were about sick of hearing him. One fact began to stick out a mile. If we did not drive this garrulous visitor away, we might as well pack our traps and walk back to the bungalow to put in a few undisturbed hours of sleep.

'Shoo! Shoo!' I said. 'Shoo! Shoo!' cried Dev. 'Chee! po phissach!

(go devil),' repeated the coolie. But it was all to no effect; for go he certainly would not.

I groped in the earth beside me for a clod, found it and hurled it at the noisy intruder. He made more noise than ever.

'Goalee utchoodoo thaywoolee maylay!' advised the bamboo-cutter, which means. 'Shoot the so-and-so!' But he was only a poor hyaena, although he was certainly not minding his own business, and I did not want to do so. The din was shocking.

The hyaena came into view again—a dark shadow against the lighter sheen of the pool of water reflecting the starlight.

Just then the tiger growled on the other side of the water: 'Aa-ooo-om! Aa-ooo-om!'

The effect on the hyaena was instantaneous. He stopped dead in his tracks, as if turned into stone. His long ears were clearly outlined as he turned his head away to look for the dreaded author of that ominous sound. The next instant he was gone!

We heard a scrambling patter for a few seconds as he dashed over the fallen leaves. Then came silence: intense and frightening.

We knew the tiger had been somewhere in front of us and across the water when he had growled. But was he still there? He might be, but just as likely he might now be behind us or on either side. For tigers do not advertise their movements as the hyaena had done. Or he might have gone away.

The hyaena had warned him and he knew that all was not well. The question was: would he want to investigate? Or would he slink off, just as the hyaena had done? The next few moments would give us the answer, and it was very important to us. So we kept silent and remained watchful.

The minutes dragged by and an hour had passed. Except for the distant chirping of wood-crickets and the closer croaking of the frogs, there was no other sound to be heard. I began to wish the hyaena was back. The noise he had made, although ridiculous, had been something tangible and concrete. But this silence was disconcerting and unnerving! We grew fidgety.

Midnight came and passed, and then it became chill. We heard slight rustlings and faint scampering sounds on the dried leaves and in the undergrowth. Rats perhaps, or other small animals, feeding and quenching their thirst at the water.

A shadow glided overhead. We heard the heavy flapping of wings. Then came silence again.

'Whooo-oooo! Whooo-oooo!' The horned owl was now our companion. No doubt he knew the time when the small creatures would come for water and thus expose themselves for a few seconds. We never knew when he attacked; but we certainly heard the result.

A rabbit (called a 'hare' in India) was the victim. We heard his plaintive scream for mercy as the cruel talons of the owl drove into his tender back, and we heard the faint 'thud, thud', as the powerful beak struck his skull. Then the hare shrieked no more. For he was dead.

The hours dragged by and it grew more chilly. We could not see the sky immediately overhead because of the canopy of branches formed by the banyan; but through the clearing over the water hole, across which the giant owl had lately flapped his way, we caught glimpses of it. There were no clouds, and one or two stars twinkled distantly.

The clear sky assisted the earth in radiating what little heat had remained since the hours of sunlight. Rapidly it became colder and colder. This caused a heavy dew-fall and we could hear the moisture dripping from the leaves of the trees around us, although we were protected by the two trunks of the banyan and its branches above our heads.

The coolie, poor fellow, was the thinnest clad and he began to react to the cold in real earnest. I could feel him shivering against my back and hear the faint chattering of his teeth. The barrel of the rifle in my hands was like ice and the dew ran down it in a little trickle. I pointed the muzzle downwards to keep the moisture from running inside.

To a certain extent the cold discouraged the mosquitoes which had been very active since sunset. Even the faint scratching sounds made by the rats and other small animals subsided. No doubt they were feeling the cold too. The chorus of the bullfrogs died away to a spasmodic individual effort by one or other of their number. It was that hour, early in the morning, when even the denizens of the night appear to rest.

After 3 a.m. the wind began to blow. The warm air in the valley below us, which had cooled by now, had long risen from the ground to be replaced by the cold air from the lofty escarpment to the north and northeast. It soughed and moaned and bent the tops of the lesser trees as it blew into the valley in short violent gusts.

I began to forget about the tiger and felt sleepy. But it was too cold even to doze. The distant crow of a single jungle-cock indicated the time as past 4 a.m. Our vigil was drawing to a close and the tiger had not come.

The false dawn came at about five o'clock, with its hopes of an early sunrise. Then, as usual, followed a few minutes of renewed, intensified darkness. The faint outline of the summit of the escarpment to the east showed that the night hours were coming to an end at last. The valley below was still enveloped in darkness as the crags above began to show up in the most delicate hues of pale pink, curiously mixed with a mauve and blue background, before which wisps of mist spiralled upwards from the trees growing on the slopes like the smoke-signals of a band of marauding Red Indians.

'Whoomp! Whoomp! Whoomp!' The rousing cry reverberated across the ragged perpendicular face of the escarpment and boomed with a hollow echo in the wooded valley below. It was the joyous call of the male langur, the large grey monkey with the whiskered black face and abnormally long, curved tail, that lives in the forests of south India, as he awoke to greet the coming day. Soon other langurs joined in and call after call echoed from crag to cliff and then re-echoed across the forested valley to fade away in the distance.

It was quite bright where we were sitting, although the sun had not topped the serrated line of rocks and boulders that marked the summit of the escarpment to the east, when at last we rose to our feet, stamped and stretched and yawned to dispel the effects of a sleepless, uncomfortable night, and began the twelve-mile march to the bungalow at Nagapatla. None of us was in a good mood, nor did we feel like talking.

At the bungalow gates we met some of our friends, the bamboo-cutters, who had come there from the village to await our return. 'What happened?' asked someone. 'Did the tiger come?' queried another. 'Did it attack you?' asked a third.

'Damn the tiger,' I replied crossly. Then, relenting, I told our coolie to acquaint his colleagues with the details of all that had happened. They were discussing it loudly as I placed the kettle on the primus stove to make hot water for tea. And they were still discussing it when Dev and I tumbled onto the hard beds and fell asleep at once.

We slept through the afternoon and awoke about 4 p.m. to eat a late lunch, washed down with more tea. Then we put our heads together to think out some way of settling accounts with the tiger.

Marshalling the facts, or rather as many of them as were known to us, we found we were up against an animal that did not follow the normal habits of a man-eater in the least. Firstly, all its human kills had been made in the afternoon, during the heat of the day. Secondly, they were all more or less localized and within a few miles of the Umbalmeru pool and escarpment where he appeared to be living. Ordinarily, man-eaters cover a large area and follow a more or less distinct beat, which sometimes extends for more than a hundred miles. Thirdly, those of his victims whom he took he made away with completely and mysteriously. Not a single body had been recovered. Fourthly, he appeared an abnormally shy animal, with more than the usual degree of cowardice that all man-eaters evince towards the human being who fights back. In this case the bamboo-cutter had frightened it off with his koitha, while the hyaena's warnings of the previous night had caused it to slink away when it could easily have attacked us. Fifthly, it did not seem to have the habit of wandering about its jungle domain as tigers usually do. We had not found this animal's tracks along any of the jungle-paths or stream-beds which we had searched for that very purpose. Sixthly, we had not received any reports of cattle being killed in the surrounding area.

We could make nothing of it, so we decided to do the only possible thing—tie up a live bait or two in the vicinity of the Umbalmeru water hole, although we scarcely expected they would be taken.

With this in view we went down to Rangampet village after dinner that night. The villagers co-operated readily, and Dev and I each bought a three-quarters-grown bull for the sum (in those days) of about forty rupees. In English currency this ran to about three pounds apiece! One of them was brown in colour, the other ash-grey. We deliberately avoided animals that were white, or even black, as some tigers shun baits of either colour, but especially white. We wanted to take no chances. Having completed the deal, we led our animals back to the forest lodge and quartered them for the night in the motor-shed, pushing the Model T into the open.

Early the following morning we got busy and with the help of two of the bamboo-cutters led our animals all the way back to Umbalmeru. We tied one under the banyan at the side of the water hole, and the other about two miles away, near the track leading back to Pulibonu. Here also we tied it close to a selected tree. We did this deliberately so that in the event of either animal being killed, a suitable tree would be readily available in which we could sit and await the tiger's return.

All this took us till past midday, so that it was evening by the time we returned to the rest house at Nagapatla.

The following morning we used the Ford to cover the first seven miles of rough track to Pulibonu. The car could go no further for the simple reason that the road ended there. So we visited our baits on foot. They were both alive.

Untying each in turn, we led them to water, and then retied them, leaving both with enough to eat until the next day. There was nothing more we could do after that. Dev said he would like to visit some of the temples at the town of Tirupati, which was about fifteen miles from the bungalow. So we did that.

Tirupati is a centre of Hindu pilgrimage, devotees coming there in their thousands throughout the year to pay homage to the god Govinda, whose name they keep chanting aloud. All the women who visit these shrines are required to shave their heads entirely as an outward token of having made the pilgrimage. Considering they arrive in hundreds daily, the quantity of hair removed must be colossal.

Just before returning we dropped in at the refreshment room on the railway station for tea. No train being due for some time, the manager was at a loose end for the moment. So he came over to the table where we were sitting and opened a conversation to pass the time. In the usual easygoing manner of India he began asking who we were, where we had come from, why we had come, and numerous other questions.

Dev good-naturedly gave him all the details. The manager, who professed to know a great deal about shikar, also agreed that the tiger's general conduct was most unusual and not in keeping with a man-eater's normal behaviour.

Then he said something that made me sit up with a jerk. 'I wonder if it could be the tigress that escaped some months ago from a circus that came to town.'

Now it was my turn to ask the questions, and I fairly rained them on him. What circus? How long ago? At which place had the tigress escaped? Had a report been made? Had she been recaptured?

He answered my questions piecemeal, and from the information he gave we gleaned the following facts. A small travelling circus with a tigress and a few other animals had visited Tirupati and had camped a mile or so outside town. The proprietor of the circus had come to make friends with the manager of the refreshment room at the railway station because they were not teetotallers, and in a district where prohibition prevails people who are not teetotallers find much in common in their search for that of which they both feel in need.

One evening, after a few glasses had been surreptitiously consumed, the proprietor of the circus had loosened up a bit and had confided to the manager of the refreshment room that two nights before the tigress had escaped. The stupid fellow who looked after her had not closed the door of her cage properly. The proprietor had been afraid to inform the police, and as he was a likeable fellow, held in esteem among his own artists and employees, he was confident that they would not divulge the secret. Nobody had. A half-hearted attempt had been made to find the missing tigress, but no one appeared to have seen her. As the jungle lies within a mile of Tirupati, the proprietor naturally concluded that his tigress had found her way back into the forest where she would be able to look after herself. He became reconciled to his loss and the circus moved on.

I asked the manager if he had ever seen this animal before her escape. He replied that he had, as the circus owner had given him a free pass to visit the show as often as he pleased. She was not a very big tigress, but she was full-grown. He added that he thought she was unusually fierce, having often seen her snarling and growling as she ate her usual single meal of beef each day. He also felt she had never been thoroughly broken in, as he never saw her put through the usual acts of circus tigers.

A curious thought entered my mind and I asked him: About what time did this tigress receive her daily meal?'

He glanced at me rather in surprise, but answered promptly enough: 'In the afternoon, after the circus-people had finished their own lunch.'

The enigma was solved, and the animal's peculiar habits were no longer a mystery. For I was sure now that the man-eater was the escaped tigress and no other beast.

She maintained her habit of eating at midday. She was terrified of people—unless she could spring upon them unawares and kill them quickly. She could not hunt properly and hence had not developed a specific line of beat like a normal man-eating tiger. Being fundamentally still afraid of people, she made off with her human kills as quickly as she could, leaving no traces behind, in order to devour her victim very far from the scene of the crime. And, still not completely rid of her habits after living so long in a cage, she had found some shelter for herself, probably a cave, and had made it a permanent abode, instead of wandering from one area of forest to another, after the manner of normal tigers, whether man-eaters or not.

The more I thought about it, the more certain I felt that my theory was correct. And her abode was doubtless somewhere in the vicinity of Umbalmeru; probably a cave or rocky hollow of some kind at the base of the escarpment. After all, as the crow flies, the distance from Tirupati to the escarpment near Umbalmeru could not be more than twenty miles, if as much. And that is no great distance for a tiger to cover.

I did not confide my ideas to Dev just then, but kept plying the manager of the refreshment room with more questions. But it was soon evident that he had told us all he knew. The only additional information he could give was that the circus had shifted from Tirupati to Renigunta, and from there to a place called Puttur, and then to Arkonam, a railway junction about forty miles from the city of Madras. He had kept up a desultory correspondence with the proprietor and had received letters from all these places. Then the letters had stopped, so that now he had no idea where the circus had gone.

One last thing he told me, and that was that he remembered the tigress had been called Rani.

When eventually we left Tirupati after dark that evening to return to the forest bungalow at Nagapatla, I felt our visit had been most opportune.

Before dawn next morning we drove to Pulibonu, left the car and visited our baits again. Both were alive and well. After that we scoured several nullahs and pathways, looking for fresh tiger-pugs and hoping to encounter our quarry. All without result. It was evening when we got back to the bungalow. We had dinner and then went to Rangampet to enlist the aid of a man named Ramiah, who had served me on hunting trips in the Chamala Valley years before. I hoped he would be able to help me now.

Ramiah is a rather extraordinary fellow, at least so far as villagers go. The first time I met him, which might have been eight to ten years previously, he had attracted my attention by his quite unusual interest in matters no other villager would have bothered to know. Ramiah claimed to have discovered a secret herb growing in the valley, the leaves of which, if eaten, would counteract the effects of the bite of any poisonous snake. He said he kept a stock of these leaves, dried and powdered, with him in his hut, and by means of them had saved the lives of many people who had been bitten by cobras and Russell's vipers, and also of cattle that had been bitten. At my request he had brought me a small plant which I had taken back with me to Bangalore and attempted to grow in my garden. Unfortunately, it died. Ramiah had also discovered another herb, a couple of leaves of which, if dropped into a teapot while the tea was being made vastly enhanced its flavour. I had tried this herb and discovered his claim to be true. He had presented me with a smooth egg-shaped stone the size of a tennis ball which he said would always exude a trace of moisture, particularly in the mornings. I had also taken this stone back with me to Bangalore and found that what he said was true. The strange phenomenon had surprised and interested me enough to show the stone to a geologist at Bangalore. But that gentleman, as amazed as I was, had offered no explanation for the strange occurrence.

On one occasion, at the end of a hunting trip, I had offered to pay Ramiah for his services. Instead, he asked me to buy a piece of land at the head of the valley where the forest began, which was for sale cheaply, and allow him to cultivate it, and in return he would serve me any time I wanted when I came to Nagapatla on a shooting trip.

I had done what he asked and bought the land, which was about two and three-quarter acres in extent, for fifty rupees (less than four pounds in English currency). Thereafter, Ramiah had cultivated the land rent free for himself, and had willingly come to my assistance whenever I had called upon him.

So we got Ramiah out of his hut that night and, sitting on his doorstep, I related what I had heard from the refreshment room manager. I had already consulted Ramiah when we had first heard about this killer, but as he had been one of the many who had subscribed to the 'evil spirit' theory, I had not thought it worthwhile to enlist his aid until now.

After relating the story of the escaped tigress, I said: 'I am sure that if any man knows every nook and corner of the Chamala Valley jungle, that man is you. Now think very very carefully. Is there a cave at the foot of the escarpment in the vicinity of the Umbalmeru pool, or within the radius of two or three miles from it?'

His answer came immediately. 'Why certainly, sahib. There are—now, let me see—one, two, three, four, and yes, one more, five caves, within about the distance you have said. Two of them are, roughly speaking, to the north, and the remaining three to the east. One of the two to the north is rather high up on the face of the escarpment. I don't think a tiger would readily use it. The ascent is too steep. I know the langur monkeys play around that cave, but they don't live in it either. All the other four would be quite suitable for a tiger to lie up in.'

I was elated and showed my joy. 'Good man, Ramiah,' I exclaimed. 'Will you lead me to each of them?'

'Surely, Sahib,' he assented readily. 'I have promised to accompany you anywhere you want in this jungle, and at any time, in return for allowing me to cultivate your land, free of rent, these many years. That promise I will keep, Sahib,' he concluded simply.

I questioned him further about these caves and gathered that three of the four he had in mind were rather small. The fourth, which was one of the three caves at the foot of the escarpment to the east was considerably larger than the others and had a name of its own: 'Madapenta', because it was close to a small pool formed by a rill that trickled down the escarpment. Penta signifies a pool.

'We will be able to visit all four of these caves in one day, will we not?' I asked him.

'Surely, Sahib,' he assented. 'The cave to the north is hardly a mile from Umbalmeru. The three to the east are from two to three miles from the water hole, but within a mile of each other.'

'I will come for you in the car tomorrow morning at cockcrow,' I told him. 'Be ready. With an early start we should be at Pulibonu by daybreak. We will walk the remaining distance to Umbalmeru, and from thence to the caves, beginning with the one to the north.'

'As you say, Sahib,' he acquiesced immediately. ' I will be waiting for you.'

Dev and I went back to the forest bungalow as happy as two children. There Dev spent till midnight cleaning and re-cleaning the .12 shotgun. He even cleaned my rifle.

The grey-hackled junglecocks were crowing when the Model T chugged out of the gate of the Nagapatla rest house next morning, and their cousins, the village roosters of Rangampet, had begun to answer them when we arrived at Ramiah's hut. It was almost 5 a.m. He had heard the Ford approaching and stepped out of the doorway as I stopped the car.

We drove the seven miles to Pulibonu, and it was 6.5 a.m. when we halted near the well and set out on our walk along the footpath that formed the right-hand stroke of the letter Y and which ran, very roughly, in a northeasterly direction to end at the water hole at Umbalmeru. We arrived at the pool a few minutes before eight, and the sun was shining brightly in a cloudless sky.

Ramiah told me that from Umbalmeru no well-defined footpath led to any of the four caves we were about to search. We would have to rely on his sense of direction alone.

And Ramiah's sense of direction never failed him. He led the way, armed with his koitha, which is a long knife curved at the end, fitted to a bamboo handle about a foot long. It resembled a question mark without the dot at the bottom; but it proved extremely useful when, at times, he employed it to hack a path through the undergrowth.

Very often we met game trails leading in all directions, made chiefly, as I could see from the tracks themselves, by sambar and wild pig, with an occasional trail left by sloth bears, which had dug for roots here and there, and had systematically demolished every ant hill in their eager search for termites. But such things did not deter our guide nor cause him to lose his sense of direction for a moment. Onwards he moved to the north with me just behind him, holding the .405 ready against a surprise attack. Dev brought up the rear with the shotgun.

The land began to rise steadily towards the base of the escarpment which we could see between the trees, frowning down upon us. Soon the larger trees gave place to more bushy undergrowth and boulders lay scattered about, increasing in size and number as we rose ever higher. I had little doubt these had, from time to time, been washed down from the escarpment by rain and the consequent landslides.

Ramiah stopped half an hour later and said in a whisper that we were approaching the first of the caves. We redoubled— if that was possible—the caution we had been exercising since leaving the pool at Umbalmeru. The man-eater might be lurking anywhere, without our knowing anything about it.

Then Ramiah stopped a second time, indicating with a nod of his head, but no spoken word, where the first of the caves lay. And I saw it—the cave, I mean. A pile of boulders had fallen, one upon another, and in doing so had formed a cave. I could see the opening now. Not a large one by any means, perhaps a yard in diameter at the entrance, but big enough to shelter a tiger very easily.

Stretching out my left hand, I touched Ramiah's shoulder. Then I drew him back and took the lead, placing him between myself and Deva Sundram, still at the rear. On tiptoe, and as silently as possible, taking care not to tread on a dried piece of wood or leaf that might crackle, I inched forward till I stood about fifteen feet from the mouth of the cave. Unfortunately the ground before it was hard and stony. Besides, straggling clumps of spear-grass grew everywhere. No tracks would be visible on such terrain.

I made signs to Ramiah and Dev to pick up stones and throw them into the cave. They understood my signals and in a few seconds a desultory bombardment began as they hurled stones, big and small, into the narrow entrance.

Nothing happened. I could hear the thud as each stone fell, and the clatter as it bounced and rolled inside. Certainly, if a tiger was hiding there, it would either charge out upon us or at least demonstrate in no uncertain manner, by growling. But nothing whatever happened. There was complete silence, except for the thud and clatter of the stones. It began to look as if the tiger was not at home.

More stones followed, but without response of any kind. After ten minutes I was sure the cave was uninhabited. I moved right up to the mouth, where the grass and rubble ended and plain earth formed the flooring of the recess. Still keeping a sharp lookout on the dark interior, I stooped down and glanced at the ground for tracks. There were no pug-marks anywhere. The only animal that inhabited the cave, as I could see from his small footprints, was a porcupine; and I knew that no amount of stone-throwing would ever induce him to come out and face the bright sunlight. Being a creature of the night, a porcupine can only be smoked out of his burrow, and that with considerable difficulty. Generally, he will prefer to suffocate under such conditions, if he cannot manage to burrow still deeper.

Just before we turned away, Ramiah pointed upwards to the escarpment. He directed our attention to the second of the two caves he had said lay to the north of the water hole. We could just see the entrance, hidden as it was by the rank grass that half-concealed it from sight. The cave looked to be at least 200 or more feet above us and was perhaps two furlongs away.

Ramiah had been right. No tiger would attempt that steep climb. Besides, there was another piece of conclusive evidence that no feline lived in that second cave. A langur monkey sat complacently at the entrance staring down at us inquisitively. If a tiger had passed anywhere nearby, certainly if one was living in the cave, the langur would not be there. They are far too cute to take chances.

We made our way down the slope to Umbalmeru and then set out for the three caves that lay at the foot of the eastern escarpment. Once again Ramiah showed himself a good judge of distances. The first cave took us nearly forty-five minutes to reach, by which fact I judged it to be a little over two miles from the water hole. The sloping ground and terrain were much the same, but the cave appeared to be a chasm rather than a regular cave, in that it was open at the top and had been formed by a big slice of the rock face that had fallen in a landslide and lay about ten feet from the base of the cliff. The piece that had fallen looked to be some twenty feet or more in height, and the space of ten feet between it and the escarpment was what Ramiah had called a cave. Being open at the top to admit rain and sunlight, it was thickly overgrown with lantana and long grass.

Although a wonderful place in which to hide temporarily, it did not seem a very likely spot for a tiger to choose to live in for any length of time. For one thing, it was too choked with undergrowth. A tiger does not like to make a home in which he himself might be taken by surprise.

I told my companions to follow the same plan of hurling stones into the recess while I stood guard over them with my rifle. As expected, nothing happened. After a while we drew closer. The ground was too stony and hard to reveal tracks, but the intense bombardment of stones that Dev and Ramiah rained into the gap soon made it clear that the tiger was not there.

We skirted the escarpment southward to the next cave, which we reached in about fifteen minutes. It seemed to form the exit of some sort of subterranean passage which led into the escarpment. The opening was comparatively small, at most two feet across. The usual stoning followed and we achieved a negative result for the third time. Once again the ground was too dry and hard for tracks, so we approached the mouth of the passage and set fire to the grass that grew around.

Even if our stoning produced no results, the sight of fire and smell of smoke would bring the tiger out at the double. Still nothing happened. We spent the next ten minutes or so carefully extinguishing every trace of the fire we had made. We knew too well that a single glowing ember would be quite sufficient to start a forest fire that might blaze for days and destroy thousands of acres of timber.

To say we were disappointed would be putting it mildly. We were thoroughly crestfallen. But one cave remained to be visited, the largest of the lot, the one Ramiah had called Madapenta. He told us it was over a mile away.

With little hope of success we set out for this place. Just before we reached it we came to the little jungle pool that gave the cave its name. And here our hopes soared skyward. Clearly imprinted in the mire at the edge of the pool were several sets of pugs, and they had been made by a tigress. Obviously this was her main source of water.

It took another 200 yards, at least, of careful noiseless progress before the cave itself came into view. It had a large entrance, more than five feet in width and perhaps a little over that in height. Lastly, it was clear of grass and undergrowth and provided an excellent view of the approach of an enemy to a lurking tigress within. How excellent this was became clear within the next few seconds. Before Dev or Ramiah could throw the first stone, there came a thunderous growl from the darkness within, and the very next moment out leapt the tigress.

The bright sunlight blinded her for a while. Then her eyes adjusted themselves and she spotted us. She hesitated a brief second, then cowardice, which appeared to be quite strong in this animal's make-up, overcame her. She swerved to her right to make off.

At that instant I acted on the spur of the moment. Loudly and sharply, I called: 'Rani! Rani!'

The tigress halted. She turned to face me. There was ferocity in her countenance; but also a strange expression of bewilderment, recognition and partial submission. But our presence was a riddle to which she never found the answer, for, taking no chances, I fired into her chest, following up, as she toppled forward, with a bullet in her brain.

She was a young animal, hardly full-grown, and obviously thin and underfed. What had turned Rani into a man-eater?

The answer was plain. Years of captivity had rendered her useless at the art of stalking and killing wild game. On the other hand she was conversant only with the appearance and habits of mankind, although she never to the very end lost her instinctive fear of them.

So, in these circumstances she did the only possible thing to keep herself alive. She killed her human victims by surprise attack, and then took the bodies far away, where she would be safe from the danger of pursuit while she fed.

Before closing this story may I add a word of caution that, of course, will only apply to people living in places such as India, Africa and other countries where wild animals can be caught young and kept as pets. I know a lady who brought up a panther cub until it grew too big and too dangerous to be kept any longer. She was passionately attached to the animal, which was equally fond of her. She would not hear of presenting it to a zoo or a circus, as she was convinced that it would be ill-treated at both places. Shooting it, naturally, was for her out of the question. So she took it by car to a certain large jungle and there set it free. Incidentally, she told me later with tears in her eyes, that as the car drove away the panther bounded along behind in an attempt to get back to her.

I wonder if this well-meaning but sadly misguided lady quite realized what she was doing. She had just liberated a very dangerous animal which she had brought up from a cub upon boiled meat, rice, bread, pudding, porridge and what not, omitting to mention such delicacies as sweets, ice-cream and things of that sort. This unfortunate creature was totally unfit to look after itself and catch and kill its legitimate prey. There were just three things that could happen to it, and all of them most unpleasant to contemplate. It might approach the first human being it met in a friendly spirit and be killed for its pains. Secondly, it might starve to death, although this is very unlikely, for when driven by hunger the instinct for self-preservation would become so strong that the panther would eventually kill something. Thirdly, and worst of all, the animal might become a man-eater.

She told me what she had done less than a week after she had liberated her pet. I advised her to scan the newspapers closely for the following month or so. I did the same.

Within a few days we both read a short announcement that told of the strange behaviour of a very emaciated panther that had wandered into a village (which was within a few miles of the place where she had liberated her pet) and gone to sleep inside a grass hut. Then came the sad part. The villagers had closed the door of the hut, poured kerosene oil over the thatch and set fire to it, burning the poor beast to death.

The lady was heartbroken at her pet's horrible end. But I wonder what she would have felt had she read instead that it had become a killer of men, forced to the pernicious habit by her foolishness in setting it free when it was totally unable to fend for itself.

Three

A Night by the Camp Fire

My wife says i am eccentric. my friends say so too. and i suppose they are all quite right. But what if I am? I like being eccentric at times.

One of my habits, even to this day, when I get disgusted with the sight of too many people and the awful noise they make, is to jump into my car and drive away to some nearby jungle. There I will leave the car, wander off into the forest, make myself a nice large camp fire as night approaches, and spend the hours of darkness just seated by the blaze. I throw fresh wood on the fire as occasion demands, having already gathered it before darkness fell. Eventually the supply of wood will give out, or I might feel sleepy. In either case there is only one thing to do. That is to go to sleep beside the fire. The embers will keep me warm when the chill and dewfall of early morning might otherwise prove uncomfortable. They will also protect me from elephants and snakes, the only creatures to be feared when no man-eaters are around. With daybreak I will go back to the car and come home and wonder why I did such a foolish and eccentric thing, and what I got out of it.

But I have done it, and will do it, again and again.

Other forms of this madness are to go out to the jungle on moonlit nights, and also on dark nights, and sit behind some tree, or on a rock, or beside a water hole, and just watch and listen.

Those who have had the good luck at any time to sit beside a camp fire, out in the wide open spaces, even where there was no danger from lurking animals or poisonous snakes, might be able to understand my fondness for this pastime. There is a pleasure that comes to one at such times that words cannot describe. It touches some hidden inner chord and sets one's soul afire!

Perhaps it is on such occasions, and in such solitudes, that a man's inner self comes into closest touch with the infinite. I feel very near indeed then to God, far closer than I can feel in any church where the padre, either on the basis of a monthly salary or other means of remuneration, automatically repeats words for the uplift of my erring and sinful self.

However, let me not talk about myself. Perhaps you would like to come with me on one of these night prowls—'camp fire trips' you may call them—into the jungle.

The Studebaker is ready with six gallons of petrol in her tank. She also has a six-cylinder engine and is rated to have horse-power, although how many of those horses are alive after these many strenuous years, I wonder, nor try to guess. Just bring some sandwiches, a water-bottle and if you can get it, a thermos flask of hot tea. I will like you all the better. Your great coat and a cap, too, in case you feel cold, and a pipe, tobacco and matches if you are a smoker. That is all that is necessary. It is 3 p.m., but we have only about fifty miles to cover.

I am taking you to a place called Kundukottai, where there is a nice forest. Two ranges of hills converge there; and two streams, coming from different directions, join together to form one large stream. In the vernacular, the big stream is called Doddahalla (big hollow or big ravine), but I have called it the Secret River. The jungle around this area holds a few animals of every species, except bison. I am told bison were once there also, but they have been shot out long ago, although the forest range officer says they were wiped out by foot-and-mouth disease contracted from the village cattle that graze in the forest. After all, how can the poor man admit the real fact? He is, after all, the range officer.

We are away, and for the first twenty-five miles of our route we spin along a metalled road. At the nineteenth mile from Bangalore it leaves the state of Mysore behind and enters the state of Madras. Exactly at the twenty-fifth milestone we come to the small town of Hosur, which is also the taluk headquarters of that area. From Hosur we branch off the main road and for the next sixteen miles travel along what is known in India as a kutcha road—that is, a road made with sand and stones where, for some reason or the other, these two components never seem to be in the proper proportion to make it a good road. One or the other predominates in turn. The stones cut the car's tyres, while the sandy stretches make heavy going. In the rainy season these sandy sections become very entertaining for the motorist with a sense of humour, if there is such a man, for then he will slide and skid from side to side, or perhaps get bogged down to the axle if he is not careful. But this is not the rainy season and we cover those sixteen miles in fair time, to reach the smaller town of Denkanikota, which is the headquarters of two forest range officers controlling different blocks of jungle.

Now we leave the stone-and-sand road and travel on a road that is not a road at all, for this is nothing but a glorified bullock-cart track. About three and a half miles from Denkanikota this track crosses the upper reaches of one of the two streams I have mentioned. There are no complicated and expensive bridges here; the track just splashes through the stream. This is fair enough, unless there has been heavy rain. Then the stream becomes a torrent and the water may rise to a depth of ten feet. When that happens you just go back to Denkanikota and try again after two days, when the water-level may have subsided. Just think how lucky you were to have been on the Denkanikota side. Supposing you had been on the other bank; you would have had to remain there till the flood went down.

Twice more we cross the stream that snakes alongside the track. At the eighth milestone we pass the hamlet of Kundukottai, overshadowed by a rocky hill noted for two things—panthers and the large rock-bee.[1] And remember that of these the bees are far more dangerous when really roused.

The track now drops sharply into a valley while curving around the spurs of the rocky hill. But we have only a mile more to go, and there, beside the ninth milestone, we must leave the Studebaker after first backing it and turning it around for the return journey—rather an awkward manoeuvre since the track is scarcely wider than the length of the car, with a steep decline on one side.

It is done at last. We place four stones behind the four wheels besides leaving the car in gear, just in case some fidgety wayfarer tampers with the controls. Also we must disconnect one of the leads to the battery, since the wayfarer may switch on the lights for you and allow them to burn. Carrying the few things we have brought with us, we must walk sharply downhill to the Doddahalla stream, the two halves of which have united less than a mile higher up, to form the one watercourse which I have named the Secret River.

Indeed, it has secrets of geological interest further down its course. But you will not tempt me to divulge them, for if I did, this beautiful stretch of forest and stream would be invaded and commercialized to their utter destruction.

At last we reach the bed of the little river and find it a veritable fairyland. There is not much water in it at this season; just a tiny trickle that meanders sometimes down the centre of the sandy bed, and at other times curves from bank to bank. Both sides are thickly wooded with towering, gnarled trees—tamarind, jumlum , and muthee mostly, with here and there a stray flame-of-the-forest, ficus tree, banyan, neem and mhowa. Between the trees the tall, feathery stems of bamboos bend gracefully over the sandy stretches. Sudden currents of cool breeze now and then rush down the valley and blow along the streambed. When that happens, the branches of the trees and the lofty tufts of the bamboos swing and sway in unison to make a distant soughing sound like a faraway waterfall, or the thunder of the sea on distant reefs in a restless ocean.

It is just 5 p.m., but we have a deal of work to do before it gets dark. First we select a camp site: a spot fairly high up on the sandy bank. And now comes the all-important task of gathering wood for our camp fire. Bear in mind that the more wood we gather the longer the blaze will last, and also the stronger and brighter it will be. There is no difficulty whatever in getting the wood, for it lies everywhere in abundance, thrown up on both banks and even on the wide streambed itself, wedged tightly between boulders and tree trunks that blocked the way when the river was in spate after the rains and carried everything before it—tree-trunks, logs, branches, roots—everything and anything.

It is 6.15 p.m. and we are ready. It is also growing dark. But let us not light the fire just yet, for that will alarm the birds. Rather, let us listen to them awhile: the challenging calls of the grey junglecocks, the wrangling of spurfowl, the strident, plaintive 'meowing' of peafowl, the restless cries of the ever-watchful plover or 'Did-you-do-it', and the distant, provoking crescendo of the 'brain-fever' bird.

Now it is almost dark and the nightjars flit around. One sits on a boulder and is lost to sight in the matchless camouflage that blends with the stone. But we know it is there for we hear it, 'Chuck! Chuck! Chuck! Chuck! Chuck-oooo!' it trills.

Suddenly a distant medley of sound falls on our ears. Not discordant, but strangely thrilling; maybe eerie.

'Ooooo-oooo-ooooh! Woooo-woooo-wooooh!'

'Oo-where? Oo-where? Oo-where? Where? Where?'

'Here! Here! Here! Heere! Heere! Heeeere!'

'Hee-yah! Hee-yah! Heeee-yah!'

'Yah! Yah! Ya-ah! Ya-ah! Heeeeee-yah! Heeeeee-yah!'

It is the chorus of a jackal-pack in their restless hunt for food. The leader calls stridently, raucously—'Oo-where? Oo-where? Oo-where?'—and the pack seem to answer: 'Here! Here! Heere! Heee-yah! Yah! Yah! Yah!'

The long-drawn ululation bursts forth again and is answered by the staccato, raucous, vociferous refrain. The savage call and plaintive reply echo and re-echo from the forbidding darkness of the surrounding forest, rise and fall in crescendo and diminuendo down the aisles of the jungle. The shrieking crescendo of noise passes frantically into a prolonged and indescribable clamour. It permeates the clinging, enveloping, enshrouding blackness. Nothing can restrain it. That wildly beautiful and infinitely savage chorus lingers, dies away and screams again to a crescendo, snivels, abates and swells in turn; an unending medley of outrageous sounds.

Night has fallen. It is time to light the fire, not because of the jackals, for in spite of the forbidding calls they are harmless; not because of a wandering tiger or panther, because there are no man-eaters in this area at present, nor will they hurt you. The reason for the fire is the existence of two different sorts of creatures, one of them very big and the other quite small, which will harm you in no uncertain manner if either happens to come too close: a wandering solitary elephant, and a creeping poisonous snake. We have brought no firearms, and it will not be a pleasant experience in the darkness should an elephant come upon us or a venomous snake find us obstructing his path.

The fire is soon crackling merrily. A few sparks fly heavenward and the glow fitfully lights up the boles of the trees surrounding us, silent sentinels of the watchful wild. The jackals see the glow, or maybe smell the smoke. Their yowling comes to an abrupt end. The fire has frightened everything into silence, except for the wood-crickets which chirp ceaselessly from their shelters among the fallen leaves.

The larger animals will not start moving till after eight o'clock at the earliest, so we have about an hour for a chat. There is no place quite so suitable for a friendly talk as a camp fire. The red embers, the crackle of flames, the occasional shower of sparks as a fresh piece of wood is thrown into the blaze, the acrid smell of smoke that curls upwards in a spiral to the sky above—all these help to give one the feeling of being at home with oneself, with Nature and with God.

Perhaps you would like me to tell you something about the more intimate and individual natures of some of the denizens of these forests. So far I have told you stories of hunting and shooting them which will give the impression that these animals are without qualification fierce, implacable and unreasonable, given only to the lust of killing and destroying. I thought so, too, in my younger days. But since that far-off time I have kept most of these creatures as pets, admittedly from an early age, but to quite an advanced age in various ways and capacities; every one of them has exhibited traits of remarkable good sense and affection, if only the owner can get to understand their little peculiarities and shortcomings.

Let me try to illustrate my point by telling you about a few of them.

I will begin with Bruno, my wife's pet sloth bear. I got him for her by accident.

I was with a party of friends who had gone to hunt wild boar for meat. There is a place about thirty miles beyond Mysore city where the sugarcane fields are infested by wild-pig, which cause much damage to the crops. The pigs lie up in the sugarcane plantations during the day and we had them driven out by 'beaters' (who are the willing owners of the fields and their hirelings), shooting them as they broke cover between adjoining fields or tried to escape into the surrounding scrub jungle. The arrangement is that half the meat goes to the beaters while we take the rest.

Nearly two years ago, on one such beat, out rushed a sounder of pigs and some of them were shot, while the rest escaped. Everybody thought the fun was over when suddenly there came a loud 'Woof! Woof!' and a solitary sloth bear followed, looking decidedly black and decidedly hot in the midday sun.

Now I will not shoot a sloth bear wantonly but, unfortunately for the poor beast, one of my companions did not feel that way about it, and promptly shot the bear on the spot.

As we watched the fallen animal we were surprised to see that the black fur on its back moved and left the prostrate body. Then we saw it was a baby bear that had been riding on its mother's back when the sudden shot had killed her. The little creature ran around its prostrate parent making a pitiful noise.

I ran up to it to attempt a capture. It scooted into the sugarcane field. Following up with the beaters, I was at last able to grab it by the scruff of its neck while it snapped and tried to scratch me with its long, hooked claws.

We put it in one of the gunny bags we had brought for the meat, and when I got back to Bangalore I duly presented it to my wife. She was delighted! She at once put a coloured ribbon around its neck, and after discovering the cub was a 'boy' she christened it Bruno.

Bruno soon took to drinking milk from a bottle. It was but a step further and within a very few days he started eating and drinking everything else. And everything is the right word, for he ate porridge made from any ingredients, vegetables, fruit, nuts, meat (especially pork), curry and rice regardless of condiments and chillies, bread, eggs, chocolates, sweets, pudding, ice-cream, etc., etc., etc. As for drink: milk, tea, coffee, lime-juice, aerated water, buttermilk, beer, alcoholic liquor and, in fact, anything liquid. It all went down with relish.

The bear became very attached to our two Alsatian dogs and to all the children of the tenants living in our bungalow. He was left quite free in his younger days and spent his time in playing, running into the kitchen and going to sleep in our beds.

One day an accident befell him. I put down poison (barium carbonate) to kill the rats and mice that had got into my library. So did Bruno; and he ate some of the poison. Paralysis set in to the extent that he could not stand on his feet. But he dragged himself on his stumps to my wife, who called me. I guessed what had happened. Off I rushed in the car to the vet's residence. A case of poisoning! Tame bear—barium carbonate—what to do?

Out came his medical books, and a feverish reference to the index began: 'What poison did you say, sir?' 'Barium carbonate'. 'Ah yes-B-Ba-Barium Salts-Ah! Barium carbonate! Symptoms—paralysis—treatment—injections of...Just a minute, sir. I'll bring my syringe and the medicine.'

A dash back in the car. Bruno still floundering about on his stumps, but clearly weakening rapidly; some vomiting, heavy breathing, with heaving flanks and gaping mouth.

Hold him, everybody! In goes the hypodermic—Bruno squeals—10 c.c. of the antidote enters his system without a drop being wasted. Ten minutes later: condition unchanged! Another 10 c.c. injected! Ten minutes later: breathing less stertorous—Bruno can move his arms and legs a little although he cannot stand yet. Thirty minutes later: Bruno gets up and has a great feed! He looks at us disdainfully, as much as to say, 'What's barium carbonate to a big black bear like me?' Bruno is still eating.

Another time he found nearly one gallon of old engine oil which I had drained from the sump of the Studebaker and was keeping as a weapon against the inroads of termites. He promptly drank the lot. But it had no ill effects whatever.

The months rolled on and Bruno had grown many times the size he was when he came. He had equalled the Alsatians in height and had even outgrown them. But was just as sweet, just as mischievous, just as playful. And he was very fond of us all. Above all, he loved my wife, and she loved him too! She had changed his name from Bruno, to Baba, a Hindustani word signifying 'small boy'. And he could do a few tricks, too. At the command, 'Baba, wrestle', or 'Baba, box', he vigorously tackled anyone who came forward for a 'rough and tumble'. Give him a stick and say 'Baba, hold gun', and he pointed the stick at you. Ask him, 'Baba, where's baby?' and he immediately produced and cradled affectionately a stump of wood which he had carefully concealed in his straw bed. But because of the tenant's children, poor Bruno, or Baba, had to be kept chained most of the time.

Then my son and I advised my wife, and friends advised her too, to give Baba to the zoo at Mysore. He was getting too big to keep at home. After some weeks of such advice she at last consented. Hastily, and before she could change her mind, a letter was written to the curator of the zoo. Did he want a tame bear for his collection? He replied, 'Yes.' The Zoo sent a cage from Mysore in a lorry, a distance of eighty-seven miles, and Baba was packed off.

We all missed him greatly; but in a sense we were relieved. My wife was inconsolable. She wept and fretted. For the first few days she would not eat a thing. Then she wrote a number of letters to the curator. How was Baba? Back came the replies: 'Well, but fretting; he refuses food too.'

After that, friends visiting Mysore were begged to make a point of going to the zoo and seeing how Baba was getting along. They reported that he was well but looked very thin and sad. All the keepers at the zoo said he was fretting. For three months I managed to restrain my wife from visiting Mysore. Then she said one day: 'I must see Baba. Either you take me by car; or I will go myself by bus or train.' So I took her by car.

Friends had conjectured that the bear would not recognize her. I had thought so too. But while she was yet some yards from his cage Baba saw her and recognized her. He howled with happiness. She ran up to him, petted him through the bars, and he stood on his head in delight.

For the next three hours she would not leave that cage. She gave him tea, lemonade, cakes, ice-cream and what not. Then 'closing time' came and we had to leave. My wife cried bitterly; Baba cried bitterly; even the hardened curator and the keepers felt depressed. As for me, I had reconciled myself to what I knew was going to happen next.

'Oh please, sir,' she asked the curator, 'may I have my Baba back?'

Hesitantly, he answered: 'Madam, he belongs to the zoo and is government property now. I cannot give away government property. But if my boss, the superintendent at Bangalore, agrees, certainly you may have him back.'

There followed the return journey to Bangalore and a visit to the superintendent's bungalow. A tearful pleading: 'Baba and I are both fretting for each other. Will you please give him back to me?' He was a kind-hearted man and consented. Not only that, but he wrote to the curator telling him to lend us a cage for transporting the bear to Bangalore.

Back we went to Mysore again, armed with the superintendent's letter. Baba was driven into a small cage and hoisted on top of the car; the cage was tied securely, and a slow and careful return journey to Bangalore was accomplished.

Once home, a squad of coolies were engaged for special work in our compound. An island was made for Baba. It was twenty feet long by fifteen feet wide, and was surrounded by a dry pit, or moat, six feet wide by seven feet deep. A wooden box that once housed fowls was brought and put on the island for Baba to sleep in at night. Straw was placed inside to keep him warm, and his 'baby', the gnarled stump, with his 'gun', the piece of bamboo, both of which had been sentimentally preserved since he had been sent away to the zoo, were put back for him to play with.

In a few days the coolies hoisted the cage on to the island and Baba was released. He was delighted; standing on his hindlegs, he pointed his 'gun' and cradled his 'baby'. My wife spent hours sitting on a chair there while he sat on her lap. He was fifteen months old and pretty heavy, too!

The way my wife reaches the island and leaves it is interesting. I have tied a rope to the overhanging branch of a mango tree with a loop at its end. Putting one foot in the loop, she kicks off with the other, to bridge the six-foot gap that constitutes the width of the surrounding pit. The return journey is made the same way.

But who can say now that a sloth bear has no sense of affection, no memory and no individual characteristics?

I will tell you next about quite a different sort of animal— a hyaena—which is also with us now and is my particular pet. His name is Jackie, and I got him under rather tragic circumstances.

Nearly fourteen months ago I was spending a night in the jungle. But the place and circumstances were different. It was at a spot named Sopathy, a rocky stretch on the Chinar river in the Salem district, and it was a moonlit night. I had not made a camp fire, but was sitting on one of the boulders overhanging a sandy stretch of the river. I was alone and had brought no weapon.

About ten o'clock I noticed an indefinable something moving along the sand in my direction. As it came closer I made out, by the peculiar loping gait, the slanting body and the grey form on which the black stripes were hardly visible in the moonlight, that it was a hyaena. When almost opposite me it halted abruptly and faced about, staring intently away from me at something in the jungle. I could see clearly its large, upstanding, bat-like ears cocked to catch the slightest sound.

Very soon the reason for its behaviour became evident. A wild dog, looking as grey as the hyaena in the moonlight, although it is actually a reddish-brown animal with an almost black, bushy tail, broke cover from the opposite bank of the river that was overgrown with jungle, and advanced on to the sandy bed. Almost immediately it was joined by five others of its kind. The hyaena turned about and tried to slink into the cover of the trees growing near the rock on which I was sitting. But the wild dogs caught the movement and without further ado attacked.

I have had occasion to remark before that wild dogs are fierce and implacable hunters. Except for man, elephants and bison, they will attack anything that moves, including tigers and panthers, and are quite unmindful of the losses they may sustain in the fray, so long as they eventually succeed in pulling down their prey, tearing it to shreds, and eating it while still practically alive. My own experience up to that time had been that wild dogs either regard hyaenas as cousins or beneath contempt and leave them alone. But that night was an exception, for the six dogs attacked the hyaena forthwith.

The hyaena tried to make a run for it, but his shambling feet moved too slowly and in an instant the dogs were upon him. The first attacker came too near. Like lightning, the hyaena switched around, dipped its head at an angle, and closed its vice-like jaws on the dog's neck. I heard the dying wail of the stricken animal when the powerful teeth sank into its throat. The loud crunch of bones followed as the neck snapped like a dry twig. But the other five dogs piled themselves on to the unfortunate hyaena.

The hyaena striata , to give him his full Latin name, is no fighter. Rather, he is a cowardly, sneaking, skulking creature by nature, that slouches along the jungle, covering enormous distances in his search for carrion—anything that is dead, no matter how it died or in what stage of decomposition the carcass may be. For the hyaena is a scavenger. Very occasionally he may attack, kill and eat a stray goat, sheep or village cur, but that is only when driven by the pangs of extreme hunger. He will try to avoid a fight at any cost.

This unfortunate hyaena, whose plight I was watching, had attempted to slink away, but the dogs had been too quick. Realizing now that it could not escape, it decided to sell its life dearly. While the dogs squealed and 'whistled' in their curious fashion to attract reinforcements of their own kind, with rumbling, throatly growls the hyaena snapped right and left, scoring telling bites on its attackers, who screamed in agony. But the five of them were too many. They covered the hyaena's body, growling, biting and rending the living flesh from the bones. I knew that in another minute the beast would be torn to shreds.

I wanted to help, but I had no weapon with me—not even a stick or stone. For a second I contemplated scrambling down from the rock on which I was sitting and rushing to the rescue while driving the assailants off with shouts. But it was just possible that in their infuriated state they might resent my intrusion and attack. So I stood up from my place of concealment, showed myself, and started whistling and shouting at the top of my voice.

The combatants were so busily engaged in tearing each other to bits that it was some time before they heard the noise I was making. Then, one by one, the dogs ceased attacking the hyaena and turned around to look up at the rock on which I was standing. In the moonlight I could see the hyaena was in a bad way: no longer grey, but bearing large black patches that glistened even at that distance. I knew the patches were caused by the blood that flowed from many wounds. All the five dogs were injured, too. Some of them licked themselves or each other, as they looked at me and then back at their victim.

The hyaena seized the chance, tottered across the dry riverbed and disappeared into the jungle on the other side. A few minutes later the five dogs followed, intent no doubt in finishing the task. But I heard no further sound, and after the disturbance created by the din of the fight, together with the noise I had made, no other animal showed up for the rest of the night.

With daybreak the thought occurred to me to follow in the tracks of the hyaena to see what had happened. This was comparatively easy, for although the ground on the opposite bank was too hard to show footprints, there was a clear trail of blood that had dripped on the grass and had been smeared on the leaves of the bushes. The trail led to a small knoll that was perhaps half a mile away. Close to the summit of this knoll were some large boulders, heaped one upon the other, with spear-grass growing around. Here the hyaena had made a last gallant stand and met death as the relentless pursuers had once again closed in.

One of the red dogs lay dead, stiffening in the long spear-grass that was lank and bent with the weight of the glistening dewdrops that still dripped from the ends of the stems. Only a few bones and the skull of the hyaena remained. Fragments of the grey and black-striped coat lay in shreds around me, most of them dyed a dark rusty-red with blood. But no carcass or flesh were to be seen. The dogs had eaten it all.

Hardly ten yards away was an opening between the tumbled boulders. No doubt it was the den to which the hyaena had been making its way when the attackers had moved in. As I looked upon the scene of carnage, a slight movement at the entrance to the den caught the corner of my eye. I glanced up to gaze into the frightened, sad faces of two baby hyaenas.

So the gallant animal who had fought the previous night against such odds had been a female hyaena, and not a male, as I had thought. Further, she had been a mother and had left two orphaned pups. I could see by their size that they were too young to look after themselves and would starve to death in three or four days. I determined to try to catch them. I retreated downhill the way I had come, in full view of the hyaena's pups. Then I made a detour and approached the hillock from the opposite side. I eventually hid myself behind the pile of boulders and waited for the puppies to come out of the shelter. I knew this would happen very shortly, just as soon as they grew hungry.

My chance came at last. They came out of their den side by side and advanced a few steps to gaze down sadly and wonderingly at the remains of their mother. That was when I pounced. I was fortunate enough to seize one of the pups by the scruff of its neck. But unluckily the other had heard or sensed my approach, and ran back into the cave.

Still holding my struggling captive, I went back behind the pile of boulders and waited for the second pup to come out again. But although I remained for nearly an hour, it did not do so.

Meanwhile, by his constant struggling, the pup I held in my hands became difficult to handle. He bit and scratched and wriggled continuously. Once or twice he almost slipped from my grasp, and I knew if that happened I would never be able to catch him again. So, after another quarter of an hour I reluctantly decided to leave the second pup to its fate and walked back the five miles or so to the village of Pennagram, where I had left my car.

That was how I acquired Jackie, as I called him, for he turned out to be a male, and brought him back to Bangalore. For a few days I fed him on the bottle, with goat's milk, as I have found that cow's milk disagrees with most carnivorous wild animals because it lacks proteins. I supplemented the goat's milk with a few annas' worth of raw, minced mutton that could easily be digested and which at the same time afforded the essential proteins.

Jackie grew apace both in strength and size, soon outgrowing the need for goat's milk and minced mutton. Henceforth his diet consisted of raw beef and bones and it did not matter in the least whether this was fresh or in a high state of decomposition, crawling with maggots and swarming with flies.

Then Jackie met with his first mishap which nearly cost him his life. About thirteen miles east of Bangalore is a little settlement called Whitefield, consisting almost entirely of Anglo-Indian families. In this place a small five-bedroomed cottage, with verandah and kitchen and over half-an-acre of land was for sale for the sum of Rs 5,000, which in English money comes to about £375. My wife fell in love with this place, calling it a 'dinky' little cottage, and wanted me to buy it. I bought it, together with a village cur that had been deserted by her last owner but had remained on the premises. This dog at once attached herself to me. I named her Gypsy as appropriate to her antecedents.

I came to live in this cottage for a few days each week, returning to my home in Bangalore for the remaining days, and I took Jackie with me by car on these visits.

Now this cottage had been lying vacant for some time, and because of that the villagers around had decided to treat it more or less as their own property. Not only did they graze cattle and goats in the compound, thereby destroying the garden, but they had been lopping the trees for firewood and cutting the grass for their cattle, in addition to making the place a rendezvous for the graziers during the daytime. I tried to stop all this, but in vain. The only difference was that, instead of stealing wood by daylight, the villagers came on moonlit nights to do so, while their womenfolk came at break of day to cut the grass, in the manner of the early bird that catches the worm. This led to complaints to the police and one or two 'personal encounter'. So the villagers decided to teach me a lesson.

Now I suffer from many bad habits, and one of them is to keep my dog inside the house at night, rather than let it loose in the compound. I do that because I have previously lost dogs from snakebite or from being carried off by panthers in jungly areas. Thus Gypsy came to be sleeping on a mat at the foot of my bed.

One morning, in the early hours, I awoke to the sound of her growling softly at the bathroom door. It was bright moonlight outside and the time was 3.10 a.m. Now a dog will not growl in that manner without reason. So, taking my torch, I softly opened the door and went into the bathroom. Gypsy brushed past me, halted at the outer door of the bathroom, which was also locked, and still growled ominously.

I was sure there was a snake about somewhere. I then remembered that a section of plank in the door, about two inches wide and three feet or so from the ground, was missing. I stooped down and peered through the gap. What I saw left me with mixed feelings. In the brilliant moonlight stood eleven men—I counted them easily—armed with staves and bamboos. Obviously it was a party of resentful villagers, come to 'beat me up' for my uncompromising attitude.

Even as I watched, one of the men climbed on the shoulders of another and from there on to the tiled roof which, at that spot, was only about nine feet off the ground. I guessed what he was going to do: remove a tile or two, come through the gap into the house, and then slip the bolt of the outer door to admit his pals. I felt very resentful.

Tiptoeing back to where my .12 bore shotgun was standing in the corner of my bedroom, I slipped two or three No. 8 gauge cartridges into the pockets of my nightcoat and returned to the bathroom. I was toying with the idea of scoring a quick right and left with the No. 8 shot into the legs of the assembly. But, just in time, I realized what would be the outcome; of course, a good many of the fellows would have 'sore legs' from the pellets, and perhaps one or two would have to go to hospital, but that would bring the police into the picture, and any amount or 'red tape'. Why did I fire? Why did I hurt so many men? Was it really in self-defence? I would have to prove that. The men might swear they had come with no evil intent whatever. But they would have a lot of explaining to do as to how and why they had come at that time of night. Altogether it would be a nasty business, requiring my presence at the police station and at court. So I overcame the strong temptation to pepper their legs and decided to fire a shot over their heads.

The report and flash of the gun in that silence caused the nine men who were still standing in a group to make off at top speed. The fellow who had put his companion on to the roof lost his nerve completely and screamed that he had been shot and killed, hastily amending that statement to one that he was dying. He was so afraid that his powers of locomotion failed him and he stood rooted to the spot, yelling at the top of his voice. The eleventh adventurer, who had climbed on to my roof, did not wait to scramble down. He jumped, landed on the ground with a thud, and recovering himself, made off like greased lightning. That broke the spell, and his comrade at last regained his wits and followed hotly in his wake. It all happened in a matter of seconds, and Gypsy and I were then alone.

I opened the bathroom door and went outside to see if any more of the miscreants were lurking about. There was not a trace of them. But there were a few 'souvenirs' left on the field of battle—or perhaps I could more aptly describe them as 'booty'. Three bamboo staves, one solid wooden cudgel which would certainly have broken my thick head had it descended thereon, and, of all things, two pairs of chappals or rough leather sandals such as the yokels in southern India usually wear.

The next morning I told the vendors who bring fruit, vegetables and eggs for sale from door to door that, in exactly three mornings from that day, I intended to sell two pairs of good chappals very cheaply to the first applicants. On the morning fixed for the sale two 'purchasers' presented themselves for the two pairs of sandals and offered to buy them. I announced that I was selling them at knock-down prices—only one rupee and eight annas each pair—about two shillings! The price was accepted and each man paid his money, took his pair of chappals, put them on and went away contented. I had little doubt that they had been the original owners of the sandals which they had discarded on that memorable night. After that there were no more attempts to break into my little cottage, and trespassers of all sorts became conspicuous by their absence.

My purpose in telling you this is to tell you that I became rather fond of Gypsy as a consequence. It all happened a little while before I acquired Jackie, so that when I started to bring him up and down to Whitefield from Bangalore he was quite a little fellow, while Gypsy was a full-grown slut, well on the way to becoming very spoilt.

The first calamity that befell Jackie happened when he tried to steal a bone Gypsy was eating. She bit him, and one of her teeth barely missed his left eye, gouging a deep hole just beneath it. An abscess formed and I thought I would lose Jackie, or at least that he would lose his eye, as he developed a high fever. The vet gave him penicillin injections, four lakh units at a time, till he had five such injections. Then the abscess burst—outwards, fortunately—and his eye was saved as well as his life.

He grew quickly after that and soon outgrew Gypsy. But never once did he attempt to bite her, either in play or anger. He treats her as gently as a lady should be treated, and just loves to romp and gambol with her.

Feeding Jackie now became a problem, for at this time he was eating from eight to ten pounds of raw beef per day, and in Bangalore beef costs eight annas a pound, roughly eight pence! I did not feel justified in spending almost seven shillings a day on buying raw beef for him.

So I kept him permanently at my cottage in Whitefield where, with great tact, I had made friends with the two local butchers, who undertook to supply me with ten pounds by weight of beef, in the form of lungs, guts, tripe, liver, etc., daily, for six annas for the lot. That is, roughly six pence per day for ten pounds of miscellaneous beef!

This arrangement worked well for quite a time, when one day serious trouble befell me and Jackie.

I should tell you that what is termed as 'cow-slaughter' is forbidden in some parts of India, including Mysore state. The slaughtering of cattle is not allowed in these places, although the law does not forbid anyone from eating beef provided he can get it from a place where the prohibition is not in force. As with prohibition of alcoholic liquor, which operates in some states and parts of India and not in others, prohibition of 'cow-slaughter' in one place is an open invitation for brisk business in supplying meat from a neighbouring part of the country or state where that law is not in force. Thus Madras state is allowed by law to supply beef across the border into Mysore state and Bangalore, where cow-slaughter is forbidden. It is said that some individuals in parts of Mysore state, such as the Bangalore district, where the prohibition of alcoholic liquor is not in force, return the favour, although not legally this time, by supplying the prohibited item across the border to Madras state, which is a totally 'dry' area.

This is how Bangalore now gets its beef! But what about Whitefield? The butchers claim they also get their supply of beef from across the Madras border, which is about twenty miles away. But one day the police at Whitefield became suspicious and raided the butchers' houses where the meat was stored and sealed the doors. They said that cattle were being slaughtered on the premises. So, there was no meat for Jackie and he was ravenously hungry. What was I to do?

That night I took a sack and walked to the butchers' homes. The police had sealed the front doors. But are there no such things as back doors, windows and skylights? And tiles can be removed to allow the entry or exit of a human body through the roof, can they not? The gentlemen who had visited me early that morning had given me the idea.

To cut a long story short, I came away with a sackful of beef, for which I had had to pay heavily, slung across my shoulders, and made for my little cottage across the fields, along the outskirts of Whitefield cemetery and then over a hill, till I had reached home dripping with blood that had soaked through the sack. At that time of night, had I been caught I would without doubt have been suspected of murder. But I had secured enough meat to feed Jackie for a whole week, although my little cottage stank vilely of rotten flesh after the fourth day. But by then the Police had come to understand that the beef came from Madras, and not from the unwanted cattle of Whitefield itself.

Jackie is with me now and becoming very big, and in appearance repulsive. But he is not at all fierce. On the contrary, his only aim in life is to romp and play. I leave him loose at times and he follows me about, comes out for long walks in the evening and does not harm children, sheep, goats or other dogs. He is passionately fond of little creatures such as puppies, kittens, chickens and the like.

At times his ideas of romping and playing are decidedly boisterous. Although Gypsy is very friendly with him now, she resents too much of his rough play, and she growls at him although he towers above her.

So to serve as a playmate for him I brought home from one of the butcher's houses a female puppy of the breed very definitely known in India as 'pariah dog'. She is about four months old, although Jackie is now over a year, and is approximately one-fifth his size. I have called her Jill. But she gives him all he wants in the way of exercise by chasing him, or being chased herself; romping, playing and even biting him when he becomes a little too rough for her. All this Jackie takes meekly. He is devoted to little Jill, who even snatches the raw meat out of his mouth. Never once has he bitten her; never once has he even growled at her.

Nor has he done either of those things to me. He is rather foolish, with far less intelligence than an average dog. But he is sweet and good-natured, rather like a buffoon among dogs with his grey coat, striped with black, his large head with sharply-pointed ears, the mane of long hair running down his neck and back like a ridge, his short hind legs, and his slouching, shambling gait. So you see, the hyaena is not such a terrible, fierce and loathsome creature as people may think.

We have had about eight panther cubs in all, most of them rescued from their dens after the mothers had been shot. I remember that we lost the first two very shortly after we had acquired them, from gastritis! They also fall very easy victims to colic. Contrary to expectations, a panther cub is extremely delicate and dies easily, being nothing like so hardy as a bear or hyaena. Cows' milk disagrees with them entirely and proves fatal within a few days. Goats' milk seems to agree better, but has to be supplemented, even when they are very young, with a spoonful of minced mutton and mutton blood—not beef. As they grow older, beef can be substituted for mutton, but the quantity given to them at any one time has to be regulated. The need for mutton in the early stages is to compensate for the fact that, as I have remarked in an earlier book, in the wild conditions the mother helps the digestive processes of her cubs by first eating the meat of her kills herself and then vomiting it out for them to eat again. The cubs are gluttonous creatures and will gorge themselves till they can hardly move. That is when the colic sometimes attacks them, and as I have said, when they get colic or gastritis it is fatal.

Panther cubs are extremely playful and mischievous. They can recognize their owner from among other people. Although, as they grow older, their play becomes exceedingly rough, none I have had has been in the least fierce.

I remember one of them, a female which we named Spottie and kept for about nine months. She was a very sweet and intelligent creature. She would stalk my wife or me when we were reading or otherwise engaged when she thought we were not aware of her presence, hiding behind a door, or creeping up behind a chair or a table till she was close enough. Then with mock severity she would charge or pounce upon us. On such occasions she never once bit us, but tried her best to be gentle. Yet her claws were sharper than she realized and, as often as not, we would emerge from the game with at least a few scratches.

Some people have the notion that if a panther cub is brought up on boiled meat and soft foods it will not become ferocious. Well, for one thing this idea would not work out, for the cub would probably die! A panther must have proteins, and all the cubs we have kept have been fed on raw meat and given blood to drink as they grow older. Yet not one of them became in any way fierce because of this diet.

The female I have been telling you about, Spottie, died tragically one day, and this is how it happened. My son Donald shot a large sambar stag, and for some reason or other we wanted to see how much Spottie could eat of the carcass. So we allowed her to eat her fill. She gorged till she could hardly crawl. That very night she began to vomit and purge. In a few hours she growled and then screamed with pain and bit savagely in the throes of colic. By morning she was dead.

Sometime later we acquired another cub, this time a male. We called him Spottie II. Benefitting from our earlier errors, we regulated his diet and kept him for over ten months in our house at Bangalore. During all this time he never once harmed a living thing. But we had responsibilities. There were tenants in the house and they had children. The children insisted on coming near the panther. Spottie II loved them and played with them. But we realized we were running a great risk. Finally, very sadly and reluctantly, we gave him to a friend, a Swiss gentleman, who eventually sold him to a German animal-dealer. The last we heard was that Spottie had been sent to some zoo in Europe.

Lately Donald brought home another panther cub. We have had him for about a month and he is not yet three months old. But this one we have called Grumpy, and he is with us now.

Then there is Ella the jackal. She plays with the dogs, cats anything, but loves to hide in dark corners, such as beneath an almirah. Ella gives her 'jackal call' occasionally at nights, but being a vixen she renders what might be termed as 'half notes' rather than the complete and peculiarly attractive full call of the male.

A villager one day brought for sale five jackal puppies, perhaps four to six weeks old, and thinking she might be lonely for want of company of her own kind, I bought them for Ella. That afternoon she was delighted and mothered them in a most touching manner. Around midnight, however, I heard the puppies screaming and found Ella had killed one and was in the process of devouring it. I rescued the other four, and next day, as I had nowhere to keep them, put them with Jackie, the hyaena. They tried drinking milk from him, which disconcerted the poor fellow dreadfully. Since then they have grown quite a bit, and so has Jackie. I kept them together for a considerable time and it was interesting to watch how he took upon himself the serious duty of looking after these four rascals. At feeding time Jackie could hardly finish his meat before the four jackals, who had already swallowed their own share, swarmed around him to steal what remained. Invariably, while he chased one of them away playfully, the other three would gobble up all that was left. Matters became so bad for Jackie that I was compelled to move the four jackals away and put them with Bruno, the sloth bear. He is not so good-natured as the hyaena at meal-times and swipes at the jackals if they come within reach of his paw, although in the afternoons and at night they sleep around and sometimes on top of him in his wooden box.

Meanwhile Ella, the adult female jackal, has grown clever too. She jumps onto the dining table, removes the cosy off the teapot, then the lid, and drinks up all the tea.

We have kept all species of the deer family. They are sweet and gentle, but not so interesting or intelligent as the meat-eaters or Bruno, the bear.

My father had a sambar doe for nearly ten years. He named her Flora. She was his special pet and loved him intensely. But as she grew older she formed a nasty habit of attacking strangers by rearing on her hind legs and striking at their heads with her fore hooves. This was because, being a doe, she grew no horns. Indeed, when she had perfected this technique she would often waylay our Indian cook-woman as she arrived from market. The poor woman would either be knocked down by Flora or run for dear life. In either case she would drop the basket of provisions she was carrying and Flora would eat all the contents except for the meat and the firewood.

I will just mention one more of my strange pets—and I still have her with me. She is Jemima, the python. 'Rock snakes' we call them in India. I caught her by the water-channel in the forest at Yemmaydoddi, and have had her for over seven years. She is quite tame and easy to keep. Don shoots a rabbit for her once a month. I buy a bandicoot— which is a big variety of rat, larger than a guinea-pig—from a man who catches them for me in traps at the market, at the price of four annas per bandicoot, once every fifteen days. That is as often as she eats. One night Don shot a mouse-deer. She swallowed it whole and would not eat again for nearly a month.

Now that you have heard about some of the strange animals and reptiles my wife and I have kept, let us have a sip of tea and nibble our sandwiches; for after this the serious business of listening to what the jungle may have to tell us will begin in earnest.

For a long time there is silence, broken now and then by the crackling of the fire or a loud 'putt-putt' noise, followed by the faint hiss of steam, that comes from the greener bits of wood, or those pieces that have moisture trapped within them. Then, from somewhere on top of the hill, above the road where we have left the car, a horned-owl hoots repeatedly, making a resonant, weird sound which nobody would normally think came from a bird. 'Whooo-oooo! Whooo-oooo!' For a long time there is silence again, broken periodically by the great owl, and now and then by the chirping, flitting nightjars, who do not seem to worry about the firelight.

We hear faint creepings and rustlings in the bushes growing a little beyond our camp fire, and from higher up the bank of the stream. They come in fits and starts—jerkily. But they seem to be always there, never for a moment ceasing altogether. They are nothing to worry about, for they are made by bush mice and bamboo rats which live in thousands in these forests. Harmless and inquisitive little creatures, but for our fire they would be running over our bodies in their search for food, if we sat still enough and refrained from movement. Their presence is one of the reasons why snakes of all varieties, both poisonous and non-poisonous, abound here. The rats and mice, as well as frogs, afford an abundant food supply.

All of a sudden, from somewhere quite far away, we hear it: a cracking, crashing and thudding. Elephants! They are breaking down whole branches of trees merely to eat a few of the succulent new shoots that are just beginning to break at the ends of the stems.

'Quink! Quink! Quink!' A faint, sharp sound comes from the same general direction in which we just heard the branch broken. That means elephant calves; baby elephants!

But there is no reason to be nervous. If there are babies, it very clearly indicates that their mothers are about. In fact, a herd of elephants; for baby-elephants will not associate with a solitary male tusker. And an elephant herd is quite harmless unless you almost bump into one of the mothers, who will attack you in defence of her calf. But here, seated by the fire, we are as safe as in a house and have nothing whatever to worry about. Should their grazing bring the elephants in our direction, they will smell the smoke of our fire or see the flames, and they will make off without delay.

It is the solitary bull-elephant, wandering all by himself, that is dangerous. Generally, to be alone, he is either 'in musth', which is a periodic complaint attacking bull-elephants and lasting for about three months, when they become sexually excited and are turned out of the herd by the other bulls; or he is a confirmed 'rogue' who likes to keep his own company. In either case beware! There exists no fiercer, no more awesome, no more relentless engine of destruction in the whole Indian jungle. But if there had been a 'rogue' elephant about I would have known of it, as the Forest department intimates the presence of such animals to all game licence holders, in addition to issuing notices in the press. Even a rogue elephant, moreover, will hesitate to approach a blazing camp fire.

We listen to the sounds of the elephants grazing. Every little while comes the crack of a big branch, or the sharp snap of a bamboo stem, followed by the peeling, tearing sounds of the leaves being stripped from them by the giant pachyderms. They eat in silence, while a rumbling, like distant thunder, tells that the digestive processes are at work inside those colossal bellies. The calves 'quink' restlessly as they brush against their mothers, worrying them for milk, while at long intervals one of the herd-bulls will roar mildly, a bellowing sound resembling that made by an ox but infinitely louder and more cavernous. It is merely a call of contentment to indicate that all is well; or, maybe, junior has turned his efforts to worrying papa, who is admonishing him gently by roaring.

An enraged elephant, about to attack, makes quite a different sound. He screams piercingly, and that penetrating 'trumpet' will shake the very earth. It is a veritable call of doom, and there is no misunderstanding the feelings of rage, malevolence, and destruction which are involved in that terrible noise.

A frightened elephant will also scream and trumpet, but there is a wealth of difference in the tone. It is shriller and thinner in quality and volume, and appears to convey the elephant's feelings of fear and trepidation. It lacks that full-lunged menacing shriek that preludes the charge of an enraged bull. After a while there floats to us a dull, hollow thud: the herd has reached the bed of the stream, maybe half a mile below us, and the noise we just heard was caused by one of them turning over a fallen tree-trunk that had been lying there.

The rapt attention with which we have been listening to the elephants is suddenly disturbed by the hoarse, guttural call of a 'barking' deer, which is also named muntjac, kakar or jungle-sheep. 'Kharr! Kharr!' he repeats loudly in alarm from somewhere along the brow of a hill on the opposite side of the stream. A sambar in the valley takes up the note of warning with a startled 'Whee-onk!', followed by an intermittent 'Dhank! Dhank!' as he spreads the news of approaching danger.

Those calls can only mean one of three things: a tiger, the king of the jungle, is on the prowl—or his lesser cousin, a panther. They might also denote the proximity of a pack of wild dogs, the most vicious hunters in the forest, were it not for the fact that the night we have chosen is moonless. Wild dogs hunt by day or by moonlight, but never in the dark. So they are not the cause of the alarm in this case; either a tiger or a panther is afoot.

The cause of the hubbub betrays his identity a little later by a grating, sawing sound as he follows in the wake of the sambar down in the valley. 'Ah! Hah!, Ah! Hah! Ah!-Hah!' Disappointed that his presence has been discovered by the two vigilant deer, the panther vents his chagrin in a series of sawing-like, guttural, grating gasps.

All is silent again for a short time. We have almost forgotten about the elephant-herd till the sound of tearing bark reminds us that they are still feeding along the streambed and coming closer to our camp fire in the process. But as foreseen, one of them either smells the smoke or sees the glow of the fire. The elephant strikes its trunk hard against the earth while exhaling air sharply through that organ. The result is a peculiar metallic noise, resembling a sheet of zinc or galvanized iron being suddenly bent in two. That is an elephant's way of voicing its preliminary note of alarm.

Twice more the trunk strikes the ground sharply, and twice more the metallic sound follows. Then the elephant trumpets once—the thin, shrill call of alarm and fear. The youngsters understand it and fall silent. All that can be heard is a faint, indefinable, swishing, brushing sound. It is made by the huge bodies as they try to press noiselessly through the undergrowth on the banks of the stream, the mothers pushing their bigger calves before them, or carrying the smaller ones with their trunks, which they have wound round the bellies of their off-spring before lifting them bodily off the ground. A few seconds later the faint swishing and rustling ceases. The herd has disappeared. Silence reigns once more. We hear no more of the panther or of the deer.

Our fire dies down for the moment, leaving only the glow of burning embers. We strain our eyes into the darkness on the opposite bank of the stream, and for a moment see nothing, as we have been gazing into the fire and our eyes have not yet adapted themselves. Then mysterious little lights appear, weaving singly and in twos and threes among the branches of the trees beyond the reach of our firelight. As the pupils of our eyes expand to explore and penetrate the gloom, we are surprised at the number of little lights that we can see. There seem to be thousands of them, as they flash, scintillate, fade away and then break out again, sometimes in bunches and at other times in myriads when, for a brief moment, they outline and illuminatte the towering trees and their boughs which have until now been indistinguishable in the gloom.

Fireflies! Thousands of them! Now here, now there, now appearing and then disappearing, only to flash forth again, they make a specatacle of ethereal charm which can never be seen in the inhabited parts of the land. No doubt the dampness of the atmosphere in the vicinity of the stream has attracted them. On some occasions, when I have been watching in the jungle, but without a camp fire, I have found the combined brilliance of an innumerable mass of these little creatures great enough to light the surrounding forest and make its details momentarily clear. Though such synchronized flashes occur only at long intervals and last only for a second or so, they are something that must be experienced to be believed, and they bring to one an ineffable sense of beauty and wonder.

We hear nothing more and the hours drag by. In spite of the fire, which we feed with fresh bits of wood from the pile, we can feel the air growing chill, and we can hear the dew beginning to drip from the leaves of the trees growing beyond the circle of warmth generated by the burning wood. I glance at my watch. The hands stand at midnight.

Would you be interested to hear about some of the superstitions of the aborigines who live in our jungle areas? They are firm believers in the existence of spirits; but with this difference—all spirits to them are evil. Even the spirit of a departed loved one becomes a malevolent entity immediately after death, capable of, and sometimes bent upon, causing grievous bodily harm to the living. For this reason they will shun a human corpse, burial ground or cremation place. To ask an aborigine to sit with you over a half-eaten corpse serving as bait for a returning man-eater is tantamount to asking him to commit suicide. Infinitely worse in fact; for he feels he is certain to meet with a terrible and violent end.

He will explain that you are safe from the evil spirit, because you happen to be a foreigner. Even evil spirits dislike the foreigners, especially if they happen to be white men. But he, being just a miserable, defenceless jungle man, is certain to meet with a violent end, even as he sits close beside you. This anticipated end will invariably take place when the invisible spirit strikes from the rear: then the victim will collapse, become unconscious, vomit blood, and by morning will be dead. If you examine his back by daylight, in spite of his dark skin, he says, you will clearly see the five-finger mark of the spirit hand that struck him down. It will be the ghost of the dead man that will do the deed, as it seeks frantically to revenge its own violent end.

Even in the densely populated parts of the land, the towns and cities, it is quite common to hear that some man was struck down at night while returning home from night-shift at a factory, or perhaps from the late session at the cinema. The victim will say that he felt a heavy hand strike him violently in the back: he will stagger home, tell his relatives what happened and then collapse. He may vomit blood during the night, and the next day he will develop a high fever. But within forty-eight hours, with a few exceptions, he will be dead.

Such occurrences have often come to my notice and I have tried to investigate the causes, but without success. It is significant that it is only the ignorant, poorer working classes that experience such things. Particularly the servant class.

There is also a strong belief that, if a man has eaten or handled pork and goes out at night, if he is barefoot, he stands in great danger of being struck by an evil spirit, which detests pig's flesh. This idea is universal. I heard it first when I was a boy. I remember that I bought a piece of raw pork without delay, told my father that I was going to the pictures, but went to the gates of the cemetery instead, with the piece of pork. There I discarded my shoes, climbed over the gate and walked down the little lane between the tombstones, very fearfully clutching the pork. To this day I have never been so frightened as I was that night. Every single moment I expected a heavy spirit hand to clout me resoundingly from behind. But no spirit had struck me by the time I got back to my shoes. Sure enough, next day I had a fever. It was 'blue funk' fever!

Apart from the spirits of the dead, which are credited with doing these things, the aborigines in the forests, as well as the poorer working classes throughout southern India, are firm believers in what the spiritualists of western countries call 'elementals'. The Tamil name for such beings is tninnispurams. They are credited with belonging to both sexes—male and female: the male minnispuram is comparatively small, is rarely seen or heard, and is benign and harmless, but the female is said to be extremely tall (over ten feet) and is reputed to appear sometimes as a long black figure without head or arms or legs, and sometimes as a tall white figure, similarly headless, armless and legless. Another variety of the female minnispuram appears as a midget, gaudily dressed in a diaphanous, brightly coloured saree and bedecked with flowers and jewellery. These live in wells, tanks and rivers and are reputed to entice youths to the edge of the water and then to push them in and drown them. All forms of the female minnispuram are hostile to human beings, particularly to men.

My friend Byra, the poojaree, told me that he was once poaching for sambar in the Salem district, when one of these female minnispurams came upon him. Apparently he was sitting in a 'hide' he had constructed on the banks of the stream, which was dry at the time except for the artificial water hole he had himself made during the day by scooping a deep hollow in the sand. Into this hollow the water had percolated. At dusk he had sprinkled some of this water on the surrounding sand, so that the smell of water would attract the thirsty deer. When that happened, he would kill the first with his muzzle-loading flintlock!

Byra said that it was shortly after midnight when he heard the jingling of bells coming towards him from the left. As there was a curve in the bed of the Chinar river in that direction, he wondered with interest who could possibly be approaching at that time and place. He watched, and shortly what seemed to be a tremendously tall pillar of white mist turned the corner and floated down the centre of the dry riverbed, while the jingling of bells grew louder. Byra said he knew instinctively that it was a female minnispuram. He told me that for a few seconds he thought of running away, but if he did that the minnispuram might see him and give chase. So he decided to stay hidden.

Meanwhile the tall white pillar approached. It came opposite him, while the noise of jingling bells now changed into a sound more resembling the chink and clank of chains being dragged along the ground. He had just begun to congratulate himself that the minnispuram would pass by, when the terribly high white pillar halted on the riverbed directly before him. He heard demoniacal laughter in a high-pitched female voice.

Byra said he fainted. When he recovered consciousness the minnispuram had vanished. In its place, clearly discernable in the pale moonlight, stood a hesitant hyaena, which finally ran away. Byra says that if discovered minnispurams transform themselves into animals. He did not dare to move till daylight. Thereafter he never again went near that part of the river once darkness had fallen.

The belief in black magic, and the casting of spells, is universal in southern India, particularly along the west coast and in Hyderabad state. The sorcerers are not witches, however. They are men who have learnt the art from their fathers or have surrendered themselves to the practice after long years of initiation.

It is considered a simple thing to have someone 'bewitched' by one of these sorcerers. The cost of the operation will depend on how much harm one wishes to do. The simplest thing is to have the victim made sick, or to lose him his job, or to cause estrangement between husband and wife. A variation is to have him harassed by 'spirit' agencies, which throw stones on his roof at night and sometimes during the day, break crockery, put sand in his food just as he is about to eat it, and at times move the furniture about violently or throw him out of bed.

The worst form of magic is when the victim is made so ill that he dies. In such cases medical aid is fruitless, as no doctor is able to diagnose the malady. I have encountered several cases of 'spell casting' and I will tell you about two of them.

There was Oscar Brown, whom I came to know in 1936. Ossie' was a mild, good-natured fellow, jovial, carefree and happy. We became quite good friends. One day Ossie told me a story. He said that about three years previously he happened to be working in an office at Calicut. The staff were paid on the first day of every month, and a number of mendicants had formed the practice of presenting themselves at the office on every payday to get what charity they could from the employees.

Among them was a rather truculent-looking fellow with long hair, who wore a saffron robe. This man never failed to turn up on the first day of each month and demanded, rather than asked for, charity. He behaved as if he had every right to it. This habit had annoyed my friend Ossie, who, one day threatened to hand him over to the police. To that the saffron-robed man had replied: 'You dare to abuse me! I curse you, now. I will put someone into you who will be your constant companion till the day of your death.' With those words he strode away. Ossie went home and forgot all about it.

That night Ossie awoke, and through the mosquito-netting under which he was lying he saw the figure of a very tall black man standing by his bedside. Thinking it was a thief, Ossie sat up and began pulling the netting aside, preparatory to springing out of bed. The figure then stooped over him and the next second appeared to merge itself with him. 'It got right into me,' were Ossie's own words. Then he said: 'Andy, do you know it is inside me now? It lives with me day and night. I cannot get rid of it. It won't go. Sometimes it overwhelms and overcomes me. Then I don't know who I am or what I am doing. Friends say my voice and appearance change. I behave differently, boisterously. To me it is all a blank. When I regain control of myself, I don't remember what happened. I don't remember anything.'

I began to suspect that my newly-found friend was slightly unbalanced mentally. Then I forgot the whole thing.

A couple of months later I invited Ossie to accompany me on a short trip to the jungle. By a strange coincidence, we camped on this very river, which I call the 'Secret River', but nearly twenty miles from here, beyond the village of Anchetty, at the spot where it joins the main river, the Cauvery. We had finished our meal and were seated beside a fire, talking about one thing and another. My .405 Winchester rifle, loaded but at 'half-cock', stood five or six feet away against a henna tree.

I forget which of us had spoken last. But I remember I was looking out over the Cauvery river which flowed past us, just a few feet away. And then a strange, gruff voice demanded, 'Who the hell are you? Where am I?'

I nearly jumped out of my skin. I looked at Ossie. Could it have been he who had just spoken? He appeared quite a different person. His eyes shone strangely. His face was twisted and distorted.

'What's the matter with you, Ossie?' I heard myself stutter.

'Don't call me Ossie. That's not my name,' he growled. 'Who are you? Where am I?'

I tried to pacify him. 'Don't you remember?' I asked. 'We came shooting.'

'Shooting? Don't lie! Where's the gun?'

Realization came to me in a flash. Ossie was raving mad, without a doubt. I had heard that lunatics acquire prodigious strength; if he found my rifle he might shoot me there and then. Fortunately he had not seen it, for it was behind him. I tried strategy. 'Behind me, there,' I indicated nonchalantly, pointing vaguely behind my back.

Ossie, or whoever it was that was speaking to me, strode past me, bent upon finding the 'gun', as he had called my rifle. I made a scrambling dive for the weapon. I reached it and swung around. Ossie had turned and was glaring at me. Controlling myself as much as I could, I said conciliatingly: 'I have found it. It was lying here.'

'Let me see it,' he had demanded.

'No, I can't,' I lied to him. 'There are tigers and elephants about and I must always have this rifle in my hands.'

He did not answer, but walked across to the fire and started to put it out by kicking river sand on to the embers.

'Stop that, Ossie,' I shouted at him. 'We need the fire. The elephants might come.'

'I am not Ossie,' he replied flatly.

Then he swung around and advanced purposefully towards me. I backed a couple of steps and shouted to him to stop. But he did nothing of the kind.

'I want that gun,' was all he said, and he still advanced.

There seemed no way of stopping him, and I did not care to surrender the weapon. Then a thought struck me. When he was less than five yards away I raised the rifle and fired quickly over his head. He stopped dead in his tracks. Then he shuddered all over violently, as if with ague. Almost mechanically he raised a hand to cover his eyes and sighed. A few seconds later Ossie spoke to me again, but this time the Ossie I knew.

'What happened, Andy?' he asked. 'You look frightened.'

I remained silent, too shocked to speak.

'Oh, I see,' he went on. 'I have had one of my attacks, eh? That other self took control of me. Now do you believe what I told you the other day?'

'Only too well,' I rejoined. 'I thought my last moment had come and that you would shoot me—or force me to shoot you!' Then I added: 'Elephants or no elephants, you won't catch me spending another night alone with you, my friend. Let us start walking to Anchetty. Even if I tread on a snake, it is preferable to the experience I have just been through with you.'

I have related this incident to doctors, who tell me that the symptoms and the shuddering of the patient at the last moment are typical of hysteria. I have told it to others who profess to know something about occultism. They affirm it is a very definite case of 'spirit-possession' and that the shuddering always occurs when the foreign entity leaves the body it has temporarily inhabited. I do not know what to believe.

But the sequel to this story is that Ossie left Bangalore shortly after the incident. Two years later I heard that he died in Calcutta. He had jumped from the balcony of a three-storied building!

The second incident can be related more briefly. A friend in an oil company, stationed at Shimoga, got promotion over a colleague who resented it greatly. The aggrieved man went to a sorcerer in the same town. At the very next new moon strange things began to happen in the promoted man's house. Stones rained on his roof; sand was thrown in his food as he was eating it, apparently from nowhere at all; crockery, tables, chairs and even beds were moved about; his baby son was lifted bodily and thrown down again, fortunately without harm. This went on for over six months, till the harassed man, finding no remedy or help, in sheer desperation resigned from the post to which he had been promoted. Simultaneously, all manifestations ceased.

It is commonly believed in India—this time by many of the educated and higher classes of both Indians and Anglo-Indians—that it is possible for a woman to make a man fall deeply in love with her and become so infatuated that he does not know what he is doing. A certain lady did this to a padre, causing him to desert his wife and three children. The practice is commonly known in India as 'pilling'.

The woman I have mentioned was questioned by a well-intentioned friend of mine, who remonstrated against the whole affair. Thereupon the woman, in a spirit of truculence, told my friend in detail how she made the 'ingredients' which caused the mischief and how she had administered it in black coffee. I have the recipe; it is not a wholesome concoction.

But I have not come across the other recipe, which a man should use to influence a lady—that is, excluding the use of the powdered tail of the big lizard known as the 'oodumbu' as an aphrodisiac, about which my old friend Byra, the poojaree, told me a very long time ago, and, of course, the powdered roots of the 'kuloo' water-plant, which I have mentioned in another story in this book.

Speaking of occult matters, I might mention that some years ago my son, Donald, and I set forth from Segur, at the foot of the Nilgiri ghat, to walk the fourteen miles of steep gradient to Ootacamund at the summit. It was past eleven at night when we left, and we had planned to reach Ooty before dawn. But when we were just half-way, at a place named Kalhatti, it began to rain and we took shelter in the travellers' bungalow standing at the end of a pathway just a short distance from the steep road.

This bungalow had long been reputed as haunted. The haunting was said to have originated in the following manner. A severely inebriated shikari, a European gentleman, had camped there one night before Christmas. At about 2.30 a.m. he saw what he thought was a sloth bear standing on the verandah of the bungalow. With creditable aim, considering his drunkenness, he had shot the bear, which began to scream. Thereafter he had emptied four more rounds into it from his magazine, and the animal screamed no longer because it was dead. But the only thing wrong with the whole proceeding was that it was not a sloth bear he had shot: it was a man, the bungalow-watcher, or chowkidar, himself, put there by the government to look after the rest house.

The local Badagas said it was this unfortunate man's uneasy spirit that now haunted the bungalow on certain nights. I know that when Don and I ran into the verandah to shelter from the rain, we were quite wet and it was bitingly cold. Moreover we were feeling inordinately hungry. Occult subjects were far from our thoughts just then. We wanted to find the man in charge, the one who had replaced the poor fellow who had been shot, to know if he could possibly brew us some hot tea.

So together we shouted: ' Chowkidar! Watcher!'

But nobody answered us. Then Don went one way, and I the other, around the bungalow to look for him. We met at the back of the building. Apparently the caretaker was not on the premises. Together we returned to the front verandah to shelter from the drizzling rain. A black figure stood at the end awaiting us. We both saw the man distinctly. The next moment, there was nobody there. It was just 2.30 a.m.

But enough of such a topic. It is nearly one o'clock and you look sleepy. Probably you are tired of listening to my tales. In that case we can finish what tea is left in my flask, throw the remaining wood onto the fire and snatch forty winks of sleep. Nothing will come near us, for the embers will continue to glow even when the fire dies down. But you will feel cold, so be prepared for it.

We do just that. We finish the tea, pile all the remaining wood onto the fire till we have a fine roaring blaze, and then curl up in the sand as close as possible to the burning wood. It is uncomfortably hot for the moment, but before long, as the flames become more feeble and only embers remain, we will be feeling the cold.

I awaken several times before dawn. Once I hear the distant calls of frightened spotted deer. Far away in the jungle one of them screams its last, the prey of some successful carnivorous hunter.

The Black Rogue of the Moyar Valley

He was reported to be jet black and i did not entirely believe that tale till I saw him for myself. He was black all right, certainly the darkest coloured pachyderm I have ever seen, either in the wild state or in captivity. Also he was exceptionally hairy for a full-grown elephant, particularly around the top of his ponderous head. Elephant calves are all hairy, but as they grow up they tend to lose their hirsute appearance. However, the 'black rogue', as I have called him, although fully grown, had a distinctly shaggy aspect all his roguish days for, above all else, he was very definitely a 'rogue', and a nasty one at that.

But before I begin, let me warn you that this tale has rather a sad and unexpected ending. It closes with an experience I have never had before, and most certainly do not want to go through again.

The Moyar river flows from west to east along a deep valley that is all very dense jungle and the home of every species of big and small game of which southern India can boast, with the exception of the 'nilgae' or 'blue-bull', as it is sometimes called, a member of the antelope family that grows to the size of a sambar. Large herds of bison and elephant abound in these forests, and sambar and spotted-deer are plentiful. There are always tigers and panthers in residence, although they are not by any means numerous. This is rather a strange feature when one considers the abundance of game that would serve the two species of felines as food. Perhaps the presence of ticks—both of the large and small varieties—which infest the valley throughout the year, together with the leeches that are to be found in the damper parts, especially during the monsoon rains, keep tigers and panthers from remaining too long in the low river areas. Carnivores detest these pests.

The incident I am about to relate took place in the jungles of Mysore state which fringe that northern bank of the Moyar river, in the Coimbatore district to the northeast, and in the forests of the Nilgiris, or 'Blue Mountains' as they are called, which lie along the south of this rivulet, right up to its junction with another stream known as the Bhavani. Thus you will see. that, not only was an enormous tract of jungle involved, or rather several enormous tracts, but also the jurisdiction of three separate Forest departments. The Coimbatore and Nilgiris areas each have their own administration, although both fall within the orbit of Madras state: while Mysore, which was till recently an independent area governed by a maharajah, is now a separate entity with a state government of its own.

Two large game or wildlife sanctuaries exist there. One of them, north of the river, falls within the boundaries of Mysore state and is called the Bandipur Game Sanctuary. Adjoining it, and south of the river, is the Mudumalai Sanctuary in the Nilgiri district of Madras state. The jungles to the northeast, belonging to Coimbatore, are called reserve forests, where hunting is only allowed under licence. There is a proposal to make this portion also a sanctuary, like the other two adjoining it, where hunting is altogether forbidden, so that the three sanctuaries will more adequately protect the game on both banks of the Moyar. The presence of the Bandipur and Mudumalai Sanctuaries gave protection to the black elephant while he was within them, so that he could only be hunted when he happened to cross into the forests of Coimbatore, or went further down the Moyar river into the Nilgiri jungles to the east, towards the Bhavani river and beyond the limits of the Mudumalai Sanctuary.

Due to the abundance of elephants everywhere, the aborigines and other people whose work took them into the jungles of all three jurisdictions were always on the alert. Nevertheless, it was a common occurence to hear of someone being chased by an elephant, while now and again isolated tragedies took place and people were killed. These latter were few and far between, however, and nobody paid much attention to them except to be very careful to avoid coming anywhere within sight, sound or scent of a wild elephant.

How the black elephant first made his appearance or came to be a rogue is obscure. Two versions persist. The first is that a titanic battle was waged, lasting intermittently for two days and two nights, within the precincts of the Mudumalai Sanctuary and was heard by the inhabitants of the little hamlet of Tippakadu, situated on the Mysore-Ootacamund Road. A narrow iron bridge, painted black, spans the Moyar river at this place, and during the afternoon of the second day of the fight the inhabitants of Tippakadu turned out and stood on the bridge to watch two bull elephants battling furiously a couple of hundred yards away on the river bank. They said that both the contestants were enormous animals, but that the bigger of the two was obviously getting the better of the fight, while his opponent, a slightly smaller, very black elephant, was red with the blood that poured from his head and flanks from the many injuries inflicted by his antagonist's tusks.

The other version comes from the village of Tallamalai in the forests to the northeast, belonging to Coimbatore, where an inhabitant proudly claimed the credit of having started this elephant off on his career as a rogue. A solitary bull formed the habit of systematically raiding and destroying the crops in the fields that surround the hamlet. The shooting of elephants, even by the holders of game licences, is strictly forbidden by the government. Nevertheless, exasperated by the damage, this man one night fired at the elephant with his ancient muzzle-loader while it was in the midst of his field. He must have scored a hit, because large gouts of blood were found next morning leading from the cultivated area into the jungle. Of course, nobody followed up the wounded beast.

Many had seen this animal and all said it was a very black, very hairy elephant. Up to that time it had attacked nobody. After being wounded, the elephant left the vicinity of Tallamalai; some said it had gone into the jungle to die, while others thought it had left the locality.

It was over three months later that a herdsman, grazing his cattle, was attacked and killed by a very black elephant. Then the people remembered that an elephant that had been in the habit of destroying their crops, and had later been wounded, was a very black animal. So everyone came to the conclusion that it was this beast that had been wounded, while the owner of the muzzle-loading gun received considerable credit and became very proud of himself.

The second story is probably the true one, as it has the incident of the first killing to back it up, although it could equally be possible that the elephant that had received such a beating at Tippakadu had wandered down the bed of the Moyar, emerged in the jungle to the northeast, and come upon the unfortunate herdsman while still in an irritable mood, venting its spleen upon him by trampling him to a pulp.

Sporadic attacks occurred after this in all the three areas I have mentioned. But it is significant to note that the majority were in the Coimbatore forest region. There the elephant smashed a bullock-cart that was being driven from Dimbum to Tallamalai. Miraculously the two passengers in the cart escaped when it was overtuned and fled for their lives, but the driver and one of the two bullocks, as well as the cart itself, received the full fury of the elephant's wrath. The driver was literally torn limb from limb. The elephant had evidently placed a forefoot on his body and with its trunk had wrenched off both arms and a leg. The bullock had been gored through and through by one of the mighty tusks, and its spine was broken by a blow from the trunk. The cart was reduced to fragments.

It was strange that nothing happened to the remaining bullock. When the yolk was broken it had just galloped away, but the villagers said that its escape had not been without reason. It was quite black in colour, whereas the slain animal had been white and brown, and the cartman had been wearing a white dhoti or loin-cloth, a white banyan (vest) and a white turban. Here seemed evidence enough to emphasize the dislike all wild elephants have for white. Thus, when travelling through elephant country in India you will observe that all mile and furlong stones, normally painted white with black numerals, are black with the numerals generally in yellow. The government has found, to its cost, that wild elephants pull the white stones out of the ground as fast as they are planted.

The two men who had escaped with their lives ran all the way back to Dimbum, whence they had started out, to report the incident. They stressed that the elephant was almost jetblack. They also said that the left tusk was shorter than the right one and curved inwards, while the animal was at least nine feet high, and abnormally hairy. This was the most detailed description of the elephant that anyone had given so far, and was accepted by the Forest department as correct. After all, these two men had been within ten feet when the enraged animal had upset the bullock-cart; they, if anyone, would know what the animal looked like.

The Collector at Coimbatore, which is the headquarters of the district bearing its name, was furnished with this description by the Forest department and asked to declare the animal a 'rogue' and free to be shot by anyone holding a district game licence. But before the declaration was made the elephant struck again, this time about midway between the hamlet of Mudiyanoor and the fairly large village of Talvadi, both situated on an extension of the same track leading from Dimbum to Tallamalai, but about eighteen miles further along it from the spot where the cartman had been killed.

The villager who was attacked was riding a bicycle. He was coming from Talvadi to Mudiyanoor, and was about halfway. And he was wearing a white shirt that hung loosely outside his white shorts. The elephant had evidently seen him approaching and was waiting beside the track; for when he drew abreast, out dashed the elephant upon the cyclist, screaming with rage.

The man both saw and heard the elephant coming, and instinctively did the only possible thing, which saved his life. He threw himself off his machine. Fortunately, at that spot the track ran along an embankment and the villager plunged down this into the bushes and long grass that grew densely on the slope. He disappeared from sight in the undergrowth as the elephant reached his fallen cycle and began to trample it into an unrecognizable, twisted mass of metal, trumpeting lustily and repeatedly in the process. The villager had the good sense to lie quite still. Most probably he was so terrified that he was incapable of movement anyway. The elephant forgot about him in its eagerness to destroy the cycle, which it did most systematically and thoroughly. Finally, tossing it down the khud and almost on top of its petrified owner, the pachyderm shambled away.

The villager lay in the bushes for over an hour till he was sure his attacker had departed. Then, smarting from numerous scratches inflicted by the thorns into which he had rolled, he painfully regained the track, where he looked desperately around, expecting to see the ponderous bulk of his attacker at any moment. But the coast was clear. Then the man bolted for all he was worth, running back towards Talvadi, whence he had set forth nearly two and a half hours earlier.

His description of the elephant tallied very closely with that given by the men who had escaped from the cart. He confirmed that the tusks were not uniform in size or setting, and that the elephant was very black. Shortly after this the Collector of Coimbatore issued his proclamation that the elephant was a rogue and free for shooting by anyone with a game licence.

As if he realized that a price had been set upon his head, the black rogue promptly disappeared from the area and was not seen again there till almost three months later. Meanwhile he chased and killed a Karumba within half a mile of the Ootacamund-Mysore state border, but within the Mudumalai Sanctuary, while the man had been poaching honey. This incident, however, was not taken very seriously, as it was considered that the thief had received just retribution for his misdeeds.

The trunk road that leads from Mysore city to Ootacamund, a beautiful hill station on the Nilgiri Mountains, 7,500 feet above sea level, passes through the heart of both the Bandipur and Mudumalai Sanctuaries, which cover the foothills at the northern base of that lofty range. After leaving Tippakadu, the village where the epic battle between the two elephants had taken place, the road begins a climb of about forty miles, passing a place named Gudalur and negotiating many hairpin bends through extensive coffee, tea and chincona estates before reaching Ootacamund. The road is tarred and excellently maintained by the governments of Mysore state and the Nilgiri district of Madras. It carries moderately heavy traffic, ranging from the private cars of the many visitors to the hills, to Ooatacamund.

At Tippakadu another road branches southeast and covers twenty-one miles before reaching Ootacamund by a shorter route. It crosses the black bridge over the Moyar river from which the villagers had watched the elephants fighting, passes three villages named Masinigudi, Mahvanhalla and Segur respectively, and then climbs up a very steep ghat road to Ootacamund itself. Although only half as long as the main road, this route is scarcely used because of its extreme roughness and its steepness, especially around the hairpin bends; it is definitely dangerous for all but exceptionally good drivers using vehicles of high horse-power and brakes in tip-top condition.

The main road from Bandipur to Gudalur and the shortcut route from Tippakadu to Segur, at the foot of the steep ghat, were periodically visited by the black rogue for three months or so after the Collector of Coimbatore had officially declared him a rogue. But this declaration covered only the forests to the northeast of the Moyar river which, as I have told you, belong to the Coimbatore district. It did not apply to the Mysore and Nilgiri areas, where the elephant had not yet been declared a rogue and was thus still protected. But growing bolder with each escapade, the black elephant hastened his declaration before, sometimes chasing motor cars on both roads.

At Segur he all but added an Englishman, a friend of mine named Collett, to his bag of victims. This gentleman had gone out for an evening stroll with his shotgun and pack of five mongrel dogs, hoping to get a peafowl, junglecock or perhaps a rabbit or brace of partridge for dinner. What he succeeded in bagging I do not know, but towards evening he was sitting on the bank of the Segur river, which is a tributary of the Moyar, his back against a tree and his five dogs round him, when who should come down to drink water but the black rogue himself. He spotted Collett at once and, with his usual shrill scream of anger and hate, charged him forthwith.

My friend had only a shotgun which is useless against an elephant; he had also a permanent injury to his right leg, which made him walk with a slight limp. It certainly prevented him from running or from climbing trees in a hurry. The scene was all set for another murder had not the five dogs, all country-bred, decided to take a hand in the matter by counterattacking the elephant. They ran around him in circles, yapping furiously. This so distracted and enraged the pachyderm that he forgot all about his intended victim and tried to trample the dogs, or seize one of them in his trunk. But the mongrels managed to keep out of reach, and the annoyed elephant dashed vainly in all directions. For no sooner did it concentrate upon catching one of the dogs, than the other four were yapping at its heels. Collett hid behind a tree-trunk and, when the elephant was not looking, managed to reach a footpath in the jungle along which he beat a hasty retreat to the best of his limping ability. Shortly after he had reached his bungalow, the five dogs turned up, all unhurt and panting happily from their exertions.

After about three months the elephant found his way back to the Coimbatore jungles and was not long in claiming another victim there, a villager from a hamlet called Jeergalli which is situated, as the crow flies, about halfway between Mudiyanoor and the deep valley to the southwest through which the Moyar river flows.

Shortly after this incident, an American tourist who was visiting Bangalore came to see me and asked if I would conduct him to some place where he could take movie-pictures of bison. He had visited some of the well-known game sanctuaries of Africa and had a magnificent collection of movie reels of all the game there, including rhino, lion and the great herds of African elephants, which he showed me. He said he now wanted a reel or two of tigers and the Indian bison. I explained that tigers, unlike lions which inhabit open country, live in jungles where pictures cannot easily be taken. But I assured him that it would be comparatively easy to photograph the bison. The outcome of this visit was that he agreed to come with me in his car on a three-day trip, and we started the next morning.

Now I know of no better place than the forests of Coimbatore for photographing bison. Not only are these animals very numerous there, but the jungle is less dense than in some parts of Mysore, and certainly far less thorny. On the way I picked up my old jungle friend and companion, a Sholaga named Rachen, from his hut in the hamlet of Gedesal, and drove on to Dimbum, where we branched off westwards to another hamlet named Honathetti, situated about seven miles along the Dimbum-Tallamalai road. I knew that bison were particularly prolific there.

Due to two punctures and other minor delays, it was nearly 4 p.m. when we arrived at our destination. There was hardly time to start looking for bison immediately. Besides, as everyone knows, evening is not the best time for photography. So I told my American friend that we would spend the night under a tree close to the village and start operations the following morning. Meanwhile we got talking to some of the inhabitants of the place, to whom I explained our mission. They were highly disappointed to hear that we had not come on a regular hunting-trip and tried hard to entice us to sit up that night over a water hole to shoot a sambar for them, for meat. Now not only is shooting over water holes forbidden, but is very unsporting, and we tactfully but firmly refused.

A large number of Sholagas from the hamlet gathered around our camp fire after dinner that night, and one of them volunteered to take Rachen along at dawn next day to pick up the tracks of the nearest bison herd. The plan was to follow the herd till it had bedded down for the day and then come back and tell us. Bison do not move far during the hot noonday hours and it would then be a fairly simple matter for us to accompany our Sholaga guides, get up wind of the place where the bison were resting and move closer cautiously hoping to be able to take some pictures before the herd became scared enough to rush away.

Once our plans were made, we began to talk of other matters, and in the course of conversation the black rogue was mentioned. Naturally, his evil reputation had spread far and wide, but he had not so far molested any of the inhabitants of Honathetti, although he had been seen rather infrequently by a few of them. That had happened some months ago, however, and the consensus of opinion was that he had gone away for good. Nobody thought much about him thereafter.

It was scarcely daylight when the Sholaga from the village put in his promised appearance and took Rachen with him to look for the tracks of any bison that might have passed during the night. He assured us that he felt confident of finding them, for bison were very plentiful in the low hills and jungle around his village.

My friend had no game licence and I was not particularly keen on hunting feathered game, so we spent the next few hours lounging in the camp while listening to the early morning crowing of the junglecocks and the harsher calls of peafowl. The sun was well up and it was getting decidedly hot when the two Sholagas returned, just before ten o'clock, to tell us that they had succeeded in picking up the spoor of quite a large herd of bison, which they had followed for another two miles till they came upon the animals settled for the day by the banks of a small stream that skirted the base of a hillock. From experience they knew the bison would rest there till evening, before they started moving again.

According to the Sholagas, we had at least four miles to walk to this place. Sholagas, like all aborigines, have a very hazy idea of distances, so that I knew we would be lucky if we reached the place in less than six miles. I remember the sun was abnormally hot that morning, so that it was from sheer laziness that I decided to leave my rifle behind. Carrying it for twelve miles did not seem an inviting prospect. Besides, as I have told you, we had come on a photographing mission, and not to shoot.

We set out accordingly, my friend and I sharing the burden of his camera and auxiliary equipment. It was well over three miles, as I had expected, and not just two miles before we came upon the herd's. It was undeniably fresh. The stems of the grass upon which the animals had fed, and their droppings, indicated that fact clearly.

We started following the wide trail and we had covered another three miles before Rachen and the other Sholaga pointed down the low hillside on which we stood. At least another mile away we saw the shimmer of water, almost hidden by trees, that marked the stream where the herd had decided to rest for the day.

The next thing to do was to test the direction of the wind in order to get up-wind of our quarry. Bison have keen scent, and to approach them down-wind would definitely mean that they would detect our coming and leave cover. Luckily we found that the breeze was blowing uphill; that is to say, from the bison towards us. This meant that we would not have to make a detour but steal downwards upon the herd by following their tracks of the night before.

I have mentioned that the stream was quite a mile away. The hillside sloped gently downwards. It was fairly open, park-like country, with scattered and rather small trees, long lush grass, and a few outcroppings of rock here and there. The Sholaga from Honathetti led, as he knew the way, closely followed by the American and Rachen, while I brought up the rear. The sun blazed brightly down upon us from a steely-blue, cloudless sky. Everything appeared serene and peaceful.

Confident in the abilities of the two Sholagas, as trackers and as men well-skilled in jungle lore, I was walking along thinking of nothing in particular when I happened to notice Rachen glance backwards, the way we had come. He stopped abruptly and uttered the ominous words: 'Dorai, annai varudu!', which means, 'Sir, an elephant approaches!'

Looking in the same direction, I was dismayed to see that an elephant was indeed heading through the scattered trees and directly towards us. He appeared to be only a furlong away. There was no mistaking the purposefulness of the shambling run. There was no hesitation, no sign of timidity or fear, no attempt to avoid us and slink away. This elephant was bent upon reaching us just as fast as he could.

I knew what would be his next step. As soon as he felt he was close enough he would raise his scream of hate and charge down upon us. A normal elephant would have behaved quite differently. As soon as he had scented or seen human beings, he would have done his best to get away. But this animal was deliberately following us, and there was a sinister, evil purpose about him. Without any doubt, here was the rogue I had heard so much about. Even at that distance, he seemed mahogany-black.

Neither the Sholaga who was leading nor my American friend was yet aware of his presence, for he made no sound as he approached. Fortunate, indeed, that Rachen had looked back and observed him. Otherwise at least one of us would have died very painfully that day!

Desperately I gazed around, looking for a way of escape. As I have said, the trees were small. There was not one that the elephant could not push over easily. But about 200 yards away and to our right, I could distinguish a rock half hidden from view by the boles of intervening trees. I had no means of knowing how big it was or how high. But it was a rock and it was our only refuge.

Refraining from shouting, as I did not want the elephant to hear me and perhaps precipitate a charge, I called softly to my American friend: 'Follow me to that rock to our right. The rogue elephant is behind us. Run for it!'

The effect on him might have been called amusing under less strained circumstances. He stopped dead in his tracks and gazed around confusedly.

'What's that?' he asked. 'Where?'

Running forward, I grabbed his arm and started pushing him towards the rock, while I tried to break into a run myself. Meanwhile Rachen called a low warning to the other Sholaga.

The elephant had been shambling forwards and was only a little over half a furlong away. Undoubtedly he had seen our quickened movements and guessed that his presence had been discovered. For without further ado he trumpeted shrilly. Then he charged!

My friend threw down his camera and the four of us ran, as fast as we could run, for that rock. Regardless of the long grass, the thorns and the intervening trees, we covered the ground at a most creditable speed with the elephant, now trumpeting repeatedly, behind us. Being but a short distance from the rock we managed to maintain our lead and reached our objective about 100 yards ahead of our pursuer.

It was a low, sloping rock, hardly three feet above ground level at one end, and about five feet at the other. But there was no other avenue of escape and we leapt upon the rock almost together. It may have been about thirty feet long. Without stopping, we ran up the slope to the higher extremity. There was a fissure in the rock, from one end to the other. Coarse grass grew in this declivity.

Breathlessly we reached the higher end of the rock and then turned to see what the elephant would do. The infuriated rogue made directly for us, and as we stepped backwards and out of reach of his extended trunk he came to a halt with the bottom portion of his chest against the stone. In this position he continued to trumpet deafeningly, alternately blowing blasts of air at us through his trunk. After a few moments the elephant realized we were out of reach. His next action was to uproot the shrubs growing nearby and, holding them with the tip of his trunk, he tried to flog us with them. Of course, we stepped further backwards, but it did not occur to him to come around the rock to its lower end. Instead he found a piece of loose stone and hurled it at us, narrowly missing my friend.

It took the beast ten minutes to think of reaching us from the opposite end; then things began to happen in real earnest. Evidently the idea came to him suddenly, for he abruptly stopped trumpeting and, with a surprising turn of speed for his bulk, shuffled around the rock to the other end. There he found the rock only three feet high. Placing one ponderous forefoot on the granite, he cautiously tested it for stability and in the next few seconds had climbed onto the rock and was coming straight for us.

It was now that Rachen exhibited a marvellous coolness of nerve and thought. For he called in Tamil: 'Jump down quickly. The elephant will not attempt to follow us that way. It is too steep and he will be afraid of breaking a leg!'

Suiting the action to his words, he jumped, and the three of us followed without delay. My friend then started to run for it, but I caught hold of him and said: 'Stop. He won't attempt to jump five feet to the ground with his ponderous weight; but if we leave this rock he will go around and catch one of us in the open.'

The rogue reached the edge of the rock, where he towered above us—a truly awesome sight! Once more he tried to reach us with his trunk and then waved one forefoot in space as if to try a leap. But he thought better of it and restrained himself while he screamed with hate. We stood beyond his reach and awaited his next move.

After perhaps a minute he swung around and rushed back to the lower end. Hesitating again, he finally stepped down gingerly and turned to come around the rock and catch us. So we drew ourselves up those five feet and got to the top only seconds before he was below us again, and at the spot at which he had first arrived.

Twice more the enraged bull shambled around the rock and climbed up from the lower end. Twice more we leaped down those five feet and stood just out of his reach at the base. It was a game of catch-as-catch-can in real earnest, with the prospect of a terrible death by being trampled upon and torn to shreds if one was late by a split-second, either in jumping down or climbing up again. If there had been only one or two of us in this lively bit of gymnastics, it would not have been so bad. But as there were four, we kept getting in each other's way, particularly when it came to climbing up the five-foot ledge. With an agonizing death as the penalty for being a fraction of a second too slow, it was every man for himself.

Worst of all, perhaps, was the nerve-shattering screaming of the elephant. The very air vibrated with the sound and it required a mighty effort of will not to become rooted to the spot in terror. Fortunately, after the third attempt, the enraged animal either grew tired or came to realize he could not catch us this way. It was a mistake, however, for had he continued we would have become exhausted and sooner or later he would have caught one of us.

But he desisted and now started walking around the rock on which we stood, every now and again rushing up to it and attempting to reach us with his trunk. Each time he did that, we scampered in a bunch to the opposite end, where we would wait till he came around and we scampered back again. While all this was going on I was cursing myself for my sheer laziness in not bringing my rifle. The sun was almost directly overhead and blazed down upon us from a cloudless sky. Waves of heat arose from the rock and shimmered in the still air. Hastily I glanced at my wristwatch. It was almost noon.

Eventually the heat and the sun began to be felt by the elephant himself. He ceased his strenuous tactics and stood in the shade of a tree just a few yards away. There he stayed put. An hour passed in this manner. The granite rock on which we stood became unbearably hot. The heat penetrated the rubber soles of my shoes, so that I could stand on two feet only with difficulty. It was even worse for the two Sholagas, for they were both barefoot; they fairly hopped on the rock as the heat burned the bare soles of their feet.

A crazy idea came to me to try to frighten the monster away. I told my three companions to start shouting for all they were worth, and I joined their chorus of discordant yells. But far from alarming him, our voices caused the elephant to charge us once again, and this time he came straight onto the rock from the three-foot end. In a group we jumped down from the other end and stood out of his reach once more, while he literally danced with rage at the brink above us. All four of us knew that if he but made the leap, one at least of our number would not see the light of another day. But although furious, the elephant was cautious and did not jump. He remained on the rock and screamed and blew air in our faces with his extended trunk.

It was very likely that after a while the heat from the stone began to penetrate even the thick soles of his mighty feet, for he kept lifting his legs up, one at a time, in quick succession. Then he turned and lumbered off the rock from the lower end. In a bunch, the four of us scrambled up the burning stone again. This time we remained silent, watching the brute who was also watching us.

This stalemate continued for another few minutes, then the rogue turned abruptly and shambled over the hillock from which he had come and disappeared from view. I began to congratulate myself that we were well rid of him when both the Sholagas said they thought it was a ruse and that the elephant was only trying to draw us off the rock. So to test this theory, all four of us descended and walked about fifty yards away. Suddenly came a crack and crash of breaking wood, a scream of hate, and there was the rogue charging down upon us from quite another direction. Up the rock we scrambled once more.

The elephant kept us another half hour. Then he walked off again, this time heading for the stream where the bison herd was sheltering. Being downhill, we could see him for some distance till his black form was finally hidden by the intervening trees. Suspecting he was up to his old game, we did not leave the rock, but asked the Sholagas to climb two of the highest of the trees to see if they could catch a glimpse of him if he made a detour and tired to approach from another direction. They did this and after a while signalled that the coast was clear.

When the Sholagas rejoined us, Rachen said that the pachyderm had probably felt the heat and had gone off to the stream for a drink and a bath. After that, he said, it might return and stay by the rock till night fell.

The idea of playing that ghastly game of hide-and-seek with this black monster in pitch darkness terrified me. Handicapped by being unable to see him clearly, I was sure one or other of us would eventually be caught. I suggested we run for it before the rogue came back, a plan which met with unanimous approval.

I asked Rachen to retrieve the American's camera, which he did at once. Then the four of us stepped off the rock and headed for the village. Many were the glances of apprehension that we threw behind us to see if we were being followed as we ran at a jog trot towards Honathetti. But clearly the elephant had really gone for water, for he was nowhere to be seen. Streaming with perspiration and panting from our exertions in the terrible afternoon heat, we reached the village at a quarter to three, glad to have escaped with our lives from a ghastly death.

I was tired and angry. Above all else, I was ashamed. For nearly three hours my companions and I had been engaged in a cat-and-mouse game wherein we had most definitely been the 'mice'. Now that I had my rifle in my hands, weary as I was, I determined to return immediately with the Sholagas and try to find the black elephant once again and continue the game, but this time with the position reversed. I would very soon show this arrogant pachyderm that he was going to be the mouse.

My American friend wanted to come back with us, and if possible take pictures of the elephant's discomfiture. But his presence would have been an unnecessary responsibility, apart from hampering my movements. Very politely, but firmly, I reminded him that he was a photographer and not a hunter. Good sportsman that he was, he understood and did not take offence, although chagrin was written large on his countenance.

Walking fast, and sometimes trotting, Rachen, the second Sholaga and I made for the rock. This time we moved boldly forward through the park-like belt of jungle that surrounded the place and reached it within the hour. There was no elephant to be seen. It was just four o'clock and we had a little over two hours of daylight in which to find the elephant, something that is easier said than done, considering he had the whole jungle before him. But I remembered I had two Sholagas with me. The aborigines, who have lived in the forests for generations, are among the finest trackers anywhere in the world, so there was a reasonable chance of coming up with our quarry.

We moved in the direction in which the pachyderm had disappeared. The jungle was dry, and he had not been feeding but moving directly towards the stream, so that, in spite of his great bulk, his passage through the undergrowth and long grass would not have been evident to an inexperienced eye. But Rachen and his companion had no difficulty in finding it. It was interesting to observe how their trained sight detected every stem of grass that had been bent or broken by the passing animal, and every leaf or twig that had been stamped flat under those giant feet.

Following this trail, it did not take us very long to arrive at the point where the black elephant had reached the stream. Lank reed-like grass grew there and we could clearly see where he had forced his way through it to the water's edge. Rachen strode into the stream, which reached to just above his knees, and at the spot where the elephant had drunk water he turned and began to walk upstream along the trail marked by the crushed reeds and water-plants, while the other Sholaga and I walked parellel to him along the bank.

For some reason the elephant had not crossed the stream, but after wading in the water for about 100 yards had come back to the side on which we stood. Evidently he had drunk his fill, for his plate-like spoor, imprinted at the edge of the bank and still clouded with the muddy water that had seeped in, left the little rivulet after a short distance and led back into the jungle.

We followed this trail closely, knowing that the rogue would now be feeding and that we could expect to hear him before long if he had not already travelled too far inland. It was hot and he might even make for the water a second time for another drink. But that would be a little later, towards sunset, when elephants usualy drink. We had more than an hour before us and could expect to find our quarry feeding inland and at a considerable distance from the river.

As we surmised, the trail turned into the jungle. The elephant had been in no hurry, for he had halted now and again under some of the shadier trees and had evidently been lazing about while sheltered from the sun.

Nearly a mile was covered in this fashion when we first heard the unmistakable crack of a bough being torn down. The branch evidently had a thick layer of bark, for the crack was followed by a twanging sound as the elephant tore the wood from the tree, stripping and pulling the bark from the main limb when it did not break easily. From the volume of the sound and its direction, our quarry was easily a couple of furlongs distant.

If you should ever want to approach anywhere near a wild elephant, the most essential thing is to test the direction in which the breeze is blowing. Having done that, you must work your way into such a position that the wind is blowing from him to you. Should you neglect to do this and approach downwind instead, or even partly downwind, the elephant's keen sense of smell will make him aware of your coming. Then one of the two things will happen. A normal elephant, and often a rogue too, when his instinct warns him that you are no ordinary passing peasant but an enemy, will just fade noiselessly from the scene, and when you reach the spot where he was standing you will find nothing. Alternatively, the elephant may ambush you by waiting silently behind rock, a tree, or a clump of bamboo, till you are very near him, when he will charge at you screaming, flattening every obstacle in his way. This is a favourite habit of rogue elephants, particularly one who has already killed a number of people and has come to realize the utter helplessness of that most obnoxious biped, man!

I tore a handful of grass from the ground, held it aloft in my hand, and then slowly released the broken blades and stems, allowing them to fall to the ground singly. They all drifted from right to left. That meant the wind was blowing from the right and that I was in a midway position, being neither up-wind nor down-wind from my quarry who was directly ahead of us. This was not good enough, so we all turned to the left and made our way forward in single file, as silently as we were able, around the intervening bushes and tree-trunks. We covered over two furlongs in this way when the sound of another crack came to us from a half-right direction. It was fainter this time.

Once again I tested the wind to verify that it had not changed its course. Then we all turned to the front and crept stealthily forward in single file and at angle of ninety degrees to the direction which we had just been following. We might have covered anything up to 200 yards in this fashion when the elephant broke a third branch. This time the sound came from due right. We had detoured enough and were now directly upwind. He could not possibly get our scent unless he himself moved to some other place. Now we had only to be sure we made no noise approaching him, and then he would be at my mercy.

In single file we moved forward, Rachen leading, with me in the centre and the Sholaga from Hanathetti behind me. Judging by the last sound we had heard, the elephant was at least a quarter of a mile or more away. We covered that distance slowly, but heard no further sound. Probably the rogue had already brought down enough branches to provide him with a succulent repast of green leaves and was busy eating them.

A few paces further forward and the ground dropped into a small valley, formed by two low hills. The elephant was clearly in the valley. But such places are unfavourable for stalking an animal with such an acute sense of smell as an elephant, because the hills on either side often cut off any breeze, so that in the still air the smell of human being, particularly when there are three of them together, is carried to the elephant in the motionless atmosphere. That is just what happened, for the elephant got wind of us. Instinctively he knew his enemy was approaching and he slunk stealthily away.

When we came to the place where he had been feeding we found the broken branches and his fresh dung, but of the elephant itself there was no trace. Working together now, the two Sholagas began to follow his track, with me close behind to cover them. It was an easy task. The pachyderm had moved along the little valley which soon ended in the dry bed of a rather big nullah. His large footprints, clearly visible in the powdery earth, showed that he had turned down the nullah, which obviously led back to the stream from which we had lately come, now well over a mile away. We knew that if he reached the stream he would cross it and probably escape on the other side. Evening had already set in and there was scarcely an hour of daylight left. The only course left to us was to cast caution aside and chase after him to get in a shot before it was too late. So we began to run down the nullah.

No doubt the rogue, hearing us and by now thoroughly alarmed, started to increase his pace as well. After half a mile or so I was fairly blown, although the two jungle men with me showed no trace of their exertions. The nullah turned in its course and then straightened out. Far ahead of me, and shuffling away for all he was worth, I could see the black rogue—or rather the hind portion of him—heading for the stream. I did not want to fire, as the most I could do was to wound him in the hindquarters, and I do not like wounding any animal, even a rogue elephant, deliberately. So, puffing and blowing and badly out of breath, I followed as best I could.

The elephant disappeared around the next curve. In due course we reached the same bend, turned it, and saw the stream a couple of hundred yards ahead. But just before the stream was the elephant, or rather half of him, for his back was still turned towards us, while his body was twisting and turning, without seeming to make any progress.

Struck with surprise and wondering what could be delaying him, we put on a spurt, or rather my companions did. As for me—well, I could not have put on a spurt even if the elephant had been behind me! However, I drew abreast of them at last, and found that the elephant was stuck fast in a quagmire which reached up to his belly. The explanation was simple enough. The spot where the nullah met the stream had become a bog, due to the soft sand in the nullah being saturated with the water that seeped into it from the stream. The elephant, scurrying away in fear, had blundered straight into it.

Quicksands, in the true meaning of the term, are I believe, unknown in southern India, although conditions almost approaching them are to be found in some places. For instance, in the upper reaches of the Secret river, above the hamlet of Anchetty in the district of Salem, there is one particular spot where it is positively dangerous to cross at a time when the river is almost dry. I know this to my cost, for I once had tried to cross and had suddenly found myself waist-deep in the ooze. But for the help of two Forest Guards, I think I might have remained there for an indefinite period or even have been drawn under. Very vividly I can still remember how I struggled for all I was worth, but could not succeed by my own efforts in shifting either of my feet an inch out of that clinging slime.

For the elephant, now struggling madly before us, conditions were infinitely worse. His tremendous bulk and weight, coupled with his desperate exertions, made matters worse each moment. Slowly, little by little, he was being drawn down into the ooze before our very eyes. With his trunk he lashed the mud before him to right and left as he tried to find a way to lever himself out. He screamed in sheer terror, while his little eyes were dilated with horror as instinct told him he was doomed. And every moment, inch by inch, he sank lower and lower, while his screams, that had been filled with dread, now took on a piteous note of appeal.

Killer though he had been, his dreadful plight filled all three of us with acute distress. As if it had been yesterday, I remember my own feelings when I had sunk in the wet sand that day on the Secret river. To shoot him in this terrible plight, while struggling for his very life, appeared to be the act of a coward and murderer. A strange and powerful yearning came over me to try to succour him if possible.

But there was just nothing we could do. He was, after all, a wild elephant and to come within reach of that threshing trunk would be certain death. Even as we watched, the spectacle became more and more harrowing. The poor beast was now literally up to his neck in the liquid sand and his back was almost level with its surface. To make the scene even more dramatic, darkness was setting in apace. Escape for the poor animal was clearly impossible. Either he would soon be drawn under and suffocated, which was really the less evil fate, or if his feet found solid ground at the last moment, he could only remain stuck till he starved to death. I could not save him, but I could put an end to his sufferings. And I would have to do that at once, as it would soon be too dark to see.

There is a fatal shot which, if taken correctly, will drop even the largest elephant in his tracks, although it is one that is rarely achieved because of the obvious difficulty of getting the chance to take it: a shot behind the ear, where the bullet will penetrate the brain from an angle unprotected by the enormously thick bones of the forehead. Kneeling down, I aimed carefully behind the left ear, waited for it to stop moving, held my breath, and gently squeezed the trigger.

The explosion had hardly died away when the elephant quivered as if in an ague. The trunk hit the mud with an inert flop, although the tip of it still searched questioningly, like some giant caterpillar groping for a leaf. I ran a few paces to the right, knelt again, and repeated the shot, this time behind the right ear.

A sigh of relief escaped all three of us. At least the poor beast could suffer no more. It was dead.

We came away from that dreadful place and groped our way back to Honathetti in darkness. But the Sholagas, whose village it was, led us there unerringly. Eventually we were back, and I told my American friend of our harrowing experience. But he, not having seen it himself, said he wished he had been there to take photographs, and that he would like to go to the spot the next morning to see if any could be taken.

Filled with a morbid curiosity as to whether those evil sands had finally claimed their victim or not, I accompanied him the next day. We reached the spot, but all we could see was a placid surface of undisturbed wet sand, glinting innocently in the rays of the early morning sun. The elephant had disappeared completely, and the soaking sands held their dark secret.

Five

Jungle Days and Nights

During the many years i have lived in these isolated places, off the beaten track, various little incidents have taken place, not themselves amounting to adventures, but milestones nevertheless on the long road of memory which often come back to me in my quieter moments. I would like to recount a few of them, some of them rather tragic, others humorous, and even one incident in which I behaved in a downright shameful way.

It took place many years ago, but the memory of that incident still haunts me to this day and I cannot live it down. It is said that making a confession of one's sins will relieve a troubled conscience. So I am going to do that now.

But every evil doer should be allowed to defend himself, and my defence lies in a prologue, an incident that took place earlier, the result of which was very strong in my memory and powerfully influenced me when the second incident occurred.

This first incident took place about twenty-five years ago. My friend, Deva Sundram, and I had gone out in my Ford to a place named Gummalapur, about twenty-eight miles south of Bangalore, for khubbar about panther. Do not let the word khubbar alarm you; it is just a simple Hindustani term for news or information.

Gummalapur lies in the Salem district of Madras state and is scarcely three miles beyond the Mysore state border. Two miles west of Gummalapur are many rugged, broken hills, covered with heavy scrub on their lower slopes and granite boulders and little caves at the top. In between these hills winds a narrow stream bearing the somewhat difficult name of Muthiyalamma Holay. It holds water only during the rainy season, is rocky in places, while at others it is full of marvellously soft sand. On both banks the jungle becomes dense and the trees lofty and verdant.

In the days when my father was a lad, and even when I was very young, this forest harboured tiger, elephant, bison and panther, in addition of course to all the normal game animals to be found in this part of the country. But after that the tigers and bison disappeared, shot out by the many hunters who came from nearby Bangalore. The elephants, protected by the government, are still there, but fewer, and are only to be seen during the monsoon months when they trek northwards from the Cauvery river. The panthers remain for a variety of reasons. Firstly, they are common wherever hills occur. Secondly, there is abundant food for them in the many herds of domestic cattle that are driven into the jungle from Gummalapur to graze. Thirdly, people are not as keen to hunt panthers as they are to kill the larger varieties of game.

Deva Sundram and I had gone there to inquire from the local herdsmen whether they had recently lost many of their animals to panthers, and we had also come for a morning stroll in the scrub-jungle in the hope of picking up some feathered game, or a jungle-sheep or pig, to roast for dinner that night.

I forget now what information we got from the herdsmen, but we had crossed the river and walked up a slope in the scrub that soon brought us to the crest of a little hillock. From this eminence we looked across the carpet of jungle below us and scanned the wooded slopes of the higher hills.

Then we saw something, perhaps about a mile away and close to where the border of Mysore state fringes the jungle. Vultures were circling in the sky, many of them. Every now and then one would plane to earth, gliding with outstretched wings to disappear into a small valley in a fold of the hills. It was too far away to hear the rushing, rattling sound made by the wind as it beat against those outstretched pinions. There could be only one explanation. Something was lying dead in the valley. The vultures had located it and were hastening to the feast.

Could it be a panther's kill? Perhaps one of the many cattle that had been taken out to graze in the scrub, and as yet had not been missed by its owner.

With one accord, Dev and I made for the spot. It was not difficult to locate. The hissing, occasionally squawking horde of vultures, struggling and jostling each other on the ground, led us directly to the body. But a very big surprise was in store for us as the huge birds flapped away heavily and took to the air with difficulty. Certainly, a dead body lay there, but it was not the remains of a bull or a cow that had been killed by a panther. It was a human corpse, and as we approached we saw it was the body of a woman.

She had evidently been murdered and then tied to a bamboo pole by her hands and feet, lengths of jungle-vine being used for the purpose instead of the more conventional rope. Then she had been dumped in the jungle, close to the trunk of a large sandalwood tree. The vultures had evidently been feasting for some time, for they had torn chunks of flesh from the body. The eyes had been picked from their sockets, the nose was gone, and holes had been made through the skin of the cheeks and throat, laying bare the bones beneath. But most of the scalp remained, with the long black hair still adhering to it.

The corpse was naked, the birds having torn the thin saree and jacket to shreds. The entrails had been drawn out and devoured, laying bare a deep cavity in her abdomen, and a large part of the flesh of her arms, thighs and legs had also been eaten, so that the white bones could be seen. Had we arrived an hour or so later, we would have found nothing but the bones, picked clean. The vultures would have seen to that.

Dev and I bent over the body, trying to discover how the woman had died. But we gave up that task in a few minutes. The vultures had been at work too long and had effectively destroyed any trace of the manner in which she had been killed; that is, if the murderer or murderers had left any traces at all.

One thing was certain, however. Robbery had not been the motive. A pair of heavy silver anklets still encircled the ankle-bones where the flesh had been eaten away; a ring, which appeared to be of gold, was still on one of the fingers of the right hand; and earrings, undoubtedly of some value, were on the ears. Perhaps she had worn a nose ornament also. But that was gone now—along with the nose! She had a number of glass bangles, multi-coloured and of fancy design, on both arms right up to her elbows.

The smell of decay and putrefaction hung heavily on the still air and Dev, who was essentially an office man, unused to such sights and odours, was on the verge of retching. He clapped a handkerchief over his nose and mouth and backed away.

Our cursory examination proved of no value whatever. Obviously, after murdering the unfortunate woman, the culprits had brought the corpse to this remote spot at night rather than risk the trouble and danger involved in digging a grave and burying her. They knew quite well that within a few hours of daylight the vultures would completely obliterate all evidence of the crime. If a bone or two remained, the jackals and any hyena that passed that way the next night would complete the job. All had gone according to plan, except for the most unfortunate and unforeseen fact that that day, of all days, Dev and I had decided to take a walk in the jungle.

Now what were we going to do about it? Obviously, as public-minded people, report the matter to the police. With this in view, we set off on our walk back to Gummalapur. At the top of the first hillock I looked back to fix the location of the valley in my mind in case I should be required to find it again. That done, we hurried on. We reached the village only to find that the one and only policeman had fallen ill and been taken to hospital at the town of Hosur.

Now, as I have told you, this area lay in the district of Salem, belonging to Madras state. Hosur town was the immediate headquarters, but it was also considerably out of our way. Both Dev and I were due back on duty at our respective jobs that afternoon. So we decided to inform the patel or headman of Gummalapur village of what we had found and where we had found it, return to Bangalore and send a written report to the Police Station at Hosur by post. As Bangalore itself is in Mysore state, such a report, if made to the police at Bangalore, would be returned with instructions to forward it to the Madras police.

So we told the patel and next morning posted a report from Bangalore. Two days later things began to happen in real earnest. A police van turned up at my house with three varieties of policemen in it, all wearing different uniforms. There were police from Hosur, in Madras state, with their tall red turbans. There were police from Bangalore Cantonment, at that time a British-administered sector under Central British government control, in blue and white turbans. And there were Mysore state police in blue turbans with red and yellow tabs.

Then began a perfect avalanche of questioning. Was I Mr Anderson? What was my full name, occupation and income? Where was Mr Deva Sundram? What was his full name, occupation and income? Why had we gone to Gummalapur? How had we found the dead woman? Was she a close friend or merely a casual acquaintance? Why should we have gone to that particular spot? Was the woman alive when we found her? Was she dead? How had she died? Was I sure that one or other of us did not know her before? What was her name? Where had she come from? Was she a young woman? Now came a very important question that I was to answer very carefully; did she bear gunshot wounds? Why did we not report the matter to the policeman at Gummalapur? Why had we failed to do our duty by not proceeding in person at once to Hosur to report the matter there? Where had we been all that day and the previous one? Were we in the habit of visiting Gummalapur frequently?

It took me some time to stop the tide of questions. I pointed out that, in our joint statement, Dev and I had clearly written down all the relevant facts. I went over those facts again.

The inexorable questioning continued. How had we known the woman was really dead? Might she not have been alive; perhaps in a faint? Had we taken steps to render first-aid? Why should the murderers (according to our version and if such ever existed) take the trouble to bind the body to a pole and carry it deep into the jungle? Would it not have been more easy to bury her?

I found myself becoming annoyed. I pointed out that I was not a detective and had made my report as a public-minded citizen. I told them it would have been very easy for us to have said nothing. It was all to no avail. Then came an order veiled in the form of a request.

Would I please lead them to Deva Sundram's residence, after which we would both have to proceed to the police station at Hosur.

Now I became really annoyed. I told the three varieties of policemen that I would certainly lead them to Deva Sundram's house, but after that I would not go to Hosur unless they cared to take me under arrest, for which they would require a warrant.

We compromised for the moment by going to Dev's house, where it started all over again. During these questions and answers we suddenly discovered, and with considerable surprise, that the Hosur police had not yet gone to the spot to locate the body. We suggested they do so without delay, giving them explicit directions.

There was some hesitation and much consultation between the three varieties of representatives of the law as to what should, or rather could, be done with both of us. The contingent from Hosur wanted very much to take us back with them, but the element from Bangalore Cantonment did not think it could be done without warrant. The Mysore state policemen remained neutral, ready to assist either way. At last the party drove off after warning both of us to hold ourselves available for further questioning.

Two days later they were back again. They had failed to find any corpse! Not even bones! Not even the bamboo pole to which we had said the body had been tied. Had there really been a body at all?

The result was that I said I would lead them to the place. Dev was busy and could not come. I went in the police van to Gummalapur. From there I set out with the party along the route Dev and I had returned that morning. We climbed the last hillock and I located the valley from it. Finally we reached the large sandalwood tree beneath which we had found the dead woman.

There was no body to be seen; no bones, not a shred of torn saree, and above all, no bamboo pole. Nothing! All the varieties of policemen glared at me with concentrated suspicion. Was this a joke? Was I trying to make monkeys out of them?

I approached the very spot on which the corpse had been lying and searched it closely. There I came across the half of a broken glass bangle and, in a little while, a few strands of long, raven-black hair — undoubtedly hair from a woman's head. I pointed these things out to the policemen in proof of the veracity of our report. I suggested that the murderers were in Gummalapur and had come to know of our discovery when Dev and I had been inquiring for the village policeman on our return that morning. Also they must have heard about our report to the patel. Obviously they had returned and removed the remains in order to baffle investigation.

The policemen's reaction to my theory was more unexpected than ever. They wanted to know how I had been able to find my way back and lead them to the exact spot. They also wanted to know what had made me search so as to find the piece of the broken glass bangle and the strands of hair.

I took a deep breath upon hearing these questions and counted up to ten, very slowly. I then told them I would answer through my lawyer. But that made them more suspicious than ever. To cut a long story short, it took nearly three months of correspondence with higher officials, plus two visits to the police station at Hosur, before Dev and I ceased to be regarded as murderers. The solution found by the Madras Police was certainly a neat one. They said the murder must have been committed in Mysore state jurisdiction and the body then brought across the frontier and dumped in the Madras jungles. When it became known that the corpse had been discovered, the culprits had taken it back again.

The Mysore Police strongly rejected this view. Nobody had been murdered their side of the border, they said, adding that the Madras theory was an invention to cover the truth. Wherever the crime was committed and whoever did it, the fact remains that neither victim nor culprits were ever traced.

This was the second time I had suffered from officialdom through making a report of what I had found in the jungle. Once before I had come upon a dead elephant that was only half-grown. It had been shot behind the ear by a ball from a musket. The wound was clearly discernible. I had reported that find to the local Forest Department, accompanied by a photograph I had taken of the dead animal, showing the wound. I almost lost my game licence because of that report, because I was suspected of having shot the elephant myself, after which it was said I had made the report to cover up my own misdeed. That case also involved a lot of correspondence. I had to interview a very high official and tell him my story. I still feel he did not believe me. But as the local Forest Guards had placed dry wood upon the carcass of the dead elephant and burnt it because of the stench that spread for about a mile around the spot my guilt could not be proved. So I was graciously given the benefit of the doubt and allowed to retain my game or shooting licence, but under strong suspicion.

Having recounted these two incidents as a 'prologue', I will now go on to tell you about the main occurrence which took place about five years ago, and in which I feel I behaved so very discreditably. Four of us were returning from a visit to a planter friend named Alfie Morrison, the manager of a couple of large coffee estates on the Biligirirangan Mountains. There was the owner of the car we were travelling in; my son's friend, Rustam Dudhwala; another friend named Willie Wollen; my son, Donald, and myself. We had dinner with Alfie Morrison followed by coffee and snacks and a little of his excellent whisky, after which we had been talking for some hours. It was long past midnight when we left his estate, and we had to cover over twenty miles of dense jungle before we reached a place named Punjur. It was a narrow, tortuous road, dropping steeply in places, with bamboo jungle on both sides, the haunt mainly of elephant, bison, and sambar, with an occasional tiger or lesser species of carnivore. Rustam was driving and I was next to him. The other two were behind.

We were about half-way to Punjur. The jungle was particularly dense and heavy. The time was 1.15 a.m. Suddenly, as Rustam turned a sharp bend in the road, we saw a human figure stretched across it, clearly visible in the bright light of the car. He braked hard to prevent running over the man, and we all got out to see what was the matter.

We found that the figure, lying in the middle of the road, was not that of a man at all but of a woman; in fact, of a girl who might have been about eighteen years of age. She was evidently poor, judging from the cheap quality of her red and black saree. Both her saree and her jacket were torn in many places and much of the former was covered with blood. This had not been visible in the lights of the car because, as I have told you, it was a black and red saree and neither colour will show up blood by artificial light at a distance. A closer examination showed the girl had been violently molested and raped. She was quite unconscious, probably from the effects of a blow or other injury. Her bare bosom moved only slightly as she breathed, and her pulse was very weak.

What should be done? The spontaneous reaction of all four of us was to carry her into the car, drive the remaining ten miles to Punjur and report the matter to the police there, and then take her to the hospital at the town of Chamrajnagar, a few miles away. But other thoughts began to filter through. Before us lay a young girl. She had been brutally raped. There were four of us in the car and we were all men! If we took the girl to the police station at Punjur, in that condition and with the circumstantial evidence, including the late hour of the night, the police would probably say the four of us had done the raping. They might even say we had knocked her down with the car and raped her afterwards. Of course, if the girl recovered consciousness, either at the police station at Punjur or at the hospital at Chamrajnagar, she would clear us of suspicion. But would she? What if her attackers had come upon her by surprise? What if she did not know them? Remember, we had no means of being certain where she had been set upon. It might have happened elsewhere and the culprits may have brought her in an unconscious condition in a bullock-cart and dumped her in the middle of the road. In the confused state of mind she would be in when she recovered—if she recovered at all—she might genuinely think we had been responsible and accuse us. Finally, and worst of all, suppose she had been so seriously injured that she never recovered. We would be in a terrible plight with charges of rape and murder against us. We would be in a court case that might drag on for years. We might be jailed. We might even be hanged.

We argued the situation there, in the middle of the road, for nearly an hour, hoping the girl might show signs of returning consciousness, when we would have spoken to her, found out what happened and then taken her into the car. But she never regained consciousness. On the contrary, her breathing became slower and her pulse almost imperceptible.

It was a difficult decision to take, to desert a human being, obviously in dire need and at the point of death, in the middle of an elephant-infested jungle, at dead of night, miles from anywhere and without aid. On the other hand, I remembered the incident of the dead elephant and the murdered woman near Gummalapur. I had been accused on both occasions. Now the evidence against us, although circumstantial, was certainly much greater and almost conclusive. The only defence we could offer was that, had we been guilty, we would have left the girl and not brought her to safety. But even that action could be interpreted as a cunning move to cover our guilt. As the oldest member of the party, I knew I could have persuaded the others to run the risk of what might happen and take the girl in the car to Punjur and then to the hospital at Chamrajnagar. But I did not. Instead, I agreed with them to leave the poor girl where she lay and to continue on our way.

Of course, we never heard what befell that unfortunate young woman. But the action of deserting her and leaving her to her fate is one that fills me with guilt till this very day.

I will now change the mood of these reminiscences by telling you two short stories against myself, stories that show what effect the appearance of a tiger has on the nerves of a tyro.

The first incident took place when I was fifteen years old. My father had taken me to a place named Lingadhalli, in the Kadur district of Mysore state, on a duck and snipe-shooting trip. Dad was never a big game wallah , although it was he who taught me how to use a gun at a very early age. He was an excellent snipe shot, at which I am a complete failure even to this day, and was fond of duck-shooting particularly and also other small game.

There are two or three tanks near Lingadhalli which, around Christmas time, hold quite a number of wild-duck and teal, with occasional geese. There are also reserved forests surrounding it which hold tiger and panther. Our armament consisted of Dad's favourite .16 bore double-barrelled shotgun, and an old hammer .12 bore double-barrelled shotgun which he had given me for my birthday that year.

It was reported to me on the afternoon of the second day that a tiger had killed a bull in an areca-nut plantation adjacent to the tank where we had gone to shoot duck that very morning. The owner told me about it, but I kept the matter a secret from Dad. I knew he would not allow me to go after a tiger. My knowledge of big game shooting at that time was practically nil, but when the owner offered to tie a machan for me if I made an attempt to shoot the tiger that had killed his bull, I resolved to do or die in the attempt and told him to go ahead.

I told Dad a lie that evening, saying I was going out with a villager to shoot 'flying fox', which is the name given to the large Indian fruit-bat, and said that I would return about eleven o'clock. I fondly imagined I would bring the dead tiger back with me. Leaving Dad in the little Travellers' Bungalow on the plea that I wanted to try my luck at shooting peafowl and hare (rabbits) before going on for the flying fox, I started out a little before 5 p.m. In less than an hour I was alone in the machan in the midst of the tall, swaying areca-nut trees, with the dead bull stretched on the ground beneath me.

To this day I can remember that machan. It could not have been much more than twelve feet above the ground; a rough, scraggy, unprotected affair. Certainly the kind of machan a tiger would easily detect and therefore not visit or come anywhere near. But we have all heard of beginner s luck', and it was with me on that memorable evening.

It was dusk when the tiger came, and almost the first thing he did was to look up and see me sitting on that very obvious platform. He snarled and stopped in his stride. I was petrified with terror. Not a muscle would move or obey my command. I wanted to scream aloud in fear. But even that I could not do. The tiger took off with a grunt of alarm and anger as the .12 slipped from my nerveless fingers and rolled off the platform to fall with a thud on the ground beneath. Fortunately the soil was wet and soft, and the gun fell stock-first, so that nothing happened to it. But I was thoroughly disgruntled and hated myself for being an arrant coward, nor did I tell Dad anything about it when I got back to the travellers' bungalow before 8 p.m. that night.

Mortified at what had happened, it was not long afterwards that I went on a hunting trip with another boy, slightly older than myself, named Jerry Barrow. We went to a village a few miles away from the town of Sagar in the Shimoga district of Mysore state. Once again our luck, as novices, was excellent, for within a day of our arrival two tiger kills were reported at two separate spots in the jungle, both scarcely a mile from the village. We tossed a coin and I remember I got the kill to the west of the village. There a fine full-grown cow had been destroyed and partly eaten in the bed of a nullah or stream. As fortune would have it, a sapling grew nearby, and, remembering what had happened at Lingadhalli when I had sat on a machan twelve feet up, I saw to it that the platform was tied at a crotch in the tree at least eighteen feet above the kill on the bed of the nullah. The sapling grew straight up from the bed of the stream and at a right angle to the bank of the nullah, which itself at this spot was steep and at least a dozen feet higher than the sandy bed.

I took up my position early and was intently, nervously watchful. All tyros do that. Eventually it began to grow dark, and along with dusk came two tigers—or rather, a tiger and a tigress—walking one behind the other. The only trouble was that they were walking along the high bank of the nullah, whereas my present machan was about eighteen feet above that same bed. And so it came about that I found myself only six feet above the tiger and his mate. I had sought to improve conditions, but had inadvertently worsened them. At least at Lingadhalli I had been a dozen feet above the first tiger I had ever seen in a wild state. Now I was looking at two of them, and at half that distance! However, I had made some progress by this time, at least so far as my nervous reactions were concerned. I did not let the gun drop out of the machan , although sheer blue funk restrained me from attempting a shot.

By a strange coincidence almost the same experience befell a friend of mine, at a place very close by, but many years later. And he, too, behaved like me—and he too was a beginner.

Often, in the course of conversation with other hunters, I hear disparaging remarks about the actions of some novice or greenhorn: of how he would not shoot because he could not shoot, or missed badly because he was trembling like an aspen. Then I confide to my hearers my own reactions on two occasions, in sympathy with those unknown tyros and novices. I can assure you that the mere sight of the king of the jungle in his wild state and in all his majesty, at close range and in darkness, is something awe-inspiring. It is a very different spectacle from the docile, half-starved tigers one sees in zoos and circuses.

Some of our trips have resulted in little incidents with an element of comedy in them; others, which might have ended rather more seriously, turned out rather funny.

I have been out with all sorts of people. Some have been morose companions, grumbling and complaining at the least inconvenience. Others have been extremely exacting, such as those who insist on eating only home-prepared and cooked food, drinking only boiled water or soda-water, tea and coffee, or sleeping on camp cots under mosquito nets. A third variety, although rare, are of the other extreme; they are so enthusiastic that they want to be on the move right throughout the twenty-four hours. In rain or sunshine, with little or no food at all, and no rest.

That is why, on all serious shikar trips, I prefer to be on my own. I have accustomed myself to sleeping anywhere, even in the open under a tree, and to eating anything that may be available, from cooked European or Indian food to an aboriginal diet of berries, roots and even half-cooked meat. As for water, I have had to dig holes in sandy riverbeds, wait till water collects in them, and then lie prone and suck it from the hole I have dug, holding a corner of a handkerchief across my mouth to strain out the finer grains of sand and sometimes the green slime in the water itself.

On one occasion a friend of mine, a major, and two other friends, a doctor and his son, had planned a three-week tiger shoot in a very remote corner of the jungles of Shimoga district in Mysore state. There was a tiny forest bungalow far from any motorable road, and a small village nearby. We had taken along a huge store of provisions, but as three weeks is a long time and we were all permanently hungry and eating heartily, together with the fact that feathered game was not too plentiful and we did not want to alarm the tigers in the vicinity with indiscriminate shooting, our food-stock began to run out soon after ten days. Half rations for everyone was the result.

One night, during the period of scarcity, I heard peculiar sounds coming from the part of the bungalow we had been using as a dining-room. I could just detect a faint rattling and scraping noise. I reached for my electric torch, tiptoed to the door leading to the dining-room, and switched on. There was the doctor's son, stealing food. He had buttered a slice of bread, spread condensed milk over it, and finally sprinkled that with sugar.

I then did an unsporting thing. I 'sneaked'. Feigning alarm, I yelled loudly: 'Doctor, Doctor; there is a thief in the dining-room.'

Out came the doctor, to catch his son red-handed. The lecture that was given the lad was so loud and so long that it kept me from falling asleep for another hour.

Food became scarcer than ever at that camp, but we were loath to abandon it as the tigers had just begun to kill the live baits we had been tying out for them, although we had not had the luck so far to shoot one. It was decided that we should go to the villagers and offer to buy any kind of food from them at any price. The son went first, and returned with one egg. The next day the doctor tried his luck. He came back in a very bad temper. The villagers had told him that the previous day they had sold the young sahib seven eggs. The boy had brought back just one. Confronted by his father he confessed he had been very hungry and had eaten the other six eggs, raw, on his way back. The villagers had also told the doctor they had no spare food to sell, for it was scarce and they needed it for themselves.

On the third day, I went. The villagers told me the same thing. They had no chickens to sell and no ragi grain either. Everything was required for their own consumption. When the major's turn came to go begging, he decided to do something novel. He invited the whole village to come to the nearby forest bungalow that afternoon to witness a very grand entertainment including dances, such as they had never seen before, performed entirely by himself. It would be a free show, he told them; but a collection would be taken at the end—of food, in any shape or form.

That afternoon a few ancient yokels trickled in and a few young ones. These spectators proceeded to squat on the floor of the verandah. It was an hour before some thirty persons had collected. When he judged that that was about all the audience he would gather, the major went inside and came back with a towel tied around his waist. Then, humming through compressed lips in a very fair imitation of a bagpipe, he executed the highland fling and some reels. Finally, laying two crossed rifles on the floor, he did the sword dance.

I am not sure how much the audience appreciated the show, but for all his efforts not one of them had brought any foodstuff, and the bag Robbie took around for the collection was as empty after his strenuous efforts as it had been before.

Another little incident of another sort happened at Yemmaydoddi, in the Kadur district. Don and I, with a young friend of his, Sonny, had gone there for a few days to show Sonny a tiger, which he was going to shoot. He awoke at 3 a.m. on the first morning of the trip, and I heard him trying to awaken Don and arouse enough interest in him to go for a torch-shining walk in the jungle. It was bitterly cold, and to make matters worse there was a slight drizzle. Don preferred his warm bed, and in no uncertain terms he told Sonny this. I felt sorry for the boy, so in a fit of self-sacrifice I said I would accompany him.

We set forth, Sonny carrying my .405 rifle, which he had borrowed, while I swung the beam of a five-cell torch from side to side in the hopes of picking up the eyes of a tiger. Quite soon we reached a narrow track which runs parallel to a water-channel coming from a big lake, known as the Maddak Tank, about four miles away, and started to walk towards this lake. Fortunately it had stopped drizzling, but it was colder than ever, and pitch-dark.

About halfway to the lake I caught sight of twin spots of light, coming from somewhere in the jungle on the other side of the intervening water-channel. They were fiery red. What animal was this? The eyes were so very red. I used my torch-beam to make the creature move or turn its head to reveal its identity. The twin red lights never as much as flickered. For a moment I swung the torch-beam off them, so as to allow the animal to see us and move, but the red lights glowed on. That solved the problem. They were not the eyes of an animal at all, but the embers of a fire. Some jungle-folk were camped there.

It is a popular, but entirely false notion, that the eyes of wild animals glow in the dark with their own luminosity. They do not. It is only when a bright light is directed on them that the inner surface of their eyes, through the open pupils, reflect the light and the eyes 'shine' with different colours, green, whitish-green, whitish-red, or reddish-white, according to which animal is there, and according to the angle of the light. But the eyes do not shine of their own accord. Therefore, if there is no torch-light no reflecting 'shine' can come from any animal's eyes. Conversely, if there is a 'shine' when there is no torch-light, it cannot come from the eyes of any animal.

As I have said, the solution was simple. We were confronted by the embers of a fire and not by a wild beast. Sonny was standing beside me when I said, carelessly and casually, 'Fire'. The next moment there was a violent explosion, as he fired my rifle. Luckily he missed hopelessly.

There were wild cries of alarm from the rudely-awakened sleepers. 'Aiyo! Aiyo!' they yelled in consternation.

'What the hell are you doing, you fool?' I shouted at Sonny. 'I told you it was a fire.'

'You did nothing of the sort,' he replied. 'You just said "Fire" and I fired.'

Incidentally, this little incident shows with what apparent contempt jungle-folk regard tigers that are not man-eaters. These men were sleeping out in the open, quite unprotected, in an area well-known to harbour tigers.

This fellow Sonny was a dangerous sort of person to go out with. One of those regular Jonahs, if you know what I mean. Once we were driving through a particular belt of scrub jungle near Tarikere, trying to shoot a wild pig for the 'pot', as meat was running low at our camp at Yemmaydoddi. It had rained heavily that afternoon, and as the area was noted for pigs, we were almost certain of coming across one at any moment. It was about 10 p.m. Sonny was seated on the left-hand mudguard of my car with an old .12 gauge shotgun he had borrowed. A friend named Basil Jones was sitting up on the back with another shotgun. Don was next to me, while I was driving. We did not have a spotlight, as that was against the rules, but it was conceded that if a pig ran across the road in the glare of the headlights it could legitimately be shot at.

Suddenly, a boar dashed across the road a few yards in front of the car, brightly lit by the headlights. But Sonny did not see it. He must have been dreaming. We all yelled, 'Shoot', but the pig by that time had gone. We called Sonny all kinds of names and told him to be ready for the next one.

A mile or so later another pig ran across the road. Sonny saw this one all right but was too slow to fire. Basil Jones stood up in the dickie-seat and fired over our heads. Perhaps because of the lurching of the car he aimed short. There followed a sharp crack and the metal aeroplane that decorated the radiator-cap of the Studebaker disintegrated under a shower of pellets.

Just then Sonny began making frantic gesticulations for me to stop. I thought that perhaps Basil had hit the pig and Sonny had seen it fall. So I braked sharply. Sonny jumped off his seat on the mudguard, ran around the front of the car, and came towards me holding his .12 bore at arm's length.

'Here, take this damned gun,' he said in disgust. 'Something is wrong with it. Before I could press the trigger it went off and smashed your radiator cap to pieces.'

'Let me have a look at it,' I suggested. I took the weapon from him and opened the breach. There were cartridges in both chambers and neither of them had been fired. The explosion of Basil's gun, together with the noise made by the disintegrating radiator-cap, had made Sonny think that it was his weapon that had gone off.

The third incident in which this youngster figured was the funniest of the lot, although it might very easily have ended in a tragedy. This time we were conducting a morning beat for pig in scrub jungle at Bannerghatta, about fifteen miles south of Bangalore. There was an interlude in the beat. Sonny was standing on the bed of a small dry ravine. Another fellow, named Arthur Stanley, was standing at the top of its bank, perhaps ten feet above Sonny and as many feet away. They were talking, and to emphasize some point, Sonny banged the butt of the same .12 bore shotgun, which he had once again borrowed, on the ground. There was a crash as the gun went off, leaping out of Sonny's hand with the force of the recoil, while Arthur Stanley's sun helmet sailed away, its brim shot off at the front by pellets from Sonny's gun.

Arthur promptly fainted with shock. We rallied around and revived him, while we cursed Sonny for a congenital and prodigious idiot. He remained rooted to the bed of the ravine looking at all of us in surprise and wondering what it was all about. Arthur soon recovered from his faint and was still standing at the edge of the ravine, almost at the same spot as when the gun had gone off.

'How could it have happened?' Sonny was asking. 'I had only loaded one cartridge in the right barrel and was gently tapping the butt on the ground when, for no reason at all, the gun just went off.'

And having uttered these words, Sonny began to demonstrate how he had been gently tapping the butt of the gun on the ground when suddenly, unexpectedly, his gun went off a second time. Arthur fell back in another faint as the shot swished past his head.

'I thought you said you had loaded only one cartridge in your gun?' Don asked, in a highly sarcastic tone.

'That's true,' Sonny replied. 'Have a look for yourself.'

With these words he opened the breach of his shotgun. Then his eyes grew wide in amazement. There were two shells in the breach, one in each barrel. And they had both been fired.

We had an amusing experience once in a Model A Ford belonging to Rustam Dudhwala. It happened about thirty miles from Kollegal, in Coimbatore district, in the middle of the afternoon. The nut anchoring the fan worked loose and without warning the fan cut a neat, circular hole in the radiator from which every drop of water soon leaked out. We were in the middle of the jungle and it was evident we would somehow have to get the car back to Kollegal for repairs.

Rustam then had what he called a brain wave. Removing the bonnet completely, he loosened the metal clamps that held the hose-pipe connecting the radiator to the cylinder head. Then he cut one of the spare inner tubes he was carrying right across near the air-inlet nozzle and fitted one of the open ends of the tube on to the metal neck protruding from the cylinder-head, folding the excess rubber around it and fixing the tube to the neck firmly with the metal hose-clamp he had loosened. Down the neck of the hollow tube he poured water from the two-gallon tin he had at the back of the car, tilll the cylinder-heads and half the rubber tube were full. A friend named Willie Wollen was commissioned to sit on the mudguard and hold the free end of the half-filled inner tube in his two hands, while Rustam turned the car around and headed back to Kollegal.

Soon things began to happen. The water grew hot and began to steam. The tube started to swell alarmingly and seemed in momentary danger of bursting. In order to release the pressure and allow some of the steam to escape, Willie loosened his grip at the end of the tube. But he had forgotten that the water-pump was working. Out came not only steam but scalding hot water, all over his hands. With an oath he dropped the whole contraption and away went all the water again. We had a good laugh at his discomfiture, but ceased laughing when he flatly refused to hold the tube any longer. Anyhow, we poured some water down the tube and took turns at holding it while Rustam drove a few miles at a time, stopping occasionally to allow the water to cool. Meanwhile we refilled the two-gallon petrol tin at every stream, tank or well we passed. And so we reached Kollegal at last.

I well remember a certain gentleman I took out with me. He was a bit of a crank. He had read somewhere that condensed milk was rich in food value and provided all necessary vitamins; so he said he would bring no other form of food with him but tins of condensed milk on which he proposed to live for the whole week we remained out. His theories of food value might have been all very well, but he ran into difficulties on the fifth day. Condensed milk itself is constipating. Further, his system was dehydrated by the heat (it was midsummer) and the salt he had lost in perspiration. That evening he suddenly collapsed, saying he was feeling very ill. His temperature shot up and severe stomach cramps set in. But try as he would, he could not relieve himself. The situation became very serious. It was then we thought of using what materials were available. The rubber lead of the foot-pump belonging to the car with the metal connections at each end cut off, and the bulb of the horn filled with lukewarm water and then pressed on to one end of the rubber lead, served as an effective enema. The procedure of refilling the bulb and then emptying it by pressing had to be repeated twice or thrice, but it achieved the required result, thus perhaps saving the man's life. A spoonful of engine oil, grade 40, administered orally, also helped.

I used this treatment once again, years later, at a place named Gerhetti in Salem district, when a rather elderly gentleman named Sells who had come out with me to photograph elephants, suddenly collapsed with sunstroke. We had been out all day in the blazing sun, and when we got back to the forest bungalow at dusk he complained of a very severe headache and giddiness. Soon high fever set in with violent vomiting, and he became unconscious. Treatment with the pump-nozzle of the car, together with hourly cold-water sponge baths, lowered his temperature, and by next morning he was on his feet again.

I had an interesting experience myself when I went out into the jungle several years ago, for a whole week, with my friend Byra the poojaree, an aborigine I had met in the forests of the Salem district in Madras state under rather unusual circumstances.* For the fun of it I had determined to carry no gun nor take any food. I wanted to live on the jungle for these seven days, and on such things as Byra himself could procure from the forest by the primitive means at his disposal. I had stipulated that Byra himself should not bring his much-prized, but unlicensed, matchlock.

The outstanding thing about this excursion was that I seemed to be always ravenously hungry, every hour and day of the whole period.

I am sure Byra found his hands full in having to feed me and himself. As it was, I ate about thrice what he consumed. We swallowed various berries and the yam-like roots of different creepers he dug up; we devoured the combs of wild bees; we ate the small mud-crabs that lived by a pool near the Chinar River; we chewed snails and locusts; we ate the large, long, fat queen-ant from a termite hill that we dug up together. Byra caught two oodumbus (a species of lizard over a yard long, properly called the iguana), which we cooked and devoured; I found it very tasty and very tender.

Yet I was still hungry. With the aid of an ingenious trap, having a noose of plaited horse-hair, Byra caught a jungle-cock. After wringing its neck, he proceeded to make what is known as a 'mud-roast'. I give the procedure, which is really quite simple in case some venturesome boy scout or other person would like to try it out for himself.

There are two ways of preparing a roast without utensils. Of course, whichever way you use it you must first remove the feathers of the bird or the outer skin of the animal which you wish to roast and also its entrails. Thereafter, you can do a 'stick-roast' or a 'mud-roast' as you prefer. A stick-roast is done by driving a long sharpened stick right through the bird or beast. Then two Y-shaped sticks are cut and their ends planted in the ground at such a distance from each other that the ends of the stick which skewers the meat rest on the Y-shaped supports. The stick and its burden can then be rotated. A gentle fire of embers is made beneath, and the skewer-stick slowly rotated by hand to keep the meat from being burnt. No leaves should be used in the fire, as they will only blacken and smoke the flesh.

This method has several drawbacks. Firstly, it requires constant attention. Secondly, the skewer has to be turned all the time. Thirdly, however careful one may be, the finished roast always turns out dry and partly-burnt, while the inner parts are almost raw. The one advantage is that it can be prepared anywhere in the jungle at short notice.

For a 'mud-roast' the bird or animal is similarly prepared. Then a layer of mud, either from the edge of a stream or pond, or made with the aid of earth and water, is plastered all over the carcass till it is a little over an inch thick. The result is a sort of mud ball encasing the flesh completely. A fire of embers is next prepared and the mud ball placed in it. Then the ball is covered with more embers till it is completely hidden from view except at the top, where the mud should be partly visible. The moderate heat is maintained till cracks are seen in the mud. Another ten minutes is allowed after that, then the mud ball is removed from the fire, taking care it does not disintegrate while doing so. Alternatively, the embers around and beneath the mud ball may be removed, leaving just the ball. Allow this to cool a little and then, with the aid of another stick, break off the covering. The resulting roast will be found very tasty and not too dry, and the meat will be cooked right through.

The disadvantage of this method is, of course, the finding or making of mud of a suitable consistency to cover the flesh entirely. If it has too much large-grained sand, the covering will disintegrate with the heat before the flesh inside has been properly roasted, which will then be burnt. If the mud is too watery it will not adhere to the flesh. But if the mud is of the right composition and holds together, the meat is excellently cooked in its own juices. It is a very successful method provided the game is the size of a fowl or a rabbit, but it cannot be employed for larger game, as the covering of mud will not remain intact in such cases.

Companions who come out into the jungle insisting on drinking only boiled water for fear of germs and dysentery, and in sleeping under mosquito nets because of malaria, prove a nuisance. In my very humble opinion they kill themselves over and over again by imagining the presence of microbes of all varieties. Most important of all, they are not 'mobile'. In a jungle, particularly as far as serious shooting is concerned, it is essential to be able to move anywhere and to move fast, and this means eating whatever is available and drinking and sleeping wherever and whenever one can. A party of hunters impeded with a load of canned provisions and utensils for boiling water, plus mosquito nets and camp cots and regular tentage, becomes cumbersome. Coolies or bearers are required to carry all this paraphernalia. That means more mouths to feed.

I remember that I once took a husband, wife and grown son fishing on the banks of the Cauvery river. I had gone with them in their car. When night fell—a beautiful moonlight night—I made my bed on the river's sandy bank. The cool breezes wafting down the river were refreshing and lulled me to sleep. But my clients woke me up, wanting to know if there was any danger from crocodiles and wild animals. Sleepily, I replied in the negative and dozed off again. But I was disturbed in a few minutes by the noise they were making. These people had brought mosquito nets and poles and were planting the latter in the sand. Cross pieces were tied to the framework, then a snow-white curtain was brought out and tied to the poles at the four corners. Eventually the three of them lay down beneath it to sleep.

But instead of sleeping, every little while the older man would sit up, lift up the mosquito net and shine his torch round and round. I turned on my side with my back to them and once again fell asleep. But not for long. For I was startled by a scream from the lady, followed by much bustling. I rolled over to see the family trio tangled up in their own mosquito curtain, which had collapsed, poles and all, on top of them. The lady was shouting, 'Scorpion! Scorpion!', and the wavering light of the torch was directed upon the river sand a few yards away.

Getting to my feet, I inquired, rather impatiently, as to the cause of the commotion. The lady said that in the light of the torch she was sure she had seen a large scorpion crawling across the sand a few feet away. Taking the torch from her husband, I walked to the spot she indicated. There was no scorpion there that I could find, but she affirmed very definitely that there had been one a few moments before. She may have been right, although I doubt it. However, the scorpion, if there had been one, had disappeared. I searched awhile, but finding nothing I suggested we all might try seriously to snatch a few hours sleep.

But no, they would have none of that. The three of them stoutly asserted that they preferred to spend the rest of the night sitting in their car. Then they did an amazing thing. They draped their mosquito net completely over their car, and, getting under the net, opened the doors and got into the vehicle. This way, they said, they would not be bitten by mosquitoes. Fair enough, I thought; now I will be able to get some sleep. But I was quite wrong. From inside the car, through the windows and the net, they kept shining that infernal torch around and around, and on to me. To make matters worse, after a while they started tooting the electric horn.

'What on earth are you doing?' I inquired testily.

'We hear noises in the jungle,' one of them answered. 'There are wild animals about. You are asleep and so cannot hear, but we can.'

With all that commotion, plus the torchlight and the electric horn, I knew no animal would approach within half a mile. But it was not worthwhile to mention the fact. At about 4 a.m. their nerves gave out completely.

'Wake up,' the man called to me, 'and let us get away from this fearful place. It is dangerous for us to remain here.'

Once again I said nothing, but arose docilely and got into the car. Always, when the time comes to leave the jungle and return to civilization, I do so with regret. This time it was different. I was more than fed up and felt relieved when the engine started and we began the return trip to Bangalore.

On another occasion, a very senior officer in a factory where I was once employed asked me if I would take him out to shoot a really large crocodile, as he badly wanted the skin. I agreed, and we left in his car that very night for Hogenaikal, on the Cauvery river, where these reptiles are to be found in reasonable numbers. There were four of us in the party. The officer, his lady friend, my son Donald, and myself.

At about nine the next morning when the sun was becoming really hot we hired a coracle, camouflaged the sides of it with twigs, and started floating gently downstream on the lookout for crocodiles basking on the sandbanks bordering the river. I told the great man that when we saw one, he would have to make a landing ashore, detour into the jungle and stalk the reptile soundlessly till he was close enough to take a neck shot. To approach it directly in the coracle would be to lose it, as crocodiles are very cunning and slide back into the water as soon as danger approaches. Shooting a crocodile in the neck paralyses the spinal column and prevents the reptile from making that last-minute convulsive twist of the body whereby it plunges back into the water, not to be seen again. Either the currents will take the carcase miles downstream or the crocodile will wedge itself between rocks at the bottom of the river and perish there.

But the great man contradicted me sharply. He said that he had read in a book that a heart shot, immediately behind the left foreleg, was the most effective. I tried to point out that there was no doubt that such a heart shot would kill the crocodile, but not before it plunged back into the river and was lost. But he would have none of this.

In due course we spotted a large crocodile sunning itself on a sand bank, and we set our man ashore out of sight and a quarter of a mile upstream. Then I sat in the coracle and watched the scene through my binoculars. For a man of his bulk, he did a marvellous piece of stalking. The bank on which the crocodile was lying rose to some height, and after quite a long time I saw the stalker appear at the top of the bank, lie down and aim carefully. Suddenly the crocodile seemed to rear up on its own tail and then plunge into the water with a great splash. The next second came the sharp report of the rifle.

I ordered the owner of the coracle to paddle quickly to the spot. There my client met me with a wide smile, his face deep red from the heat and his exertions. 'I got him,' he said, 'right behind the left shoulder.'

'I am afraid you haven't,' I answered. 'No doubt you hit him and he will die. But we will never find him.'

'Rot!' he replied brusquely. 'Get some fishermen to throw their nets into the river and we will soon pick him up.'

The coracle was despatched to bring fishermen from the village of Ootaimalai with their nets. These came after an hour and the nets were duly cast. But no dead crocodile was picked up. The river was too deep and the nets did not reach the bottom. Besides, there were the currents to be reckoned with.

'Let us try for another,' I suggested consolingly.

'You don't know me,' said the great man. 'I will never give in till I succeed.'

The nets were cast till evening, but we caught no dead crocodile. At dinner that night I suggested that, as we were due back at work the next day, we should leave at about ten.

'You do not know me,' I was told. 'I will never give in till I succeed. I am not leaving this place till I recover my crocodile.'

Next morning I again suggested we look for another crocodile. My man glared at me disdainfully. The net-casting was begun again, but by lunch-time no carcase had been found. The great man was perspiring copiously and swearing loudly when we sat down for lunch at the table in the forest bungalow. He took off his bush-coat and threw it over a chair, sitting down bare to the waist. Seeing the great personage make himself comfortable, Donald did likewise, removing his shirt before he sat down, also bare to the waist.

Suddenly the great man asked: 'Anderson, how many men work directly under you at the plant?' Wondering at the suddenness of the question, I answered automatically, 'About 110.'

Much to my surprise and dismay, he rejoined acidly: 'It indeed astonishes me how you control them when you cannot control your own son.'

Seeing the bewilderment in my expression, he went on in icy tones: 'You allow your son to sit at lunch-table bare-bodied, with a lady present!'

Before I could answer, Donald cut in. 'What about yourself? Aren't you also bare-bodied? You should set an example instead of doing yourself what you don't want others to do.'

The man's face changed to deep red, then almost purple with anger. 'Damn it man, do you allow this pup to speak to me, your superior officer, in this way?' Then, turning to Don, he added furiously: 'Shut up before I make you.'

That was rather too much for Donald. He was young and very vigorous. 'You old so-and-so,' he answered. 'My dad may be working under you, but I am not. Come outside and I'll feed you to your blasted crocodile.'

I do not know how it was that the great man avoided an attack of apoplexy. Perhaps his friend saved the situation by suggesting we return to Bangalore forthwith, which we did. This man remained my boss for over two years after that, but he never spoke to me again. Don and I still laugh when we think of this incident and wonder how great men can ever be so silly.

Now let me tell you about my friend, Freddie Galiffe, and the wild elephant—half-rogue and certainly a killer—that lived in a corner of his vast estate, and for which Freddie had a soft spot, because the presence of this old monster and his nocturnal ramblings largely discouraged the activities of timber thieves who would now and again raid the more distant parts of his estate for the valuable timber and bamboos that grew there.

Freddie Galiffe owns quite a large estate, somewhere around 600 acres of land about half of which is virgin forest, just within Mysore state and its border with Coorg, which was till very recently a little independent state lying to the west of the larger jurisdiction of Mysore. The ranges of the Western Ghats begin here and the country is wild, rugged and densely wooded. It is inexpressibly beautiful. Large areas are covered entirely with bamboo jungle, and the stems of the bamboos attain really magnificent heights and are extraordinarily stout, sometimes as thick as your thigh.

To the west of Freddie's estate lies a vast area of bamboo jungle called Annay Chowk, meaning 'elephant residence', which is government Reserve Forest and has for long borne an evil reputation for elephants and been the birthplace of many rogues for as long as anyone can remember.

'Freddie's Rogue', as I have called this particular elephant, evidently came from Annay Chowk, but for some unknown reason it migrated to Freddie's estate and lived almost permanently in a corner of his land to the west, where heavy jungle and tender bamboos, the favourite food of elephants, prevail. From the description my friend who has seen this elephant many times has given me, the rogue is a very old animal, for the uppermost ends of his ears turn over. Apparently he is over nine feet in height, which is quite big for an Indian elephant.

Not far from the little shack in which Freddie lives is a natural lake, known in India as a 'tank'. Freddie has taken advantage of this tank to build a 'bund', or ridge, on one side, and through a sluice gate he draws water for cultivating several paddy fields where he grows very good quality rice.

Robbers came one moonlit night to rob his paddy. They arrived in a bullock-cart in which they intended to load and carry away the paddy. And they did just that. They stole his paddy, loaded the cart, and drove it away. But by bad luck they met 'Freddie's Rogue' a mile away. He killed one of the thieves, demolished the cart and, strange as it may seem, did not touch the paddy.

On another occasion timber thieves felled a teak tree growing on Freddie's land, lopped off the branches and carried away the straight trunk. There must have been six or eight of them, for the trunk was heavy. Once again 'Freddie's Rogue' appeared around the corner. He squashed one of them flat. Another he playfully tossed away so that the thief's thigh was broken when he hit the ground. The next morning it was his calls for help that brought Freddie and his men to the spot. There they found the heavy teak log, the crushed thief and his injured comrade.

There was a third robbery. This time one of Freddie's sturdy bulls, which he kept for drawing the plough, was the victim. It had been stabled with others behind Freddie's shack; the thieves untethered him at dead of night and led him away. But not very far. Perhaps they had gone half a mile when, like avenging justice, 'Freddie's Rogue' appeared. He chased one of the thieves who, to save his life, came to Freddie's hut for safety, banging frantically upon his door. He gave himself up after confessing his crime.

One day an adventurous couple, who were friends of Freddie's, came to his estate. They said they had decided to live in the wilds for a year and asked Freddie's permission to build a cabin for themselves in some remote part of his estate. It was a strange request, but having nothing to lose by granting it, Freddie good-naturedly consented. But he warned them about the rogue elephant, but nothing daunted, they set about constructing a shack, Tarzan-fashion, among the boughs of a banyan tree and just about twenty feet off the ground. It was really lucky for them that they chose this height.

During the two months or so that it took to construct their hut of split bamboos and leaves, and a ladder for vines by which they could climb up and down to their strange home, they shared Freddie's humble hut. Then at last came the house-warming occasion. The home-in-the-tree was ready. Freddie climbed up into it and pronounced it excellent. That night the adventurous couple spent their first night in their love nest on the banyan tree.

At some time during the dark hours they were awakened by strange noises from below. They peeped down from their front door to see a huge elephant standing on the ground beneath, his extended trunk waving in the air a few feet below them. Fortunately they made no sound whatever, while the pachyderm was not angry but only mildly curious. Without doubt he scented them but failed to discover exactly where they were. He remained below for over an hour, sniffing with outstretched trunk. Had he thought of raising himself on his hind legs, circus fashion, he could have reached them with the end of his trunk and brought their flimsy home crashing to earth. Providentially he did not do so. There is no doubt that by remaining quiet the couple saved their lives, for eventually the elephant lost interest in the structure and wandered off. With daylight they descended, nor did they spend another night in the little tree-hut they had so painstakingly built.

Freddie professes to have a fondness for 'his rogue', as he calls this elephant, and he consistently refuses to send a report to the authorities about him, or to try to shoot the elephant himself on his own land—which is permissible. Freddie claims the pachyderm is an unpaid watchman. It is significant that the thieves now leave Freddie's lands alone at night. It is also significant that Freddie himself will not venture out after sunset. Indeed, the unpaid watchman is doing a fine job! He keeps both intruders and owner behind fastened doors!

The Creatures of the Jungle

Much has been written about the big game and carnivore of Africa, and a great deal about tigers, panthers and elephants in India. In this wealth of literature the smaller animals tend to be forgotten.

One of them, the Indian wild dog, which goes under the Latin name of cyon dukhuensis, is a most interesting animal, very closely resembling and related to the domestic dog in appearance and habits. In colour it is reddish brown, turning to white on the belly. The hair along the back is dark brown or even black, the tips of the ears often black, with a short bushy tail, having a tuft of black hair at its extremity. Sometimes within and at the end of this black tuft is a smaller tuft of white hair. A male dog weighs over forty pounds and stands almost two feet high. The neck and jaws are massive, the chest deep, but the waist narrow, indicating that the animal is built for speed. It has structural differences from its domestic cousin in its skull and teeth, and it has more mammae. The feet and toes are hairy, and the tracks rather more pointed than those by domesticated dogs.

Wild dogs appear to congregate in packs to a greater extent during the hot weather. Perhaps this has some instinctive connection with the fact that water is scarce in the jungles at that time and the deer upon which they feed are more concentrated in the vicinity of water holes at which they are compelled by circumstances to drink. About October these packs dissolve into pairs; this is the breeding season and the pups are born during the cold weather. They may number about five to a litter, their home being a cave between rocks or a hole in the ground. At weaning the bitch feeds her pups on raw meat that she eats first from a kill, partially digests and then regurgitates for the benefit of her offspring. The young grow rapidly in intelligence and sagacity. From an early age they evince great ferocity at the smell or sight of blood and raw flesh.

Wild dogs have keen senses of sight, hearing and scent, particularly the last-mentioned, which helps them to find their quarry. They attack any living creature in the forest, including adult tigers and panthers, and the calves of bison, but avoid elephants, men, hyaenas and jackals, probably considering the last-mentioned as near cousins. An exception to this general code of behaviour occurred, however, when the six wild-dogs attacked and killed a hyena—Jackie's mother—as I have already related. This proves that there are no hard and fast rules with wild animals. The unexpected often takes place.

I have known of more than one case in the Chittor district of Andhra Pradesh where these dogs have torn a tiger to ribbons after suffering a considerable number of casualties themselves. It is probable that the tiger, accustomed always to be the aggressor and to terrorizing the animals he hunts, is quite at a loss when hunted himself and psychologically defeated even before the dogs drive home their attack in numbers. Panthers and monkeys escape by climbing trees or rocks, but the confused tiger is overwhelmed before he knows what is happening. Wild dogs hunt by day, favouring the hot hours between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. They will also occasionally hunt at other times and on bright moonlit nights. I have never known them to hunt on a dark night. While on the chase they make a peculiarly sharp, high-pitched yelp which might be mistaken for a bird-call. Should they be hunting a large animal, like a sambar, the main body of the pack will gallop behind at a leisurely pace while 'flankers' will run ahead to ambush the quarry. Their method of attack is very cruel, as they fasten on to the hunted animal and literally tear him to bits alive. The eyes, nose, throat, ears, abdomen and testicles are favourite points of attack.

Once, when I was sitting on the bank of a dry stream, a full-grown sambar doe broke cover and ran across pursued by wild dogs; her intestines were dragging in the sand and for about twenty feet behind her. Both her eyes had been bitten out, her face was torn in a ghastly manner, and two dogs had their teeth embedded in her flanks and were being dragged along by the still-galloping sambar. There have been quite a number of instances where deer hunted by these dogs have run into a village to try to save themselves from their relentless foes, preferring the company of men to the ruthless destroyers. Unfortunately the villagers, who are only interested in meat, fail to appreciate this and kill the deer for themselves, driving the dogs away.

I was once resting from the noon-day heat beneath a tree at Mamandur when I heard the peculiar yelp of wild dogs. Hastening towards the yelps, I found a full-grown sambar hind standing up to her chest in a pool of water into which she had galloped to try to save herself. Several dogs were swimming out to her, while two had already reached her. One of them had climbed onto her back and was biting her neck. Four rapid shots from the Winchester disposed of four of them, while the remainder ran back into the jungle. The sambar hind still stood in the water, gazing at me with wide, terror-striken eyes. I waded into the pool and went up to her. Then I touched her, expecting she would gallop away. The poor creature was trembling with fear and did not move. I stroked her neck, but she did not even look at me. Her head and large ears were turned towards the spot where the dogs had disappeared. Finally I started pushing her out of the pool in the opposite direction. Even when she reached the bank she did not run till I gave her two sharp slaps on her rump. That seemed to bring her to her senses and she galloped off. She had been badly bitten and several strips of flesh and skin were hanging from the wounds. The canine teeth of wild dogs are curved backwards to a greater degree than those of their domestic cousins. This not only enables them to retain their grip on a running quarry, but helps them to tear out great chunks of flesh when attacking or feeding.

These animals are great killers. They will not eat carrion or decayed meat, nor touch the kills of other animals. Their practice is to slay for themselves, and slay often, so that they may enjoy the warm, red blood and hot fresh meat. They are by far the most destructive creatures of the jungles. For this reason, rewards are paid all over the peninsula for their destruction, with a higher reward for bitches and puppies. The skin and skull must be produced when claiming the reward.

With all their ferocity, wild dogs exhibit a strange friendliness towards a domesticated cousin should they meet one in the jungle. Several times, when out with my dog Nipper, he has come tearing back to me with one or more wild dogs gambolling playfully at his heels—not always puppies, but fully grown animals too. On such occasions I have not had the heart to shoot them, but have stood still to watch what would happen. They have approached to within a yard of me, wagging their tails and fawning at Nipper, making the whining sound that any dog makes when he wants to be friendly. I have remained motionless and they have continued to run round in circles, just out of reach, ignoring me completely but trying to make friends with Nipper. Unfortunately he would never respond but appeared very afraid. Even when I walked away, with Nipper literally between my legs, they would follow closely, wagging away their tails and whining in a friendly manner.

I have never known or heard of a single instance of men being attacked or bitten by wild dogs, but they are strangely fearless of the human race and will stand and look at man without running away when a tiger or panther or elephant would have bolted. I have fired at wild dogs and shot one or two while the rest of the pack lingered in the vicinity. On other occasions, from behind cover, I have shot a dog and, instead of running away, the pack have approached and sniffed at the dead animal. I have been told that under such conditions they will even eat their dead companion.

Once near Dimbum, in North Coimbatore district, when turning a corner of the road in the Studebaker, I came upon a wild bitch crossing the road followed by three half-grown puppies. Not wanting to shoot the mother or the pups, I stopped the car abruptly, sprang out and gave chase. But I had scarcely passed a few yards into the jungle when the three pups left their mother and came yelping around me, zwagging their tails but keeping just out of reach. It was evident from the expressions on their faces that they were just dying to make friends but could not screw up sufficient courage to come any closer. The mother stood aloof, calmly regarding me and her offspring with dispassionate eyes. I am told they can be easily tamed if caught young and make good pets, but I have not, so far, had the opportunity to prove this for myself.

It is a strange fact that the number of wild dogs in any part of the forest is subject to extreme fluctuation. At times a section of jungle will literally teem with them. At other times, not one is to be seen and no tracks are to be found. Some of the aborigines have told me that they are prone to some strange disease, and that at such times they have come upon the dead bodies of a number of wild dogs rotting in the jungle. No animal will go near a dead wild dog to eat it; not even a hyaena or jackal. Vultures are the only creatures that will clean up such carcases if they find them. Personally, I have never come across the dead body of a wild dog that has not been killed by some other living creature, and my own theory is that nature has provided that these animals should be extremely restless and constantly on the move. If they remained permanently in any one locality soon hardly a creature would be left alive there.

I have never heard of wild dogs or hyaenas contracting rabies, but have known of several instances of jackals getting hydrophobia and biting human beings and other animals. Probably due to their excursions into villages in search of offal they have contracted the complaint from a rabid village dog, after which they have spread it among themselves.

There is a village named Jowlagiri at the edge of the jungle in the Salem district, only about forty-three miles from Bangalore. South-west of Jowlagiri and about three miles away is a silent pool in the forest surrounded by rocky hills with heavy bamboo growing in the intersecting valleys. It is a place where panthers often come to drink. The full moon was due one night when I ate an early dinner and motored to Jowlagiri, taking a few sandwiches and Nipper, my dog, which I had procured under unusual circumstances from the village of Devarabetta, only about nine miles from Jowlagiri.[1] My intention was to sit at this water hole till about midnight on the off-chance of a panther coming along, but more to enjoy the solitude and the moonlight. I reached Jowlagiri by 7 p.m., and the water hole less than an hour later.

But I had been forestalled. Poachers, who had come to shoot an unwary deer that might seek water, were already there. In the bright moonlight I saw two figures wrapped in black blankets scurrying away through the jungle, bent double, one of them carrying a gun. I approached the spot from which they had fled. At the foot of a large tree I found a well constructed 'hide' overlooking the water hole. In their haste to escape the poachers had left an electric torch behind, also a small flask of black powder, a tin box of percussion caps and a cloth bag containing pieces of lead which was the ammunition they used for their flintlock. Considering these articles as the 'spoils of war', I sat down with Nipper in the hide. Just after 10 p.m. Nipper scrambled up alert. Then around the corner came a spotted doe at full gallop, with half-a-dozen wild dogs in pursuit. She ran headlong into the pool to save herself, while the six dogs halted momentarily on the bank.

That was when I opened fire and shot three of them. The remaining dogs began to run away and I was about to fire a fourth round when things began to happen. Something huge crashed down the tree and fell beside me, almost on top of Nipper, who leapt into the air in alarm. It was a human being. For a moment I was so surprised that I failed to grab him. Like lightning he scrambled to his feet and fled.

Then I realized what had happened. There had been a third poacher fast asleep in the tree above me. He had been oblivious to the departure of his two comrades and my arrival. My three rifle shots had so startled him that he had fallen off his perch. But this was not the end of it. Not by any means. The wretched man had run into the jungle instead of towards a village that was hardly a mile away. From somewhere in the jungle I heard him screaming to his village for help, voicing the most extraordinary falsehoods. He said that someone had come to the water hole and had shot him. He said that he had run away, but was in danger of being followed and shot again. He was imploring his friends to come and rescue him.

Soon I heard answering shouts from the village. In the midst of all this pandemonium I knew there was no chance whatever of a panther or any other living creature coming to the water hole. The spotted doe which the dogs had chased had also run away. I came out of hiding with Nipper and looked at the three dogs I had shot. It was impossible for me to carry three carcases and my rifle, so I decided to skin the dogs and take only their pelts.

I had already begun this task when Nipper began to bark frantically, and before I quite knew what was happening a large party of men rushed out from the jungle towards me. In the vanguard I counted five musketeers, all pointing their muzzle-loaders straight at me. There were other men behind them, armed with hatchets, knives and staves. Quickly I realized the only thing to do was to appear nonchalant and put up as brave a front as possible. So I continued to skin the wild dog, as if the group's appearance was of absolutely no concern of mine. They crowded round. Then one of them spoke to me roughly:

'Where is the body of our companion whom you have shot?' he demanded.

'Shot?' I feigned great surprise and indignation. 'Your friend jumped down from the tree and ran away. I never shot him.'

'We heard three shots,' he stated emphatically.

'Are you quite sure?' I asked.

'Absolutely certain,' he replied testily, and then repeated, 'three shots.'

'You are quite correct,' I concluded. 'I fired three shots, and here are three dead wild dogs. How could I have shot your friend?'

The logic of this argument sank into them slowly. 'But he called out to us that he had been shot and you were going to kill him.'

'I know,' I answered. 'I heard him too. Your friend is a fool, a coward and a liar. He is hiding somewhere in the jungle. Call out to him now and he will probably answer you.'

All together they began calling and whistling. Soon he answered them. The party of men who had been so belligerent a moment before now looked at each other sheepishly. I knew they were defeated and that I had them in my hands. I determined to press home my advantage by staging a counterattack.

I had left my Winchester in the hide and was unarmed. Slowly I got to my feet and addressed their leader: 'You have dared to accuse a sahib of murdering your idiotic friend,' I thundered. 'Remember, I am a licence-holder in this forest and am entitled to shoot here, while he is a poacher, caught red-handed.'

Then, before they could interrupt, I continued: 'I will now make you a sporting offer, because I am a sportsman myself. Either you will soundly beat this man for telling lies, or I will beat him. In addition he will have to carry these three dead dogs to my car at Jowlagiri. If you agree to my terms, I promise you on my word that I shall forget the matter and say nothing to anyone. If you do not agree, I shall not only report him, but your whole village for threatening me with weapons, and shall have your firearms confiscated.'

There was silence while they looked at one another. Then each man told the other to speak. Finally the leader began hesitantly: 'I shall beat the fool myself,' he said, 'and will make him carry the three dogs for you. But will you promise not to report us?'

'I have already promised,' I replied. Then, indicating the hiding place beneath the tree: 'Someone's torch is there, and powder-flask, tin of caps and bag of pellets. Take them, and bring me my rifle.'

A man scampered off to carry out this command. Just then the man who had been the cause of all the uproar walked boldly out of the jungle and jauntily approached us. The poor fellow did not know what was in store for him. As he came within reach, the leader struck him full in the face. He fell to the ground, when another man kicked him viciously. His surprise soon gave way to yells of terror and pleas for mercy. The leader hauled him to his feet by seizing his hair.

'Show me where you have been wounded?' he hissed.

The man timorously answered, 'I heard three shots and I thought I had been hit.'

Eventually they stopped beating him and he was a sorry wreck. Then they loaded the three dead dogs on his back and invited me to sling my rifle around his neck as well. But the weight would have been too great. I knew the three dogs weighed perhaps forty pounds each, and I did not want the man to fall and damage my rifle. So I replied that I always made a practice of carrying my own rifle.

I parted the best of friends that night or rather early morning, as it was past midnight by the time it was all over, with the group of men who had come with the probable intention of murdering me. Then I turned towards Jowlagiri and the car, with Nipper at my heels and the unfortunate poacher, staggering beneath the weight of the three dogs, ahead, just in case he should suddenly drop them and run away.

Another animal about which little has been written is the Indian wild pig, better known as the wild boar. In former times there were stories of how the hardy Nimrods engaged in 'pigsticking'—that is, hunting boar on horseback with spears. A few of these blood-thirsty old hunters varied the sport by maintaining packs of dogs, some of them mongrels, but mostly of bull terrier stock, which they employed to hunt down not only wild boar, but bears as well and, in one instance, even bison. When the hunted animal was engaged by the dogs, the hunter would arrive on the scene and dispose of it, either by shooting or spearing it from horseback.

As a dog lover, I think this so-called sport was decidedly brutal, particularly when employed against wild boar. The most courageous dog has little chance against a fully roused boar, and many members of a pack were torn to ribbons by the tusks of the infuriated pig. And even when the gallant boar was eventually killed, either by shooting or spearing, he was scarcely given a fair chance to show his mettle, engaged as he was in staving off the attacks of a host of dogs.

The wild boar is the most courageous animal in the Indian jungle with the exception, perhaps, of the ratel, a much smaller quadruped, half-mongoose and half-bear. The quality that I admire about him is that when he turns to fight he will fight to the death. There is no running away thereafter, for him. He will either emerge as victor or sacrifice his life. This does not imply that the boar is an aggressive animal, ranging the forest looking for a fight and something to kill. Left to himself he is quite inoffensive. I have many times met wild boar face to face at close quarters and unexpectedly, but never have they assumed the offensive, as a sloth bear would invariably do. They have either stood still or made off to avoid an encounter. But when pursued, pushed amd harried, or when wounded and followed up, they will turn about to fight. That means a charge. Even when a wounded panther attacks, it is not an attack unto death; it is a hit-and-run affair. But the boar will charge repeatedly until it has disposed of its antagonist.

On several occasions I have come across the results of a fight between a tiger and a wild boar. Generally the pig is killed, but it is only after giving an excellent account of himself and seriously gashing his opponent. The copious blood-trail left by the departing tiger has proved this. In a few cases the result has been different: the tiger has been killed or has given up the fight and run away after being severely punished by the boar. Once in Targathy I came upon the remains of a dead boar and a dead tigress, about twenty yards apart. The boar had evidently died first for he was facing the scene of combat; then the tigress had attempted to crawl away, but death had overtaken her. The boar had been bitten through the throat and had died; the tigress's belly had been ripped open and her intestines had fallen through the gap, while the artery in her neck had been slashed by an upward thrust of the boar's sharp curved tusks.

A large wild boar can weigh up to 300 pounds and more, while his curved tusks grow to eight inches in length. He has intelligence and muscle, and the heart of a fanatical warrior. Left to themselves, wild pigs are companionable animals, moving in sounders. They have great love for their young, whom they will defend gallantly. Pigs have fondness for water and are always to be found in its vicinity. Their diet is very varied, ranging from roots, insects, offal and cultivated crops, to lizards, snakes and the kills made by a tiger or panther, as well as cattle that have died in the fields from disease. They are also fond of wild fruit, particularly the acid, jungle-growing mango and figs, and they devour these in large quantities when they fall from the trees. The sow makes a proper nest for herself of sticks or grass or fallen bamboo branches, under which she burrows before giving birth.

The large boars often fight among themselves for the coveted position of leader of the sounder, using their tusks freely and fiercely and inflicting terrific damage upon each other. In the cold weather, and during the rains, they huddle together for warmth, often sleeping on top of one another like a pyramid. I was once motoring from Lingadhalli up the Kemangondi Ghat road. It was pouring with rain. Suddenly the headlights revealed an obstacle before me: what appeared to be a mass of boulders piled one upon the other in the middle of the road, I found was a sounder of wild pigs, huddled together in a pile for warmth from the cold and rain.

Before charging a boar gives two or three loud, sharp grunts. Then his little tail sticks up behind him and along he comes. When cornered, wild boar have been known to charge a solid line of beaters, a feat which even the most ferocious tiger, including a man-eater, seldom attempts. Instances have been known of a wounded boar, when being followed up, making a detour and attacking his pursuers from the rear. I did not believe these rumours till I experienced the very thing myself when I fired at a large boar one morning near Panapatti, on the banks or the Chinar river, but he got away, although I knew I had hit him. Reaching the spot at which I had shot him, I found blood and began to follow his trail. It led across the sandy bed to the bank of the river, and then down a nullah between two low hillocks. I was following his tracks in this nullah, and could clearly see them leading ahead, when I heard the two familiar grunts from close behind me. I turned around just in time to see the boar charging at me down the bank of the nullah a few yards away and from the rear. I was able to shoot him just in time. Had he not given himself away by his grunts, I would not be writing this today. It was clear that he knew he was being followed, so he left the bed of the nullah, climbed up the bank and retraced his steps to attack me from behind. All this shows a high degree of intelligence. After I had shot him I verified this by following his blood-trail along the detour he had made.

On another occasion, with my cousin, Stewart Hearsey, and a friend named Willie Thomas, I was beating for pig at Yercaud on the Shevaroy Hills. A huge boar passed me. I fired, but missed. Then Stewart fired, but also missed. Lastly, Willie Thomas fired; he did not miss, but only wounded the boar. At once the pig turned and charged. Willie, who fired his second barrel, failed to stop him. The next instant Willie was on the ground and had been gashed from chin to temple by a slashing thrust from the pig's tusk as he galloped past. Had Stewart and I not been there to put an end to the gallant old boar, he would surely have returned and then Willie's days on this planet would certainly have ended. Willie Thomas, who has shot many panthers and much big game, considers this encounter his closest to death. He still bears the scar to this day.

The sloth bear is a creature that has always interested me greatly. Perhaps this is so because he is quite common and I have often come across him, both in his wild state in the forests and in civilized areas in the keeping of itinerant 'bear-men', who lead trained specimens along and make them wrestle or dance before an audience. The keynote of a bear's nature is absolute unpredictability! You can never know for certain what it may decide to do next. This is the chief cause of the many maulings suffered by people who move about in jungles where bears are numerous. Bears are heavy sleepers, sometimes slumbering in long grass or in holes they have dug. When they sleep they sleep soundly, often snoring in the process. A passing man almost literally stumbles over a bear before it wakes up with a start and finds an enemy so close. Then things invariably happen—to the man.

Bears have very poor sight and poor hearing as well. Their sense of smell seems to be restricted to locating food in the form of grubs, insects, termites, roots and fruit, and they do not seem able to scent the proximity of human beings. When startled, they seek a way of escape. But their reflexes are equally poor and they perhaps feel that their only hope of escape is to down the intruder first. They attack with teeth and claws, always making for the face or chest. I have seen some horribly mutilated faces of people suddenly attacked in this way without provocation. Often one or both eyes have been torn out.

When camping at Mamandur, word was brought to me at night that two men, while carrying honey from the jungle that afternoon, had been attacked by a tiger when crossing a nullah and one of them had been killed. I took out a rescue party with lanterns, accompanied by the man who had escaped and who insisted that it was a tiger he had seen, to lead us to the place where the tragedy had occurred. We found the corpse, but one look at the face that had been torn to shreds convinced us that the killer was not a tiger. A careful scrutiny of the sandy ground of the nullah showed that a sloth bear with her young had been sleeping by the bank. Not only had the sudden advent of the man startled the mother, but the presence of her cub, whom she instinctively defended from imagined or anticipated assault, had caused her to slay without provocation. When confronted with the evidence, the man who led me to the spot confessed that he had never waited to see the animal. Hearing a growl, followed by his friend's scream of terror and pain, he had started running and had not stopped till he reached the village of Mamandur.

On another occasion I was camping in the Chamala Valley with my son, who was only about fourteen at the time. The valley abounds in sambar and spotted deer; stags of both varieties with good heads are common. For some time Donald had been worrying me to let him shoot a stag. My deer-shooting days had long passed and I had reached a stage when I had ceased killing these beautiful and inoffensive creatures, so I tried hard to infect Donald with my ideas. But being a youngster he was all the more persistent and continued to pester me, so I eventually gave in.

In those days Donald did not possess his own rifle. He borrowed mine and set off before dawn next morning on his blood-thirsty quest. I followed him, but some paces behind, to give him the opportunity of getting the shot he wanted. The Chamala valley has some beautiful stretches of park-like country, which I particularly like. We arrived at one of these spots just as the grey of dawn was breaking over a large hill to the east, known as Monkey Hill. Donald was about 100 yards ahead of me, moving from tree-trunk to tree-trunk in the hope of seeing a stag.

Suddenly I saw him halt abruptly and from the ground, seemingly at his very feet, reared a shaggy black shape which I immediately recognized as a sloth bear. It stood on its hind legs, apparently about to attack him, when mercifully it changed its mind and just as suddenly dashed away with a loud 'Woof! Woof!' Being a mere boy at that time, Donald was as surprised as the bear. To this day he considers it the narrowest shave he has had.

Bears move about at night. Sometimes they may be met in the evening or at dawn — as Donald met the bear that early morning! But once I met one at about two in the afternoon, at the hottest time of the day. The meeting took place in the Chamala Valley. I had gone there with my wife on this occasion, taking my old friend and shikari, Ranga, from the Salem district, along with me. We had been for an afternoon stroll to a water hole, known as Gundalpenta, and were returning to our camp near a Forestry department's well at a place named Pulibonu. There were three of us—my wife, Ranga and myself —and Ranga was wearing a black coat, black shorts, and was bare-legged. I was in front, with my wife behind me; Ranga was bringing up the rear.

The path we were following turned a corner. There, some yards away, was a termite hill, and standing up against it and intently looking down one of the holes in the hill was a black figure. For the moment my wife forgot that Ranga was behind her, and thinking my retainer was examining the termite-hill she called out in Tamil: 'What are you looking at Ranga?'

The black figure turned around, and of course it was not Ranga. It was a sloth bear. Surprised at seeing the three of us, he continued to stare at us foolishly, like a short-sighted human.

Then Ranga—the real Ranga this time—called out: 'Karadi! (Bear!). Hai! Shoo!' Off went Bruin for dear life, muttering an indignant, if startled, 'Woof! Woof!'

Bears are very fond of sucking termites out of their hills. They apply their snouts to holes in the termite hill, or sometimes dig these holes themselves, then blow air into the earth, and finally start sucking for all they are worth. The medley of sound emitted is both curious and amusing. It resembles the buzzing of bees or hornets, and at times the groaning drone of a bagpipe as it deflates. They have a curious habit, too, of sucking their forepaws, which they do assiduously with a persistent humming sound. Some experienced hunters have suggested that it is to soothe their paws when hurt or sore from the effect of constant digging, but I do not think this is so, because our tame bear, Bruno, about which I have written elsewhere in this book, often sucks his paws, though they are by no means sore or hurt from digging. I am convinced there is some sort of secretion from between the toes— whether it be sticky, sweet or salty I do not know— which makes this habit attractive to all sloth bears.

They are very intelligent animals. They have an uncanny intuition that leads them to the different varieties of fruit-trees in the forest when those particular fruits are in season. The boram berry is an example. Especially in the Chamala valley, bears appear in large numbers just after these fruit have become over-ripe and begin to fall to the ground. The same can be said for the wild-mangoes, which are stringy, acid and unpalatable to the human taste, though they are a delicacy to bears; for 'jak-fruit', that do not grow in jungles as a rule but are planted in the cultivated areas bordering the forest; for sugar-cane, that is set in large squares on agricultural ground; and particularly for the jamun or jumlum, grape-like purple berries that fall in thousands from the parent tree in July and August each year, to carpet the ground with a purplish-black, slightly astringent fruit.

Jumlum trees grow densely along the banks of the Chinar river in Salem district, and bears turn out in large numbers during those months to gormandize the fallen fruit. In my earlier years I shot a few, but soon found this a tame and unsporting pastime. I would visit the trees in the afternoon with my assistants, Ranga and Byra, and one or two more men if available, and gather the fallen jumlums into an immense heap at the foot of one of the parent trees. The more fruit we could gather and the bigger the heap, the better for my plan.

I would come prepared with a very powerful catapult made of rubber cut from an old inner tube from a bus or lorry, and a pocketful of smooth pebbles, gathered from the riverbed. Climbing into the tree before sunset and on moonlight night, with my rifle in case of eventualities, I would await the coming of the sloth bears. Around eight o'clock they would turn up, one by one; large, black, grumbling, rumbling and lumbering creatures. What a spread they found awaiting them! I am sure they must have thought they were in Paradise! Soon the mound of jumlums would have four, five or more bears tucking into it.

And now came the time for some fun. I slipped my hand into my pocket, felt for a suitable pebble, fitted it into the leather sling of the catapult and took careful aim at the biggest of the bears beneath me—perhaps only twelve to fifteen feet away. I stretched the rubber to its utmost and then let fly. The pebble hit the big, black bear hard on the back of his neck, then all hell was let loose!

'Damn this fellow at my side,' he apparently thought, as he bit viciously his innocent neighbour.

'You want to fight, do you?' the neighbour questioned as he bit his next neighbour in turn. And so it went on, till there was a mass of fighting bears below me, screaming their heads off, while I sat as quiet as a mouse in my tree. Somehow they sorted themselves out with yells of protest, squeals of pain, and many grunts of indignation. There was much snuffling and shuffling and huffing, but after some time they forgot the silly incident and settled down once again to gorge upon the fruit spread before them.

Then the catapult spoke for the second time, and the yelling, screaming, biting and tearing black mass of bears went for one another once more, this time for longer. But finally they settled down to eat and tried to overlook each other's nastiness. Then the catapult let fly a third time! That really was a fight! Eventually some of the bears broke away and began to wander off. The place seemed to them unhealthy.

But suddenly one of the bears looked up and saw me. So this was the nigger in the woodpile! Pandemonium reigned as he screamed with fear and indignation. His hysteria spread to the other bears and they all screamed and yelled in unison. Only once did one of the bears think of doing something about me. He rushed to the foot of the tree and began to climb up the trunk. I thought I would have to shoot him with my rifle, which I had brought with me as a precaution. But I made a final attempt to drive him away. Using the catapult once more, I hit him squarely in the face. Protesting loudly to the whole jungle, he fell to the ground with a thud. Then he scrambled hastily to his feet and, still complaining vociferously, bounded away.

This habit of biting one another when one of them has been hurt is common behaviour with bears. Should two be together and one be wounded by a gun or rifle shot, he or she will invariably attack the other savagely. Sloth bears can climb trees easily when they want to. They go up after beehives, which they knock down to the ground and then devour. They have also been known to drink toddy from the pots fixed on date palms to collect the fluid. This intoxicates them to some extent, as do the thick petals of the mhowa flower when it falls to earth. Although they can ascend trees without much trouble they find difficulty in descending. Sometimes they try to slide down backwards. At other times they just let go and thud to earth. Apparently they never seem to hurt themselves in that way.

Although they are irritable and get easily excited, sloth bears are most affectionate towards their young and each other. When alone and wounded, one will scream aloud in complaint and tell the jungle all about it. His companions will add to the screaming out of sympathy. They have known to try to succour one another and I have heard of the case of a male bear trying to remove the dead body of his mate that had been shot. Female bears carry their young—there are generally two cubs born at a time—on their backs till they are quite big, and will defend them at the cost of their own lives. All bears, including the males, have a patch or tuft of very long hair on their backs, just behind the shoulder blades. Presumably this is to provide a better 'grip' for the cubs when mother is travelling fast.

It is a mistake to think that the sloth bear is purely vegetarian, confining his diet to roots and yams, together with insects. This is very definitely not so. More than once, when sitting over tiger and panther kills, Bruin has turned up and started to devour the carcass, even when it was getting fairly high. Bruno, our tame bear, is very fond of all kinds of flesh, especially pork, venison and the flesh of wild ducks.

The claws, particularly on the forepaws of a sloth bear, are white, very long (almost four inches) and very powerful. The tracks made by his hind feet closely resemble a human footmark without the toes. The body of the animal, after it has been skinned, looks very much like a human body, and very well muscled.

Bears must feel the heat to some extent, clothed as they are in long and thick black hair. They are fond of water and often dig holes in the sand of dry riverbeds in an attempt to reach the little that will percolate through. They are noisy creatures and make a variety of sounds. When moving in pairs, but at a distance from each other, they maintain contact by a constant medley of very curious sharp, gurgling cries. Should one of them locate a nest of insects under a log of wood or a stone, he or she will immediately call the other bear by a series of squeals and happy squeaks.

A very curious creature of the Indian jungle is the five-toed pangolin, which goes under the somewhat formidable Latin name of Manis pentadactyla. Averaging about three and a half feet in length, of which about half is his tail, he is encased in an armour of thick, overlapping, sharp-edged scales, and rolls himself into a ball when touched. The pangolin is very rarely seen and most people, even experienced hunters, do not know of his existence. This is because he is entirely nocturnal, to the extent that he rarely emerges from his hole in the ground before 1a.m., and not on every night, moreover, but only occasionally. His actual den is at the end of a tunnel and about ten feet below the surface. It is useless to try to dig one out, for the deeper you dig the deeper the pangolin goes. You will never be able to catch up with him, for nature has provided him with claws particularly suited to burrowing.

The best way to see or catch a specimen is to look for his tracks in the mud of a water hole, where they form a peculiar parallel row of sharp indentations or holes as he approaches the edge to drink. Having found the water hole you will have to sit up night after night, and all night, during the period of moonlight, until you catch a glimpse of him rolling from side to side over the mud till he reaches the edge of the water. This peculiarly rolling gait is due to the fact that the pangolin walks upon the knuckles of his feet, the claws of his forefeet being turned inwards, while the soles of his hind legs are turned outwards and upwards. The rows of parallel indentations that betray his passing are formed by the backs of the inwardly-folded claws.

When he is clear of the shrubbery and is in the middle of the mud, it is comparatively easy to rush upon him; he will then curl himself into a ball at once. Although inoffensive otherwise, a pangolin can cut your hand badly with the edges of his razorsharp scales by a quick jerk of his body or tail. Should you allow the pangolin to regain the cover of the jungle, he might escape you, for he has a habit of 'lying doggo' in a clump of thick grass or a bush till you have passed, when he will crawl out in the opposite direction and move away at a pace equal to a fast walk.

When caught, a pangolin generally makes a hissing noise, as does the oodumbu or iguana. In moving, the scale rustle faintly against one another like the quills of a porcupine. When hurrying away he will keep the tail off the ground so that it will not become an impediment. As might be expected of an entirely nocturnal animal, and one that lives deep underground, he cannot see very well in bright sunlight. I have noticed the same thing with a hyaena. Pangolins are said to be powerful swimmers, although I have never seen one in water. But I have observed that, when burrowing beneath boulders, they have been strong enough to move the stone away despite its weight.

An animal for which I have a special affection is the hyaena, perhaps for no better reason than that most sportsmen appear to regard him with contempt, unworthy even of a photograph or bullet. This prejudice is so great that many hunters of my own acquaintance seem to have closed their minds—and their eyes—to his very existence, and declare that hyaenas are rare in the forests of South India. I really do not know how they can be so wrong, as I know of scarcely a jungle where hyaena tracks are not to be found in the sandy bed of a river, or traversing ravines and nullahs.

Only one special species of hyaena is to be found in India — the striped hyaena, Hyaena striata. A fully-grown specimen is almost as tall as a Great Dane, with a head considerably larger and broader. It is ash-grey in colour with black stripes, and has a black patch over the throat. It has large, long, pointed ears, a broad forehead, an immensely powerful jaw, broad chest and tremendously thick and strong forelegs, ending in large hairy paws. The back tapers considerably to a miserably weak haunch and hindquarters, and inadequate, puny-looking hind legs. Its spoor is therefore very distinct from that of a panther, although the pugs are about as big, because the hyaena's forepaws are about twice the size of its hind paws and are round, whereas the latter are elongated. The impressions of a hyaena's toe-nails, which are not retractable, are clearly visible in the tracks, whereas the pug-marks of a panther are quite different. The panther's front and hind paws are of about the same diameter, while the ball of the foot is much larger than a hyaena's, and the claws are retractable and therefore do not show.

I am convinced that the hyaena is an extremely unintelligent animal. He has very poor sight (particularly in the daytime), poor hearing, and (here I differ from other writers) a sense of smell which is only mediocre. I have carried out many tests with Jackie by throwing a piece of strong-smelling meat only a few yards away, when he has been unable to locate it. There is no doubt he could faintly smell the meat, for he ran aimlessly about in circles in his unsuccessful efforts to find it.

A habit I have noticed in Jackie when taking him for a walk is that every few minutes he will shuffle around in a circle, and almost always in an anticlockwise direction. But perhaps the most peculiar of his many unusual idiosyncrasies is that, every now and again, when he passes a bare stump of a tree, or a pillar or post, or a bush, he will literally dance around it, anticlockwise, with his forelegs stiff and hind legs doubled beneath him, hindquarters just off the ground. Then he will stop and for a few seconds his whole anus will protrude, as if about to pass a motion. But he emits gas instead and then straightens up and continues his way. The purpose may be to enable the wild hyaena to find his way back again by sniffing at such spots, although the theory is weakened considerably by the fact that his sense of smell is so poor.

But if his sense of smell is really so poor, how does a hyaena in the wild state locate dead and putrefying animals in the jungle? Perhaps the smell has to be brought to him on the wind before he can locate a kill. I am fully aware I am here entering upon highly debatable ground, because hyaenas all over the world are credited with great ability to scent death and decay at a great distance, but the experiments I have made with Jackie have led to a quite different conclusion.

There is no doubt that a hyaena is very much attached to his own den, which may be a hole in the ground or between rocks or boulders, or a small cave, and that he inhabits the same place for years. I know of a pair living near Gundalam, on the Secret River, that have lived in the same small cave for over five years and have brought up several families there. Unlike all other animals, the same pair remain together for a long time. To some extent I have proved a hyaena's liking for a particular home by the fact that I had Jackie at my little cottage at Whitefield for several months, where I had given him a spare bathroom to live in. Though I left the outer door open night and day to enable him to go outside to answer the calls of nature (he never once attempted to run away), he did considerable damage to that small bathroom by breaking down the brick wall at all four corners to burrow holes, and by biting at both the inner and outer doors. So I removed him eventually to my house at Bangalore, after having an island dug for him in the compound, surrounded on all four sides by a trench four feet wide by four feet deep. On the island I had a large brick house built for him, with a roof of zinc sheets. Steps led down from the island to the trench, to enable him to go down and race around if he wanted to. But as soon as I put Jackie in his new home he went completely off his food for almost a fortnight, although he drank water.

Now it cannot be argued that it was me he missed, for I went with him to Bangalore. I maintained the same feeding-times, at midday and sunset, and gave him the same food, beef that was several days old and crawling with maggots. I even thought he might be missing the companionship of his playmate, Jill, my mongrel at Whitefield, so I brought Jill to Bangalore. Jackie was immensely pleased to see her, wagged his tail affectionately, and started to romp with her in his usual hearty and rough manner. But for all that, he would not eat his food. As might be expected, he lost weight and began to look miserable and thin, so that I was on the verge of giving in and taking him back to Whitefield. However, it occurred to me to cut his meat up into small pieces and to try feeding him a piece at a time. It was fifteen days before he consented to nibble even a little bit, just as it was becoming evident he would soon die of starvation. Then, little by little he began to eat again, although it was another fortnight before he returned to his normal hearty appetite. There is no doubt in my mind that this month of self-imposed starvation came about only because I shifted him from his little bathroom in my cottage at Whitefield, to which he had become attached since a puppy. He missed his den.

During my efforts to overcome his total refusal of food, I let him loose within the bungalow. With my back turned for a minute, the first thing he did was to chew up Donald's alarm clock, greatly to my son's indignation. Jackie tried to make friends with my wife's pet, Ella the jackal, and wanted to play with her; but, although about one-sixth his size, she began to bite him savagely, though he did not bite back. I have already mentioned that both Gypsy and Jill, my dogs at Whitefield, although they used to play with him freely, at times would lose their tempers when he was too rough and would bite him. Never at any time did he attempt to retaliate upon animals that were far smaller than himself and infinitely weaker.

I have mentioned that the trench surrounding Jackie's island was only four feet wide and four feet deep. I had noticed while he was with me in Whitefield that because of his short and weak hind legs he was not able to jump more than two feet either up or across. But I think there is a good reason for this strange disproportion of the hyaena's build. I often watched Jackie while he was eating. He would hold a bone firmly between his powerful forelegs, doubled his hind legs beneath him, and then use the slope or slant of his disproportionate body as a lever to enable him to tear great chunks of flesh from the bone. He could not have acquired the necessary purchase or leverage with the straight back of a dog.

Should you approach the den, particularly when there are pups inside, the hyaena will generally become frightened and utter a deep-throated growl of a peculiarly vibratory, humming nature, continued for a long time. If much terrified, for example by the appearance of a tiger at a kill where he has been robbing, he will voice a loud, snarling yap, something like the short growl made by an angry tiger or lion, but not so loud. If you are watching while he does this, you will notice that he literally trembles with fear. Often he will pass urine involuntarily. Should the intruder be less dangerous than a tiger, say a panther or bear, the hyaena may howl (perhaps 'yowl' is a better word to describe the sound) in a dismal, mournful manner. Should you be sitting-up over a kill or a water hole and should the hyaena discover your presence, he will either run off at once, when you may hear him pitter-pattering away over the dried leaves, or he may become tremendously agitated, when he will produce a medley of noises that can only be described as 'chattering'. Most often, he begins with a hiss of disdain, a sort of derisive, spitting sound: 'Cheey! Shee-ay!' quite frequently uttering, before or after, a series of surprised and vehement exclamations: 'Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha!' Then, as he warms to his indignant protest, come other peculiar noises: 'Garrar! Gurr-rr-aa! Guddar! Guddar! Guddar! Goo-doo! Goo-doo!'

Weird sounds indeed! But there is nothing whatever to be afraid of. The poor hyaena is just a bunch of nerves and is hoping you will end the same way. He is merely trying to drive you away with his clownish noises. He tries so hard to frighten you that he succeeds only in frightening himself. He will certainly not attack you, in spite of the pandemonium he creates.

This brings us to an often-debated question. Can a hyaena drive a tiger or a panther off its legitimate kill? Or, should he be caught in the act of robbing a kill, will the hyaena run away when the tiger appears, or will he attempt to frighten the real killer away? In my experience, there is only one answer: the hyaena will not wait a moment, he will just vanish.

But a pair of hyaena will make a cacophony of sound. It is a war of nerves. Sometimes a panther cannot tolerate the strange medley of noise and slinks away voluntarily. But should the panther be determined to hold his ground, a shouting match ensues until the nerves of one or other gives way. If the panther becomes threatening, the hyaena or hyaenas hesitate no longer; they bolt. For after all they are nothing but large, clumsy, unintelligent dogs, and in a straight encounter a panther would be able to dispose of them with ease. They are far too slow in their movements and too stupid to be able to withstand a determined attack, especially as a panther is an animal that can move like lightning. Even if two or three hyaenas were there they would lack the intelligence to coordinate their actions and fight together.

With a tiger, even half a dozen hyaenas would not stand the ghost of a chance. Although far larger, heavier and stronger than the wild dogs, they lack the latters' keen intelligence, swiftness of movement and almost suicidal courage. Yet it is strange that wild dogs do not as a rule molest them. It is a common sight to observe jackals and hyaenas feeding on the same kill. At such times they ignore each other's presence completely, while keeping a sharp lookout for the sudden return of the rightful owner of the kill, who would undoubtedly take immediate reprisals.

Despite their ungainly build, hyaenas can in emergency put up a fair turn of running speed. To an observer they appear to assume a galloping gait, much like a horse, and run askew. Perhaps this is because the hyaena holds his head at an angle when travelling fast, so giving his whole body a crooked appearance.

Hyaenas are the scavengers of the jungle, doing useful work by devouring kills and dead animals that would otherwise decompose slowly and pollute the atmosphere. Particularly in dense forest, where vultures cannot operate, because the heavy vegetation prevents them from 'spotting' the kill, hyaenas, jackals, wild pigs, and sometimes a bear, all help to clear away a decomposing carcass rapidly.

Hyaenas eat only dead animals. Occasionally they may kill a fawn, a calf, dog or goat—always an animal far weaker than themselves. A hyaena's way of killing some small, defenceless animal is to sidle up to it, suddenly dip his head at an angle and grab the smaller creature by the throat. There is no denying the tremendous strength of those jaws or the grip that can crack a bone or bite through it with the greatest of ease. But the hyaena lacks the courage to attack any living creature unless it be far smaller than himself and quite defenceless.

A hyaena has a long mane of greyish-black hair from the back of the neck to the root of the bushy tail. When alarmed or excited or angry, this mane stands erect, increasing the height of the animal by about six inches and giving it a peculiarly flattish appearance. Despite a fierce and hideous face, the eyes have a peculiarly soulful expression. Although such a vile feeder, the hyaena's whole coat is extremely clean and free of any odour. In this respect they differ from vultures, which really stink. I have also found Jackie singularly free from ticks, fleas or other vermin, or at least he carries far fewer than the felines and deer. A full-grown male weighs over six stones and the bitch about a stone less. She gives birth to four or five puppies at a time and as usual with the young of carnivorous animals, no sooner are the eyes opened than they supplement their diet of mother's milk with partially digested raw meat, eaten by their mothers and then vomited out for their benefit. Although nocturnal in their wild state, I have come upon hyaenas basking in the morning sunlight at the entrances to their dens or caves. Occasionally, and especially in the foothills or the Nilgiris around Segur and Anaikutty, I have found them in broad daylight, lying up in thick grass or under a thorny bush beneath which they have made a burrow.

The first story in the book concerned an active partnership between a jackal and tiger. It may well be asked whether this is a common occurrence, for the question has been hotly debated for years by very experienced Indian hunters. My own opinion is—and it is only opinion and therfore not necessarily correct—that a jackal, being a highly intelligent creature, first attaches himself to a tiger or a panther as a parasite, knowing fully well that he is thereby sure of finding food, because the tiger or panther must kill to eat, and eat to live. By their very nature and by their habit of leaving the kill during daylight, the big cats also leave sufficient pickings for the parasite. During all this time the jackal takes very good care to keep its distance, and the tiger or panther may not even be aware of its existence in the earlier stages. As time goes on, the jackal—always the more intelligent of the two animals—finds that the habit of following its host about from kill to kill continues to pay very high dividends. It may therefore happen quite naturally that the jackal adopts the practice of voicing a call should it come to discover a prospective victim, thus relaying the information to its host. The tiger or panther, although not actually relying upon the jackal to find its food, has by this time become accustomed to its presence and, being primarily a hunter after large prey to keep itself alive and provide a hearty meal, does not worry unduly about a creature which would not provide of itself nearly enough for a square meal. When the jackal begins to call, the carnivore knows something is afoot and is made aware of the presence of a victim.

It is commonly thought that tigers and panthers have a keen sense of smell, but this is definitely not so. Neither animal eats at the spot where the kill is made. Invariably it drags its victim to a shelter of some sort, such as a bush or nullah. When coming to eat a second time, the killer does follow the drag-mark by sniffing along the ground. It seems to remember exactly where it has left its kill, as it may return from any direction quite irrespective of which way the wind is blowing, and does not necessarily retrace its own footsteps. Further, I have often sat on the ground for both animals, in 'hides' of one description or another, and by remaining absolutely still, I have, regardless of the direction of the wind, had them approach to practically within touching distance without becoming aware of my presence. Even a half-developed sense of smell under such conditions would have warned them of my proximity, but they have remained completely ignorant while I kept quite still and made no sound. This in itself clearly shows that neither animal has any sense of smell whatever, although they possess the keenest sight, detecting the slightest movement, and the acutest hearing, picking up the faintest sound. The marvellous night-sight of both tigers and panthers enables them to conduct a soundless stalk through the densest jungle on the darkest of nights, an attribute that in itself makes them formidable enough without additional gifts.

The uninitiated townsman might be tempted to think that the bold colours of a tiger and the even more vivid coat of a panther would make them both extremely conspicuous in a jungle. But they are not. The tiger, which hunts invariably at night or in the evening, becomes invisible when he 'freezes' or crouches motionless, his skin blending with the background of bushes, grass, trees and earth. The panther is even less conspicuous, even in broad daylight; he can lie so flat to the ground, under a bush no longer than himself, or on a background of dried leaves and grass, that again, unless he moves, he is quite invisible. This blending of colours is one of the main hazards in following up a wounded animal of either species; the hunter is liable almost to tread on it before he becomes aware of the creature's presence.

I have often been asked if it is really possible for a man to call like a tiger with sufficient realism to bring a tiger near. Have human lungs the capacity to utter such a tremendous sound? The answer to the last question is a very definite 'no'. Human lungs can never equal those of a tiger. But that means only that a man cannot call loud enough to attract the attention of a tiger some distance away. If the tiger is near, a well-imitated call can certainly bring him nearer. The factor that really attracts the tiger is curiosity. So long as one is experienced enough and skilled enough to imitate a tiger's call closely, even if the timbre differs somewhat, he will be drawn by a curiosity to find the 'tiger who is making that funny noise'.

The same can be said of a panther or many other wild animals. After all, in America various gadgets are sold that imitate the cries of moose, deer, wild-buck and various birds. I have a cousin who, with the aid of a blade of grass, can call exactly like a junglefowl or a spurfowl, and regularly lures these birds before shooting them. The only difference in imitating a tiger's call is that no instrument is used; but the principle is the same.

Tracking is a fascinating art, and, compared with some of the aborigines with whom it has been my privilege and pleasure to go out, I would regard myself as an absolute tyro at the game. An observant person who has seen many tiger and panther tracks may be led to ask: 'Why is it that a tiger sometimes leaves a double track, one that shows the pug-marks of all four feet, while at other times he leaves a single track as if he had only two legs like a man? And why does a panther, particularly the average-sized animals living close to villages, invariably make a double track only?

I think the answer is that the tiger, out for a casual stroll and not on the hunt, just ambles along serenely and leaves a double track. As soon as he becomes aware of the presence of a quarry and begins stalking, he exercises caution: he slows his pace and probably 'feels' the ground with each forefoot before placing it, thus making certain that he does not tread on a twig or leaf that might crackle and betray his presence. As an added precaution, he brings up his hind foot and places it in exactly the spot that his forefoot vacates as he takes the next step forward. Of course, he follows this practice instinctively and not by deliberation.

As to the panther, who 'creeps' the last stages of his stalk, with his belly close to the ground, he perhaps has no opportunity of placing his hind feet in the spots vacated by his forefeet. A fact that appears to bear out this conjecture— and let me emphasize once again that it is, after all, nothing more than conjecture—is that, whereas one can trail a tiger to the very spot from which he launches his final attack, it is seldom possible to do this when following a panther's spoor. The last few feet of the trail become indistinct, indicating the panther had begun to creep.

Another question I am asked is whether a tiger can really imitate a sambar's call, and if he does, whether it is in order to ambush a sambar. The answer to the first part of this question is very definitely yes. I have heard it happen. But to answer the second part of the question is difficult, for I have heard a tiger call like a sambar when approaching its kill, a young bull, in a stretch of jungle near Tagarthy where there were no sambar at all. On another occasion, in the Chamala Valley, a tiger called like a sambar when approaching his own kill, a dead buffalo, and when only a few feet away from it; in that stretch of forest there were many sambar.[2] But this tiger was not hunting; he was returning to his own kill. Both these examples appear to indicate that the 'pook' made by the tigers, although closely resembling the call of a sambar, more like that of a doe than a stag, were not made with the object of decoying a real sambar. The call may therefore express anticipation, contentment, hunger or enjoyment. Perhaps it is a call inviting a tigress to the feast, or it may be a kind of mating call, although I do not think so myself, as in neither of the cases mentioned was a tigress near.

The tiger—and I am now referring to the ordinary male and not to a man-eater—is generally an inoffensive beast and will do his best to avoid man. Even should a human being intrude upon his privacy, the tiger will slink off. So will a tigress for that matter, although she is more apt to growl or show some degree of resentment. There is an exception to this general rule, however, and that is at the time of mating and especially in the act of mating. Tigers are very fierce then and are apt to attack on sight, and will persist in their attack till they kill the man who has intruded upon their privacy. It may be a desire to 'show off to the tigress, although I think it is due rather to the high degree of sexual excitement into which they lash themselves. Anyway, one can hardly blame the tiger for resenting being spied upon at that particular moment.

I had rather a narrow escape when accompanying a friend, a German photographer who wanted to wander into a tiger sanctuary at night and take flashlight photographs. I tried to dissuade him on the ground that tigers are far from being photogenic, but he was adamant. It was early in October when we went, somewhat ahead of the regular mating season, which extends from the end of November till the end of January, and we were both on foot and unarmed, except for the flash-light camera, since in a sanctuary shooting is strictly prohibited and one cannot wander with a firearm of any description.

But as luck would have it, we suddenly came upon a pair of tigers. Fortunately they were not actually mating, but they resented our intrusion nevertheless. They growled, and side by side left the little clearing where we had surprised them and advanced on to the track along which we had just come.

The impulse was very strong to show these tigers what we could do by way of a sprint. But had we given in to that temptation, I am sure the pair of lovers would have been equally tempted to pursue us. So we 'retreated according to plan', which means a pretty fast walk while flashing the torch constantly behind us. Nevertheless the resentful pair followed us for well over a mile. At one particularly nasty spot, where the track traversed a deep and overgrown ravine, they galloped up to about twenty-five yards behind us. We coughed loudly and began to talk at a pitch that would have done credit to any public orator. This caused the enterprising tigers to fall back once more, and so we made our way out of a situation that was certainly for a moment a matter of touch and go.

The tigress usually goes into isolation before the cubs are born, because her mate has an inclination to kill and eat his offspring. She generally chooses a cave, although occasionally she may litter in a ravine or other overgrown spot. On an average, three to four cubs are born. These are fed on milk, and later on vomited meat, till they can digest stronger food. As they grow older they accompany the mother on her foraging expeditions. Then, after a while, papa rejoins them and the parents start teaching them the art of killing by breaking the neck of their victims. In this process much wasteful slaughter sometimes takes place; as many as four or five cattle from one herd are slain merely to give the juniors a lesson or afford them some practice. The young tigers frequently make a mess of the job, succeeding only in mauling their victims rather than killing them outright.

When the cubs are half-grown, one sometimes meets a family party of tigers, consisting of the male, female and several large cubs. I myself stumbled across a family of four one night at a place called Kodihalli near Tagarthy, when I was out for a night walk. They had just drunk at a stream and ascended the bank. First mama appeared. She saw me, growled, leapt across the track and began a peculiar vigorous mewing. This brought out the two cubs, who were about the size of spaniels. Seeing the torchlight, they were not in the least alarmed, but advanced a few feet playfully. At this unseemly behaviour, mama protested loudly by growling. Papa, who was in the rear, thought this behaviour intolerable. He sprang on to the path in front of them to block their progress and roared menacingly. That roar had the desired effect of not only frightening the cubs back to mama, but myself almost to the point of shooting him. I was glad I did not do so when I realized his intentions were merely to admonish his playful offspring rather than to attack me.

Tigers have certain habits peculiar to themselves, in which they differ from panthers. Some of them—not all—make a practice of standing on their hind feet against the trunks of certain soft-barked trees, reaching as high as they can, and cleaning the claws of their forefeet by raking them through the soft bark. Their method of passing their dung is also different. In this respect a panther is a true cat; he will scratch up the earth beside a jungle pathway and afterwards carefully cover his excrement up. But not a tiger; he will scrape a patch of ground bare, about a foot square, sometimes right in the centre of the path. While doing this he appears to 'dance' in a crouched position with his hind feet together, trembling visibly. When passing their dung they hold their tails up ludicrously high. The dung is a sticky, black, tarry substance, and is left uncovered.

Another difference on which I have had occasion to remark is their way of feeding. Tigers start on their kills at the rectum, often biting off the tail of the animal to facilitate proceedings. Then they make an entrance and, inserting a paw into the carcass, scoop out the intestines and stomach, which they generally remove a few feet before eating. Panthers on the contrary are dirty feeders, and get the stomach and dung of their kill mixed up with the meat. But a large 'thendu', or forest panther, eats in the manner of a tiger and not like his smaller brethren.

Tigers are intolerant of the heat, which is not the case with panthers. They delight in lying up in cool and shady places, and may be seen submerged in a rill with only their heads above the surface. They are also fond of swimming and frequently cross rivers. The panther, which is a truer cat in every sense of the word, detests water even to the extent of curtailing his hunting expeditions on a rainy night. The only circumstance that will force him to swim a river might be a pack of wild dogs hot on his trail, or a forest fire. Under compelling conditions he can swim quite well.

Another difference in habit between the two animals is revealed during the series of meals each makes on any large animal he has killed. In between each gorge a tiger apparently must drink a good deal of water. Knowing this, it is fairly easy to locate the presence of the killer at the nearest water hole or stream to the kill and organize a 'beat' accordingly, provided the hunter is the type of man who prefers beating to sitting up in a machan and awaiting the tiger's return. But this is not so with a panther. He does not require nearly so much water, so he is difficult to locate.

Tigers often get into fights with bison, wild boar, bears and even members of their own kind. They are fond of eating porcupines, but they do not always emerge unscathed from such an encounter. A few miles from Tagarthy I found a dead tigress with a number of porcupine quills in her face. Tigers will also kill panthers, and for this reason jungles where tigers are plentiful hold few panthers, who give way to their larger and more powerful cousins. Panthers are also not nearly so belligerent or courageous, and instances are known where even a village cur that has been attacked has turned on the panther in sheer desperation and the attacker has decamped.

Tigers are inordinately fond of pork, while panthers appear to consider monkey-meat a delicacy. Both felines will go to extraordinary lengths to procure these respective titbits and show great reluctance to abandon a favourite kill. Indeed, the tiger becomes really belligerent if one attempts to drive him off a succulent wild-pig, and a panther will demonstrate violently over the carcass of a langur monkey. After killing their prey, at least as far as my experience goes, I have not found a tiger suck the blood from the animal while retaining his grip on its throat. Perhaps this is because they kill quicker, the neck of the victim being quickly broken, while a longer and more painful death by suffocation is the lot of the panther's prey. A panther often sucks the blood of its victim.

Tigers are far more fastidious in their food than panthers, and it is therefore a great mistake to tie up a very old, emaciated or diseased bull or buffalo as bait for a tiger. Once, while at Anaikutty, the only bait I could procure was a bull suffering from the last stages of foot-and-mouth disease and at death's door. Pug-marks, the next morning, revealed that the tiger had come, walked around the bait, sat down in front of it, and from various scratches in the ground I could deduce that he even set about playing with it. But he never killed or even hurt the sick bull, which succumbed to the disease the next day.

Tigers will sometimes drag or carry their kills, even a very heavy animal, up and over considerable obstacles. I have used the word 'carry', for that is exactly what I mean. One rainy afternoon a tiger killed a large brown bull in the middle of a cultivated field hardly two furlongs fron Tagarthy village. He carried this animal, slung across his back with one hoof trailing along the wet ground, for nearly half a mile down hill into a jungle ravine. Another tiger dragged a large ploughing-bull to a fence, and leapt over it with the dead animal. Panthers sometimes drag their kills, such as a deer or goat, into a tree, probably to protect them against other predatory animals.

Tigers sometimes have a funny way of resting on a hot day. They will lie on their backs on the cool sand of a nullah under the shade of a tree, and fall asleep with all four legs up in the air. They are also fond of taking sand-baths and of rolling on dry leaves. Perhaps they do this to scratch their backs and rid themselves of ticks. These pests are always to be found in large numbers on a tiger after it has been recently killed.

Tigers are great hunters and cover many miles a night in search of food. Moreover, they have a habit of following a specified 'beat' of territory which may extend up to a hundred miles, always repeating the same route in the same direction. This habit, as I have remarked in my earlier stories, is of considerable help in plotting the probable time of return of a man-eater to a particular locality, and the estimate is always correct to within a week or two.

It has been proved that the tiger is a comparatively recent immigrant into India, which before his arival was largely inhabited by the Asiatic lion. Then the tiger came down from the north—from Siberia and Manchuria—and the lion slowly began to lose ground before that more active animal. The tiger has slightly diminished in size and become rather richer in colouring, assuming a russet brown with black markings in place of a greyish colouration, but still with the black markings of the original immigrants. But he has not yet been able to conquer his intolerance of the heat, which forces him to drink water frequently and to lie up in cool places, often submerging himself in a pool.

As far as evidence can show, the panther, like the sloth bear is a true inhabitant of the country and has been in India from the earliest traceable times. Panthers are widely distributed throughout the world. Not only are they found in South America as thickset jaguars, but in Africa, the Middle East, Asia Minor, Persia, throughout India and Ceylon, Burma, Malaya, Indonesia, Indo-China, China and also Manchuria. With such a wide distribution it is to be expected that the animal will vary considerably in size, shape and habits, according to the territory. But fundamentally they all belong to the same species. Since I am concerned only with India, and in particular with South India, I can only confine my remarks to the local variety.

The panthers of India vary considerably in size and colour. Large specimens of the 'thendu' or jungle panther attain up to seven feet six inches in length and weigh upwards of 160 pounds. They have a rich, tawny coat with large rosettes and long fur, particularly below the belly, and large squarish heads. Such panthers can kill fairly big animals; for example, a well-developed domestic bull, a sambar hind, or even a pony of moderate size. Their manner of killing is the same as the tigers', in that they usually break their victims' necks rather than strangle them to death. And they begin to eat from the hindquarters, in the same way as a tiger does. Invariably these large specimens inhabit fairly forested areas.

At the other extreme we have the village or 'monkey panther', an adult animal, rarely over five feet long and weighing around sixty pounds. They are generally of a palish yellow colour, with small rosettes, short hair and small, roundish heads. Their diet is very comprehensive, and includes a variety of small creatures such as dogs, cats, goats, fowl (both domestic and wild), rabbits, birds, lizards, and even frogs and crabs. They are found in the vicinity of villages, among rocks, and in sparse scrub though the small panther may sometimes occur in deep jungle, just as a thendu may sometimes live in scrub or on a hillock near a village.

Because of this sharp contrast, it was long contended that there were two distinct animals. That theory has now disappeared: there is only one animal, its appearance and diet varying according to its surroundings.

Black panthers occur on rare occasions. They are scarcely jet black, but rather an extreme dark brown when viewed at close range. Even at a distance, when they appear quite black, the rosette markings are still visible when light falls on them at an angle. Black panthers are not a distinct species. They are examples of melanism, and occur generally in the jungles where the rainfall is heavy and the vegetation dense. Occasionally they occur in other forests, too. A normal mother may have a litter of two or three cubs, one of which may be black. It is curious that its melanism should recur only among panthers and not tigers, but cases have been recorded of tigers that are almost white, and of sloth bears that are almost brown or even grey.

A noticeable characteristic of panthers is the way their tails vary in length. The small panthers seem to have longer tails, and the larger panthers to have shorter ones. Panthers can tolerate great heat and do not require much water. In fact, they actively dislike water. I have often observed, when looking at pug-marks, that a panther will make a considerable detour to avoid crossing even a few inches of water or mud, unless of course he has to wade a stream. Tigers have no compunction about wading or swimming and often welcome an opportunity.

In my opinion, a panther is by far the more intelligent animal. There is a definite purpose about his actions. For instance, around about 5 p.m., before the sun begins to set and the air to cool, a panther will lie prone on a rock on a hill-top, scanning the country below for prey, such as goats, sheep, dogs, etc., as they return to their villages. Seeing a likely victim, he will stealthily drop downhill by the shortest route, stalk his prey, and kill it within a matter of minutes. Of course, tigers are great hunters too; but their hunting seems to me a matter of instinct combined with wonderful skill, rather than of forethought.

A pantheress with cubs will defend them desperately. Tigresses, surprisingly as it may seem, will sometimes desert their offspring, although I had a very uncomfortable experience once to the contrary.[3] Panthers are particularly fond of catching and eating monkeys, piglings and porcupines, although they will give an adult wild boar a very wide berth. As regards porcupines, however, at Gummalapur in the Salem district I came upon a burrow which, by the tracks in the soft sand at its entrance, was occupied by both a porcupine and a panther. This burrow was on the banks of a stream known as the Muthiyalamma Holay. I made it my job to sit in a tree immediately overlooking this spot the same evening, because I wanted to satisfy myself as to the truth. The poojarees had frequently told me that porcupines and panthers lived together, but I never quite believed these tales as I knew these creatures to be instinctive enemies. It was a comparatively lonely spot, and just before 6 p.m. out came the pantheress, an adult of average size. Later dusk fell, but it was quite dark before I heard a rattling sound, made by the quills of the porcupine, and shone the beam of my torch in time to see a large specimen emerging from the same hole, between rocks on the riverbank. Do not ask me for an explanation of this strange fellowship, for I cannot give one.

Panthers are much more versatile than tigers. They can live in fairly open country with little scrub, so long as there is shelter among rocks and boulders. They move about much more in daylight than do their larger cousins. They are also great climbers. I remember that at Muttur many year ago I shot one that had climbed to the top of a giant muthee tree, in which it had cornered a terrified young monkey. Panthers are also less afraid of a light, particularly if it happens to come from a lantern or other oil-lamp.

Following up a wounded panther is often more dangerous than following up a tiger, for two reasons. His colour blends with the jungle and makes him invisible until almost trodden upon, and he rarely gives a preliminary warning growl, as does a tiger. Fortunately, to offset this the panther frequently lacks the courage to charge home. He attacks vigorously, but swerves off at the last minute. Even when he pounces on a man, it is just to scratch and bite violently for a few seconds. Then he bolts. He does not stop to kill the man, as does a tiger.

There is one great difference between a man-eating tiger and a panther that has formed the same habit. Once a tiger acquires a taste for human flesh he will become a permanent addict; he will go on killing people till he is killed. A man-eating panther will never take to eating human flesh alone, nor will he depend on it; he will continue to kill and eat his normal food as well. Sometimes he will cease man-killing altogether for long periods and behave like a normal panther.

But sooner or later he will recommence his depredations against the human race. This makes him all the more dangerous and difficult to find and shoot. Even when he has shot a panther in the belief that it is the man-eater he has been after, the hunter can never be certain he has not killed just an ordinary panther, and that the culprit is still not at large. The only test is time—and the fact that no more human beings are killed in that particular area.

Panthers, living as they do, much more in contact with the human race, are far more audacious than tigers. I remember many years ago having dinner with my uncle, aunt and cousins at their home at Yercaud, on the Shevaroy Hills, while the seven cats they owned were eating from as many plates on the verandah of the bungalow. We heard an unearthly yowl from one of the cats and rushed out to see a panther leap off the verandah with one of them in its mouth. Thereupon we made a great hubbub and released the dogs. Somehow the cat escaped, but minus one hind leg. Martha, for that was the cat's name recovered from her wound and lived on three legs for many years. There are many instances of pet dogs being carried off literally from between one's feet when out walking in a jungle. And more than once I have sat in the midst of a poultry farm for a sneaking 'monkey' panther that had developed the habit of having chicken for supper several times a week.

Panthers are generally shot from machans when over their kills and rarely in a beat. They are too clever and too cunning to be driven, and can hide too well. This is another example of their superior intelligence. One exception to this general rule, however, is their habit of returning to a kill even after being fired at and missed. Tigers rarely do this. I have heard of another case where a panther returned to its kill where a lighted lantern had been placed a few yards away, though I was not present to witness it.

I think it is rather unfortunate on the whole that this animal is classed as 'vermin' by the government and the Forest Departments in the various states of India where, in some places, no licence is required to hunt him. Although the species is still very numerous throughout the country, I feel it deserves a better fate. The spectacle of a well-marked panther stalking through jungle dappled with sunlight and shade is even more beautiful than that of a tiger. It is the most handsome wild animal in India. The call of a panther—a guttural, sawing, rasping grunt—is heard when the male calls to his partner, and sometimes when he approaches his kill. It is a distinctive sound and remarkably loud and far-carrying for an animal of such moderate size. In the jungle, panthers exact a heavy toll of the small species of deer—spotted deer, jungle-sheep and mouse-deer—which form their staple food, together with wild sows and piglets. The larger boars they leave severely alone. In village areas the diet is changed to include domestic goats and dogs; in some villages the dog population has been completely wiped out by an enterprising panther or two. At the Jowlagiri forest bungalow I walked out on to the verandah one night and almost stumbled over a panther that was lying there eyeing Nipper, my dog, who was asleep under the dining table. Apart from the animals listed above, panthers will kill smaller creatures and birds of all descriptions. In turn they are frequently killed and eaten by tigers, so that in a locality where the latter exist permanently, panthers are exceptionally shy and cunning and are sometimes not to be found at all. They will be tempted to rob from a tiger's kill, but while doing so are very much on the alert against the sudden return of the rightful owner. Finally, they will eat carrion and feast on carcasses in a very advanced stage of decay. I have found that tigers do not do this in southern India, nor as a rule will they return more than once to do so, for they are tremendous feeders and by that time, if undisturbed, have eaten all there is. But panthers return to their kills two and even three nights in succession.

These reminiscences would not be complete without something about that magnificent giant among wild animals, the elephant, which has been with mankind, in some form or other, from prehistoric times. There are only two distinct species of elephant in existence today, the African and the Asiatic although there are variations to each of these two main divisions. The African elephant is the larger animal, often attaining a height of twelve feet at the shoulder. In appearance he differs considerably from his Asiatic cousin. He has enormous ears for one thing, and very long and heavy tusks. His back is concave, with a distinct saddle, and he has only three toes on each hind foot. His forehead recedes sharply, and this, with his long ears, gives his head a rather pointed appearance. Even the females have tusks. But the Asiatic elephant differs in a number of ways. The largest of them reaches to no more than ten feet in height. The ears are much smaller, and the tusks are shorter and not nearly so heavy, nor so thick. In some cases the back is convex, with a slight hump, and in others relatively level. There are four toes on each hind foot. The trunk is not so ringed nor so rugged as in the African species, with a slight depression at the top between the right and left halves of the skull; there are noticeable hollows at each temple. The females never grow tusks.

As with the African variety, the Asiatic elephant also has its pigmy variety in some countries, such as Ceylon and Malaya, where both males and females are without tusks. Tuskless males, called muknas, are sometimes found among the herds of the larger variety in India, although not very common in South India. The fact that such tuskless bulls are not necessarily alone, but live with tusked males in a normal herd, is evidence enough to counter the theory that they are a variety on their own, although there is no explanation why their tusks have never grown. Such tuskless males seem to develop into more bulky animals than do most males with normal tusks.

The idea that a 'rogue' elephant is mad is quite wrong. It is also often thought that a rogue elephant is always an elephant in a state of musth. Actually these terms refer to three quite different conditions affecting a male elephant. The condition of musth is only temporary, lasting from a few weeks to three months, and corresponds to rut among stags. It is directly connected with a state of sexual excitement, and passes away after the condition has subsided. This period of musth mainly attacks male elephants, during which time they are restless, quarrelsome, excitable and quick-tempered. They fight with the other bulls in the herd, who sometimes combine to expel them till the fit subsides. But this is not always so, as musth elephants occasionally exist in a herd on amicable terms with the others and particularly the very young calves.

An elephant in musth is invariably a very dangerous creature to meet. He is liable to attack without provocation and on sight. Being a natural and periodic condition in all elephants, tame males also become musth, and when that happens they are not put to work but are kept securely chained by their hind legs till the attack passes off, when they return to normality. The condition is a glandular one. The temples become swollen and puffed. The overflow discharges through orifices in both cheeks, situated between the temple and ear, and runs down the elephant's face as dark oily matter. There is also a seminal discharge. An animal in musth emits a peculiar odour because of these secretions. Many accidents have occurred and people have been killed by tame elephants when in a state of musth. Generally the mahout, or elephant-driver is the first victim.

A rogue elephant has little the matter with him. He has become a rogue because he has lost his fear of human beings and has formed the habit of pursuing and killing them without provocation. The reasons are many. To begin with, when in a state of musth he may have attacked people, chased them and perhaps killed a couple. This has caused him to lose his inherent fear of the human race and to realise how very helpless they really are. So he continues his habit even after the musth condition has long passed off. Or he may have had a fight with another elephant or elephants and been expelled from the herd. In a paroxysm of impotent fury, he may have come across some unfortunate human being, who fled at his approach, causing him to give chase and finally kill him. Thereafter he has found this an amusing pastime. Thirdly, he may have been so wounded or harried by humans that one day he turned the tables by attacking and killing one of his molesters. Realizing from that moment that humans can be killed easily, he lost no chance in putting an end to one at every opportunity.

The 'rogue' condition in an elephant is akin to that of a tiger or panther becoming a man-eater, except that I do not know of any rogue elephant that has eaten any part of his human victim. My friend Freddie Galiffe, however, tells me that a small rogue elephant shot recently just outside the limits of the Annay Chowk Reserved Forest, and not far from his estate, had a human thigh-bone in its stomach. I have not been able to verify this for myself, but such a find, if authentic would be unique in the annals of rogue-elephant history.

A mad elephant is one that has become mentally deranged. The animal may have contracted hydrophobia through the bite of a mad dog (in which case we cannot really say that it became mentally deranged in the accepted sense of the term), or it may have fallen victim to heatstroke or overwork (in which case it is still not really mentally deranged). Personally I have never come across an instance of this sort, although I have read of such cases occurring in the stables of Indian potentates who kept elephants, and in the government kraals housing elephants that work in the forests.

Elephants have poor sight, but a very good sense of hearing and a truly marvellous sense of smell. For this reason, any attempt to approach a wild elephant for purposes of observation, photography or shooting, can only be made from a direction that is upwind. Otherwise a long stalk will end with the discovery that the quarry has long since decamped. It is said that wild elephant can smell each other three miles away, and a human being one mile away, if he is downwind.

Twice the circumference of the forefoot of an elephant gives its exact height at the shoulder, a fact that is always used in estimating the height of rogue elephant that have been proscribed for shooting and in identifying those shot with measurements that have been recorded previously from the tracks of the rogue. When an elephant collapses after being shot, the most certain indication that he is really dead is the protrusion of the penis to its fullest extent outside the sheath.

These animals live for well over a hundred years, and there is a case on record where an animal has reached 150 years of age. Indications of old age in an animal are generally its lanky and underfed condition (the teeth have been so worn that they cannot masticate the food, and the droppings therefore consist of undigested leaves), hollow cheeks and sunken eyes and temples, ears that are considerably turned-over at the top edges and ragged at the bottom, and a condition of hairlessness with a sallow, very-crinkled hide.

Authorities on the subject state that for the first fifteen years or so the top edges of the ears are perfectly erect. Then they begin to turn over at the rate of an inch for every thirty years of life, but I have no personal knowledge of the correctness of this assertion.

Those who have constant dealings with elephants consider them very intelligent animals, although a few hunters are inclined to disagree. Judging from their habits in the wild state, and the number of purposes to which their services can be put when tamed, they are decidedly clever and sagacious. But they have one undeniabe feature: their lack of courage, amounting to arrant cowardice, for creatures so huge. A mature wild boar, when aroused, has many times the courage. An elephant may attack a man by surprise, relying on his mighty bulk and blood-chilling, frenzied trumpeting to strike terror into the victim. But let a man stand his ground, clap, shout and wave his hands, and the elephant will invariably swerve off and bolt at the last moment. Not so the wild boar. He charges home, right to the smoking muzzle of a rifle, with several bullets in his body—unless, of course, one has already succeeded in piercing his brave heart or some other vital spot.

Many elephants suffer from a form of leucoderma: the skin becomes speckled by white patches, especially on the trunk and ears. To posses such an animal is considered very lucky, although they have an unsightly appearance. Perhaps the superstition is only a reflection of the fact that the so-called 'white' elephant are considered very important for religious purposes among Buddhists in Siam as well as in Burma.

The female elephant breeds about once in every two and a half years, while the period of gestation averages twenty months. She is fond of her calf, which makes her dangerous if encountered suddenly when her offspring is in the vicinity. I had cause to know this only too well when I took out a party of Americans working with me in Bangalore to photograph a herd of these animals. Unfortunately, the beaters who were to drive the herd along the bed of the Secret River, not far from Anchetty, in a direction that would make them pass the concealed cameramen, fell foul of a female with a calf. She promptly charged them and they broke back towards the place where the rest of us were comfortably seated, bringing the infuriated female behind them. I can assure you we all ran very, very fast that day, leaving a considerable portion of our clothing and ourselves on the thorny shrub through which we dashed. Luckily the calf could not keep up with the pace set by us and by its mother. It began to squeal at being left in the lurch and this caused the female to abandon the chase and return to her youngster. Otherwise there would have been a nasty accident, for none of us was armed, since the shooting of any elephant except a declared rogue is very strictly forbidden.

When on the march, females and their calves head the herd, tuskers bringing up the rear. It is the mothers that regulate the halting places according to the availability of grazing and water in relation to the ages of the calves. When a calf is born the whole herd delays its march for a week till the baby is strong enough to keep pace with them. Bull elephants make but little attempt to defend their young when danger threatens. On the other hand, they frequently head the line of flight. While fording a river, the mother holds her offspring before her on the surface by supporting it under the belly with her trunk. They can swim with ease for long distances. When encountering obstacles or going uphill, she frequently pushes her baby in front of her. Calves drink milk from their mothers for many months, until they are comparatively big. They do this by sucking with their mouths and not through their trunks; the mother's breasts are located immediately behind her forelegs.

Herds are constantly on the move as the grazing becomes exhausted. They drink water twice daily, just before sunset and at dawn, but enjoy water-baths as well as sand-baths at other times during the day, especially in the hot weather, if opportunities occur. They are very affectionate towards each other and solicitous of the welfare of their young at all times, and a herd behaves like one big happy family. The members are often relatives, due to constant inbreeding. I have never watched them mating, because I have never had the chance; but Poojarees have assured me that the male endeavours to cross the female only after persuading her into a depression, or on to lower ground, to facilitate his performing the act, which he does in an almost erect posture behind the female.

When digesting their food they make a variety of sounds, including a low, rumbling, thunder-like noise; a bellow resembling that made by a domestic bull, but infinitely louder, when they are contented; pig-like squeals when they are particularly happy; a short, sharp trumpeting when alarmed or attacking; and sharp rapping sound as a warning to an intruder and to alert each other. This last is made by striking the trunk against the ground while blowing air through it sharply.

Elephants even suck their fingers—represented by the tips of their trunks—when in doubt. It is amusing to watch a bewildered elephant stand with the tip of its trunk in its own mouth while wondering what to do next, for all the world like some timid little boy sucking his thumb.

Unlike deer, who shed their horns periodically to grow another pair, elephants retain their tusks for life. Should one of them break in a fight, the animal goes through the rest of its life with a damaged member. It is a mistake to think the tusks are employed for pushing over trees; the elephant does that by placing his forehead against the bole and pushing hard while using the weight of his body. Elephants are most careful, when going downhill, not to trip or slip for fear of breaking a leg. They are very conscious of their own weight and the injuries they may incur by falling on a decline, or by placing a foot into a hole, or by stepping into a bog or mire and becoming stuck. For this reason, if a man is chased by an elephant, he has far better chance of escaping by running downhill, rather than uphill or on the level. Elephants cannot jump, either horizontally or vertically, for at no time will they trust themselves with all four feet off the ground. For that matter, they do not run in the accepted sense of the word, but use a fast shuffling stride which might reach a speed of a little over fifteen miles an hour. They can maintain this pace steadily for some miles.

A fairly good runner can outpace a pursuing elephant for a reasonable distance, but it is problematical how long he could maintain his lead, particularly when fleeing through dense or thorny jungle, among tree-trunks, clumps of bushes and especially thorns. Precious time is lost in going around such obstructions, and considerable damage is done to one's person and clothing in trying to negotiate the barrier, while the pursuing pachyderm just crashes through.

No discussion about elephants would be complete without a mention of that intriguing question: where do elephants die? A wealth of superstition and conjecture has arisen over this question in all countries in which these ponderous animals exist in their wild state. In Africa, for a long time, they believed in the existence of secret elephant cemeteries, and more than one expedition has set out to find the treasure in ivory that must be there. But none succeeded. In Ceylon, Burma, Malaya and Siam the same question is asked and the same belief is held. But no proof has been forthcoming in any of these countries.

The aborigines of southern India are divided in their beliefs in this matter. The karumbas and poojarees support the 'secret-cemetery' theory, while the Sholagas contend that elephants never die at all, which is obviously incorrect, for every living thing must die. But the former theory is equally untenable, because there is no corner of the jungles of southern India that has not been trodden by the foot of man. There are no unexplored places there.

Where then do elephants die when they grow old? In all my years of jungle-wandering, I have never come upon the carcass of an elephant that has died a natural death. I have found a small female that had been killed by a pair of tigers. And of course the Moyar valley rogue got caught in sinking-sand. But none of these endings can be described as natural death. So the question remains unanswered and the fable continues. At most, we can conjecture or suggest a possible solution, of which there may be more than one.

Twice have I found elephant bones in the mud and ooze of the Cauvery river when the water sank abnormally during an excessively hot and dry season. One of these was a section of the spinal column. This I found at Hogenaikal. The other was a thighbone picked up at Sangam. Both these places harbour elephants and are on the banks of the Cauvery river. Do aged elephants, when they find dissolution approaching, deliberately commit suicide by drowning themselves? The idea is improbable, as they are instinctively powerful swimmers. Further the urge to live is strong in all creatures. It is possible, however, that they grow so feeble with old age as to be unable to cope with the current, and are therefore drowned by accident. This is, I think, the most likely solution of the problem, as in every country where elephants occur there are large rivers winding through the forests; they are fond of water and keep swimming across them, and at last the day comes when they are too feeble to keep themselves afloat, so they perish in the turbulent currents.

The second theory is that elephants do die in remote parts of jungle where vultures, hyaenas, wild pigs, bears, porcupines, ants, termites and fungi all combine to destroy carcass and bones completely before the advent of the next human passerby, which is very occasional because of the remoteness of the spot. This is a quite possible solution although I do not think it is the correct one. At some time or the other somebody would surely have appeared in time to find the carcass, if not the skeleton. Even the latter, except those of elephants known to have been killed, seem never to be found.

The third theory is that elephants live to such a great age—over 150 years in fact—that by the law of averages they never die natural deaths, but meet, sooner or later, with a violent end. In such circumstances as I have said, their remains are frequently found. In fact the stench given off by a decomposing elephant carcass advertises its presence for miles. The objection to this last theory is that, even so, there are extraordinarily few carcasses, skeletons and bones found even of elephants that have died unnaturally, to account for the number of these animals that must pass away each year in every country in which elephants have their habitat. This is particularly so in Africa, where there are many thousands in the wild state today, while the number of carcasses and skeletons found of creatures that have died from unnatural causes is quite disproportionate to the total number of deaths that must occur each year.

The Sulekunta Panther

The panther of sulekunta was a 'thendu', a hindustani term indicating a 'forest-living panther of large size'. It was an exceptionally big thendu at that.

I first heard of this beast through Muniappa, one of my shikaris. The word shikari means 'hunter', generally one who has made it his profession, and Muniappa was such a one in every sense of the word. In addition he was an out-and-out poacher. I use the verb 'was', because Muniappa assures me his poaching days are over. Well, that is what he says; but I for one do not believe him. Muniappa is an awful liar.

Many years ago this man was responsible for creating a man-eating tigress, which commenced her depredations at Jowlagiri in Salem district and then visited Sulekunta and other places. Well, all that is another story. [1] I just mention it to acquaint you with the fact that Muniappa had been a poacher and done his quota of mischief in days gone by. But he is nevertheless a fairly reliable shikari and certainly knows the jungles within a radius of ten miles of his own village of Jowlagiri like the palm of his hand.

Sulekunta is a little hamlet in the forest of the North Salem division, and lies about seven miles southeast of Jowlagiri. It boasts a varied type of jungle; heavy forest with much bamboo growth in a deep valley intersected by a stream known as the Battaiamaduvu Halla. This stream itself flows eventually in a southeasterly direction and is a tributary of a larger rivulet known as Doddahalla, which I have called the Secret river and about which I have already written.

Sulekunta hamlet is on rather raised ground, surrounded by a few fields devoted to the growing of ragi and cholam grain. Around the fields in every direction is scrub jungle. Low hills surround the area and these are very rocky, consisting in many cases of piled boulders interspersed by glades of long, barbed spear-grass. Between the patches of grass and often in dense clumps, lantana and wait-a-bit thorn grow profusely together.

The area was once abundantly stocked with peafowl which fed on the rich red plums of the cactus plant. But the Forest department introduced the cochineal insect, which feeds only on the cactus plant and destroys it. The experiment has proved outstandingly successful and the cactus is rapidly dying out, but with its diminution the plumlike fruit is becoming a rarity. Hence the peafowl have moved to other regions, although there are a good many birds still to be found in the area. These encroach upon the fields in the mornings and evenings, from whence their plaintive cries echo across the valleys and hills. The sandalwood tree grows prolifically there, although for some reason or the other the plants in the region seem to suffer excessively from the attacks of the 'spike' insect and are mostly unhealthy.

However, to return to my story, Muniappa sent me a postcard one day, written in the Tamil vernacular, saying that a tigress had killed three head of cattle within the space of as many weeks quite close to the hamlet of Sulekunta. He invited me to come and shoot it. I cannot read Tamil, so I had the postcard translated by an Indian friend. I particularly asked him if he was certain that Muniappa had said the killer was a tigress, or might he have meant a tiger, or possibly a panther. My informant was quite definite and confirmed that Muniappa had clearly written that the killing were the work of a tigress. So I did not answer the summons, for I was not interested in hunting a tigress which was, after all, only doing her legitimate killing for food. I got my friend to reply for me in Tamil, thanking Muniappa for the information but saying I was not particularly interested.

I heard nothing more for about a month, when I received a further postcard from Muniappa, once again in Tamil. This conveyed the fact that the tigress had since killed four more head of cattle, making an average of one victim per week since her arrival in the area, and stressing that I should not fail to come and shoot it. Once again I sent a reply, stating very emphatically that I had no desire to shoot a tigress that was after all, only taking her natural food and harming nobody in the process. A fortnight later Muniappa turned up in person. He arrived just as I had finished lunch, and said he had travelled by bus, having left Jowlagiri at dawn. Considering that Jowlagiri is only about forty-three miles from Bangalore, you will have some idea of the slow rate of travel of what are known as the 'third-line bus services' in southern India. Muniappa said he had come to urge me to go after the tigress. I replied that I was scarcely interested and suggested that he shoot the animal himself. He said that he could not do so, for he had no game licence.

I answered, rather bluntly, 'You should know me better by now Munniappa. Do you think I believe you for a moment?'

Muniappa hesitated for a while, and then answered: 'It is no use trying to deceive the dorai. He knows very well. The fact is, my muzzle-loading gun is scarcely effective against a tigress.'

'I seem to remember that you shot a tiger with it once,' I replied, 'and that little bit of shooting started quite a big bit of trouble. Isn't that so?'[2]

He was silent for a minute and then said, 'I don't want to take another chance. This time I want to make certain the tigress is killed.'

His words awoke my curiosity. 'Why are you so interested in this tigress?' I asked.

Finally, in typical eastern fashion, and seeing that my cross-questioning had cornered him, Muniappa came out with the truth. It appeared he had borrowed a hundred rupees from one of the more influential men in his village, as he had required that money for the purchase of a good bull to draw the plough on his field. He had had two bulls previously, but one of them had died and it was essential that he made good the loss immediately, as two bulls, and not one, were required for ploughing.

The creditor had begun to press for the return of his money, but Muniappa had none. To cut a long story short, this creditor had agreed to release him from the debt if he (Muniappa) could supply a good tiger-skin, freshly shot, which the creditor in turn intended to present to another man, an official this time, in return for a special favour.

Of course Muniappa gave me details of the creditor and of the man to whom he wished to present the tiger-skin; also of the nature of the special favour. But this has no bearing on the story itself. I pleaded that I was busy and could not get leave for another month, which was a fact. But Muniappa persisted in pestering me till I compromised by agreeing to answer any summons from him that arrived after the next five weeks had elapsed, as I was fully engaged during that time. He was fairly satisfied and stated that, when this period had passed and a kill had occurred, he would arrange to have it covered by branches as protection against the vultures and would cycle the twenty-three miles from Jowlagiri to the district headquarters of Hosur, whence he would send me a telegram. Upon receipt of the mesage I would go at once by car. Pending my arrival he would return and put up the machan, so that all I would have to do would be to shoot the tigress when she appeared. He pleaded his cause so well that not only did he succeed in getting me to give him the bus-fare for his journey to Bangalore, but also for the return journey, as well as two rupees for the telegram that he would send and something more for himself.

Five weeks had just passed when I received the telegraphic summons. As agreed, I answered it promptly, so that about ninety minutes later I stopped the Studebaker in front of Muniappa's little house in Jowlagiri. I found him squatting at the door, awaiting my arrival. He had just got back on his bicycle from Hosur. He explained that the tigress had killed a large brown bull within a mile from Sulekunta the previous evening. A runner had brought the information as it was getting dark. Muniappa and the runner had returned to Sulekunta by lantern-light, and he had spent the night there. At dawn he had visited the dead bull and found that the tigress had eaten almost half of it. Muniappa and his Sulekunta friends had covered the carcass with leaves. Then he had given them instructions where to erect a machan, after doing which he had half-run these seven miles to Jowlagiri, jumped on a bicycle, and had covered the twenty-three miles to Hosur in two hours to send me his telegram. The message had come fairly quickly and I had responded quickly too, so that it was now just after 3 p.m. and I was faced with eight miles to walk, and then had only to sit on the machan , which no doubt would be ready and awaiting me, and kill the tigress when she turned up. It was all that simple.

We started for Sulekunta without further ado. On the way I questioned Muniappa about the terrain where the kill had taken place. He said the bull had strayed into a belt of dense bamboos, where it had met its end. Then I asked him if he had observed any particulars about the kill itself, and whether he had found pug-marks to corroborate that the killer was a tigress.

'No,' he answered; 'I could find no pug-marks, as the area is carpeted thickly with fallen, dry and decaying bamboo leaves. Besides, there was no time for me to hunt further afield for tracks, as I had to hurry back to send the telegram. But the killer is a pilli (tiger) all right, for the bull's neck was broken, which is a sure sign. It must be a tigress, for the people of Sulekunta say so.'

With that illogical argument I had to be content, so we did not waste time in further conversation. With all our efforts, it took two hours to reach Sulekunta, and some more time to arrive at the dead bull. My watch showed exactly 5.30 p.m.

We removed the leaves from the carcass. As Muniappa had reported, the bull's neck had been broken and the rear half had been devoured after the entrails had been removed a few feet. All indications pointed to the handiwork of a tiger —or tigress! The myriads of fallen and died bamboo leaves precluded any hope of seeing pug-marks.

Then I turned my attention to the machan itself. As might have been expected, having been left by a second party to a third party to construct, the result from my point of view was far from satisfactory. To begin with, it was one of those bamboo-tr ee-machan affairs, by which I mean that it was constructed at the top of a clump of bamboos. Of course, that was nobody's fault, as the bull had been done to death in a belt of bamboos and there was no other tree nearby on which to tie the platform. But such machans have many disadvantages. Unless they are constructed very carefully and cleverly, they are apt to be very conspicuous. This one was no exception.

Every single bamboo stalk had been lopped off at the height of about fifteen feet, the cut pieces having then been shaved of their leaves and placed crossways to form the floor of the machan. As a result, that particular bamboo clump had an obviously beheaded appearance and clearly revealed the platform on top of it. Secondly, the crosspieces were too few and some of them were several inches apart. The whole structure looked most insecure, and I knew it would sway and creak horribly. Thirdly, no attempt had been made to camouflage it from below or from the sides. It was just a bare platform, erected at the top of an abruptly shortened clump of bamboos.

Time was running out, however, and it was too late to do anything about it. After removing the leaves from the dead bull, I scrambled onto the platform with my rifle and usual night equipment.

My worst fears were immediately confirmed. Straight away, my weight tipped one end lower than the other, so that the whole structure went askew at an angle of almost thirty degrees from the horizontal, and I felt it sway ominously. Muniappa cut a few green bamboo fronds and stuck them between the crossmembers beneath me in an attempt to conceal the structure from below. But it was a poor effort, and now that the time was almost six o'clock, nothing more could be done by way of camouflage at the four ends of the platform. Then Muniappa went away and I spent one of my worst nights ever. The bamboo pieces cut into me from below. Each time I moved, the whole structure creaked and swayed. The machan appeared to go still further askew with my weight and every movement I made. Hence I was forced to remain immobile for fear that the crazy structure might collapse or tip further down at one end and so steeply as to make it impossible to remain there.

Although sitting over a kill is regarded by many as an irksome and tiring ordeal, to me it has always been a source of considerable pleasure. Perhaps this is because I am, above all else, a lover of nature. Far from dragging monotonously, I have found that time passes, if anything, too quickly. I am so absorbed in the wonders of the night, be it moonlight when the soft, silvery moonbeams outline the jungle in a ghostly brilliance quite different from its appearance by day; or a dark night, with the fireflies flitting fitfully around, while the stars in the heavens twinkle serenely with a radiance sufficient to outline the surrounding bushes and landscape. There is so much to listen to, even if one cannot see the myriad forms of life that crowd the forest night. So much is there to learn, if one has only the desire and ability.

But this night was an exception in every way. It was as black as pitch, the darkness being accentuated by the heavy clouds that fled low across the sky. But the jungle was as silent as the grave. No animal or bird voiced the faintest sound, nor did a frog croak or cricket chirp among the dark swaying aisles of bamboos.

I knew the reason for these unusual conditions. A storm was brewing. It was eight o'clock when the first harbinger of the downpour made itself felt in the bamboo grove. The wind started to blow. I could hear it coming across the tops of the bamboos, beginning as the far-off roar of a distant ocean. Eventually it reached me with the impact of a giant hand. The tops of the feathery bamboos bowed low beneath the onslaught, while the cut stems below me began to bend to the breeze. This caused the crossmembers of the platform on which I was sitting to creak and, what was worst of all, to separate increasingly. The tilt became more acute as the mutilated bamboo stems shook and tossed with each gust.

And then came the rain! Often in the jungle, especially in hilly regions, you can hear the rain falling before it reaches the ground. I heard the distant murmur as the condensing clouds began to spill their contents towards the thirsty forest below. This soon became a continuous roar as the rain struck the jungle, and the roar advanced with growing intensity as the wall of water rushed towards the spot where I sat. A final gust shook the broken bamboos below. They strained with the impact, and then a sheet of water enveloped me. Vivid flashes of forked lightning streaked earthwards, followed by the earsplitting crashes of the thunder. In a moment I was drenched.

But I had little time in which to lament my discomfort, for a still greater calamity befell me. With the next onslaught of wind the ropes holding my crazy platform either slipped or gave way, and I felt the structure heel over to an angle of forty-five degrees as I, and all my equipment, slid down the impossible slope.

I let go the rifle as I felt myself falling. I recollect hearing it clatter against the bamboo stems and then fall with a dull thud to the ground. The cut ends of the tossing bamboos sought to impale me as, sprawling awkwardly, I sought desperately for something to hold on to. One of these cut ends ripped through my shirt at the back, while another almost gouged out my eyes. I clutched fearfully at the latter, striving to push it away as it tore my forehead. And in the midst of the confusion, from below me came a series of coughing roars and the sound of a heavy body rushing through the undergrowth.

I yelled at the top of my voice while I frantically clung with both hands to the bamboo before my face. My legs and body were wedged between the stems, while my full weight was borne by both arms. In this position I held on for dear life, continuing to shout for all I was worth to drive away the tigress which I now knew was beneath me.

It was much too evident what had happend. She had returned to the kill just as the rain came and had decided to shelter at the foot of the bamboo-clump in which my most insecure machan had been built. As likely as not the wind, rain, thunder and lightning had all combined to distract her attention from spotting that very obvious platform on which I was seated and which she would no doubt have seen at once had conditions been normal. But that was when the ropes holding my machan gave way. My rifle and other equipment had fallen all around her, while I had started floundering among the stems above.

She must have been badly frightened, and annoyed too. No wonder she had roared so terribly in strong protest. But the question was: had she run away, or was she still lurking below?

I was in complete darkness, having dropped my torch with the rifle. Also I could not hold on much longer. My hands, face and back were torn, the wet bamboo began to slip from my hands, and my legs and body slid a foot or so downwards. Then I become wedged between the stems. I was well and truly fixed, and I was helpless in every way.

As I have told you, the platform had been erected at a height of about fifteen feet from the ground. It must have tilted about two feet lower. Then I had slipped downwards at least a foot more before I became wedged. I was therefore about three feet lower than the original fifteen. My height is 5 feet 7 ½ inches. As a result my legs were hanging not more than about six feet above the ground. Of course I did not do all this mental arithmetic just then. But I did enough to realize I was in great danger should the tigress decide to attack. For any tiger could now reach me without effort, while I was held tightly among the bamboos, unarmed and in pitch darkness.

Can you blame me for shouting? I did not do so merely to frighten away the tigress. I suppose when one is really terrified, the spontaneous reaction is to shout—rather, I should say, to scream. So I continued to do just that for quite a while, most unrestrainedly and unashamedly. Then I managed to regain control of myself and began to think things out. I remembered having heard the sound of a heavy body rushing through the undergrowth. Undoubtedly, that had been the tigress. But had she rushed right away, or had she just leapt to the shelter of some other clump after bedlam had broken loose around and above her?

As I calmed down I realized with great thankfulness that the tigress was after all just a normal cattle-lifter and not a man-eater. My screams must surely have frightened her more than ever. Having reasoned thus far, I felt fairly certain she had run away and that I would be safe enough if I descended to the ground. But the point was that I could not descend, I was caught firmly between the swaying stems.

The next few minutes were extremely harrowing ones. Finding myself held so firmly, the obvious thing to do was to draw myself higher up the stem to which I was clinging in order to free my feet and lower extremities. I started to do this while groping with the toes of my canvas shoes for the slightest foothold to support my weight, even for a few seconds, to relieve the terrible strain on my arms.

I do not know how many of you have seen or examined a bamboo stem, or frond as it is generally called, very closely. There are projections along it from which the leaves branch out. Some of them are spiked, but they are all relatively strong although only as thick as a man's middle finger. These sharp spikes pierced the thin rubber soles of the canvas shoes I was wearing and cut their way into my flesh. But they were strong enough to support my weight. With considerable effort I regained the foot or so I had lost. As I did so I felt my legs come free. Soon I was clinging to only one stem, which supported my entire weight.

While all this was happening the storm continued with unabated fury. Lightning flashed, the thunder rumbled and crashed, and the rain descended in solid sheets. The wind grew stronger, if that were possible, and tore its way through the bamboo grove, whipping off branches here and there that swished past my face as they were carried away by the breeze. Suddenly a tremendous blast, stronger than any of its predecessors, seized the tops of the bamboo. It struck the mutilated clump, causing the stems to bend further than ever, and the stem to which I clung broke sharply below me. I felt myself falling as my body crashed its way through the other stems, and a second later, still holding the broken bamboo in my hands, I hit mother earth with a resounding thump.

Instinctively I scrambled up and with my feet groped in the intense darkness for my fallen rifle. But it was quite some time before I found it, and I went twice around that clump of bamboos before I did so. I could feel the end of the muzzle clogged with mud and the first thing I did was to clean it.

I had not brought a greatcoat with me because the weather had been warm; only a pullover. This had fallen to the ground with the rest of my things and very foolishly I did not think of searching for it, a lapse for which I was to suffer intensely before that night was over.

The next thing I did was to press the button of the torch that was fastened to the barrel of my rifle. Nothing happened. I felt along the torch itself till I came to where its lens would have been, but there was neither glass nor bulb. Both had been smashed in the fall. I was in pitch-darkness. And the rain continued with unabated force.

I have mentioned that the bull had been killed about a mile from the hamlet of Sulekunta. A mile is no great distance, but to reach that hamlet in those conditions would be tricky, for apart from the rain and darkness, I had a bamboo jungle to contend with. Those who have been in such jungles at night will understand what that means, for the bamboos grow in clusters, each cluster only a few feet from its neighbour. As a rule no trees grow between, nor large bushes either, the intervening ground being covered with grass, minor undergrowth, or just a deep carpet of fallen, decaying bamboo leaves. Even in bright daylight one clump of bamboos looks like any other, and I knew that, in pitch-darkness, intensified by the bamboos themselves, the overcast sky, the pouring rain, the absence of any star to guide me, and the impossibility of keeping a match alight even if I could strike one on the sodden box, once I left the clump on which I had been sitting, I might wander all night in circles without getting any closer to Sulekunta. I might even wander further away from the hamlet.

By this time I had ceased to worry about the tigress. If she had been anywhere near and had wanted to attack me, she would have done so already. Otherwise, no animal would venture out in a storm like that. Even wild elephants, a few of which generally inhabited these mixed jungles, where the bamboo grew to provide them with tender fronds, would not brave these elements, but would seek such shelter as they could find, huddled together beneath the clumps. Of course, it would be just too bad if I was unlucky enough to walk right into one while groping in the darkness. That was a chance that had to be taken.

I waited for the next flash of lightning, and it was not long in coming. After that momentary illumination, I faced the direction in which I judged the hamlet to be. I walked a few paces with outstretched hands that soon met the spiky obstruction caused by the next clump. I felt my way around it, and when I judged I had walked about half way around, I tried to continue in the proper direction. A few minutes of this sort of thing made me realize its utter hopelessness. To begin with, when I walked around each clump of bamboo I had no means of judging whether I had circumvented half of it, or less, or more; so that each time I set out for the next clump I might be walking in almost any direction. I then decided that there was no alternative but to wait for the storm to pass. I sat on my haunches at the foot of the next clump. The ground was about six inches deep in water and mud, so I placed my rifle across my knees and awaited events.

It was ten o'clock before the heavy rain eased, but a sharp drizzle prevailed till almost midnight. The thunder had long since ceased and the flashes of lightning became fewer and then stopped altogether, leaving me in inky blackness.

So long as it had rained heavily I had not felt the cold unduly. Paradoxically, the water had seemed comparatively warm. When the drizzle set in I felt chilly, and when after midnight the drizzle ceased, that was when I really started to feel the cold. What with the drop in temperature towards the early hours of the morning, together with evaporation from my soaked clothing, I began to freeze. In no uncertain manner I cursed myself for failing to look for my pullover. Eventually I removed every stitch of clothing, walked to and fro, leaped up and down, flung my arms and legs about, and did everything I could to keep the blood circulating in my chilled body. I tried to light a match, but the box and its contents were sodden. The sky remained overcast, without a star to guide me on another attempt to reach Sulekunta. And so I passed what was without a doubt the most uncomfortable night ever. Blue with cold and with chattering teeth, I witnessed the dawn break through the clouds of vapour that rose from the saturated jungle.

With daylight I was able to gain an idea of the general direction in which the hamlet lay and set out for it. Imagine my surprise when, scarcely a minute later, I passed the beheaded clump on which I had been sitting the night before. Although I had been tempted many times during the hours of early morning, when I felt that I would freeze to death, to blunder forth a second time, at that moment I heartily congratulated myself for having remained where I was. Eventually, wearing my still soaking trousers, I reached the little village, where I found Muniappa anxiously awaiting me.

Before telling him what had happened, I asked him to make a big fire of straw, wood, dried cow-dung—in fact, anything that would burn—without a moment's delay. Soon a healthy blaze was started and I sat close beside it, my saturated shirt spread on the ground beside me next to my pants, while I wore Muniappa's turban around my waist. It was a feeling of pure bliss that crept over me as the heat penetrated every part of my body. Then, as Muniappa placed a small pot of water in the midst of the fire, preparatory to making tea, I told him the tale of woe.

An hour later I started the seven-mile walk back to Jowlagiri and my car. I now had a personal account to settle with the tigress of Sulekunta. Although she was undoubtedly innocent of the intention, she was, I felt, responsible for the terrible night I had just endured. At Jowlagiri I left Muniappa with money for another telegram in case the tigress should kill again, when he was to inform me without delay. Then I returned to Bangalore, a sadder but a much wiser man.

The same evening I suffered a sharp attack of ague, followed by high fever. The exposure had brought on a bout of malaria. To malaria bronchitis was added three days later, and this in turn developed into pneumonia. It was then that the telegram came from Muniappa: the tigress had killed again at Sulekunta. Of course, I could not respond. I told my wife to write to Muniappa, telling him of my condition, and that I would contact him when I was fit to answer a further summons. But it was a whole month before I felt I could risk another night in a machan. And that, of course, against both my wife's and the doctor's orders. Meanwhile I wrote and told Muniappa that I was well again.

Nearly another month passed before I received the next telegram. Briefly it informed me that a cow had been killed near Sulekunta. Thirsting for revenge, I set out for Jowlagiri once more, but this time with a raincoat and two pullovers, together with a spare torch, batteries, bulbs and matches, wrapped in an old oilskin tobacco pouch to protect them from the wet. I had learnt my lesson: from that time I have always carried these additional articles with me.

When Muniappa met me at Jowlagiri, he told me that the killer was a very big panther—a thendu—and not a tigress as he had imagined. He said he was certain of this because he had clearly seen the pug-marks in the sand beside the kill. To say I was very disappointed would express my feelings lightly. Then Muniappa said something that made me think deeply. He said that he now thought that there never had been a tigress, and that this thendu had alone been responsible for the many kills that had occurred at Sulekunta. He reminded me that we had seen no pug-marks near the bull over which I had sat. Both he and I had concluded the animal had been a tiger because the bull's neck had been broken and it was the villagers of Sulekunta who had said it was a tigress. He also reminded me that thendus kill and eat in the same manner as tigers.

The thought that I had been through all that dreadful ordeal for the sake of a mere panther was distinctly galling. However, having come so far, I set out with Muniappa for Sulekunta. The kill, this time a fully-grown and white cow, lay at the fringe of the same belt of bamboo. In my letter I had told Muniappa to build no more machans on bamboo trees. Thus I was left with selecting the spot where I intended to sit and constructing my hide in the short space of the one remaining hour of daylight. It was exactly five o'clock.

In those early days I had not made the portable machan which I carried about with me in later years to meet just such an emergency as this. So I had to work really fast if I wanted to be in place by six o'clock. The kill had been made at the fringe of the bamboo belt and was much closer to the hamlet. The bamboo grew less thickly there and was interspersed with a few trees and a considerable number of lantana and other bushes which had spread in from the adjacent scrub jungle.

Glancing around quickly, my eyes fell on a large lantana bush some twently yards away. It was a few feet apart from its neighbours and seemed the ideal place. Muniappa had brought his curved knife for cutting wood, so we set to work in real earnest. From the edge of the lantana bush furthest from where the cow was lying we hacked a small passage leading to its centre, which we then cut away also, retaining for camouflage use all the branches and twigs we removed. I crawled through the passage and sat in the centre of the bush. Then, level with my head, Muniappa cut a rectangular opening directly facing the dead cow. We made the space in the middle of the bush large enough for me to sit in comfortably, together with my raincoat, pullovers and a flask of tea. Taking up my position, I aligned my rifle through the rectangular opening and at the kill to test the angle and direction of fire.

We had worked fast and it was still ten minutes to six when Muniappa, after a scrutiny from all angles to check if anything had been overlooked, pronounced himself satisfied. Then he went away. It was quite warm under the bush which, together with the earth beneath, still retained some of the heat of the day. This caused me to perspire a little, but as it grew dark this slight inconvenience passed away and I was as comfortable as I could expect.

There were the usual jungle sounds of sundown, dominated by the screeching of myriads of those small green parakeets with purple heads that abound in the vicinity of bamboo frests, where they feed voraciously on the dried bamboo seeds. Batches of the 'seven-sister' birds, which is the colloquial name for the Indian 'babbler', fluttered from bush to ground and back again, chattering vigorously, and a couple of mynas winged around the clearing, snatching at the insects that began to show up in the grass as it cooled. In this task the mynas had an active competitor in a solitary hoopoe that hopped about on the ground, raising his crest of comb-like feathers of a rich light-brown hue, and dipping it again from time to time in his pursuit of insects. As a background of sound to this nearer chorus came the distant cries of peafowl, the challenging crow of the junglecocks, and the squabbling of spurfowl; all three, together with the parakeets, are particularly fond of localities where the bamboo grows thickly, providing them with both food and dense cover in which to hide from their natural enemies—man, and the members of the cat-tribe.

At length darkness fell. Although there was no moon, the sky was completely cloudless and was soon filled with myriad stars. The starlight shed a diffused light over the ground in front of me, so that the dead cow, as I looked at it through the opening we had made in the lantana, still remained visible as a faint blur on the ground although it had lost its shape. The patches of white on its coat helped to reveal those parts of the carcass, whereas the brown patches were nearly invisible. The minutes passed quickly enough and it was 7.45 when I thought I heard a slight sound to my right. It seemed like a faint sigh, or maybe a stifled yawn. Then, seconds later, came a faint scratching.

What could have made it? Not a panther, nor a tiger for that matter. Very likely a mongoose was nosing around. That would account for the scratching noise I had heard, but not for the faint sigh or stifled yawn. The minutes sped by and then the scratching was resumed. This time it came from behind me. Something was clawing gently at the lantana bush in which I was seated. It seemed to have discovered the freshly-cut branches and twigs that had been loosely placed there by Muniappa and was investigating; perhaps even trying to remove them. Whatever animal was busy there, it was either extraordinarily brave or exceptionally curious. I became curious too, and I turned my head slowly to glance over my left shoulder.

The scratching noise ceased abruptly. Had the animal been able to detect that slight movement, even through the intervening twigs? For a considerable time nothing happened. Then the scratching restarted, more insistently and more quickly this time. From the darkness in which I sat the leaves and twigs of the bush behind me were outlined faintly against the background of the star-dusted sky. I saw them vibrate and move. The creature now seemed to be making a determined effort to remove the loose twigs. Then I heard the faint hissing sound that is the unmistakable snarl of a panther in doubt.

Slowly I drew the rifle back from the rectangular aperture before me, and half-turned my body around. That was when the panther ceased to be in doubt or even to be curious. There came a series of quick, deep growls, followed by a rush and a thud, as the panther backed out and leapt for the shelter of some other bush or a clump of grass.

My memory flew back to that rainy night just two months earlier, when I had slid off the tilting machan and had almost been impaled on the lopped ends of the bamboo stems. I had heard this very same growling then, followed by the rush and thud as an animal had leapt away. I wondered if Muniappa was right. Could it have been just a panther that had been sheltering under the bamboos when I had fallen on top of it, and not a tigress—or a tiger—as I had thought?

Well, whatever animal had made its rush on that occasion, I had no doubt whatever that in this instance I was dealing with a panther—and a thendu at that. And now it had discovered my presence and had gone, and there was little chance that it would return. Luck was entirely against me. I looked at my wrist-watch; the time was 8.20. The night was still young, so I decided to wait till midnight and then return to Sulekunta.

As chance ordained, however, I had not heard the last of the thendu for that night. Obviously hungry, certainly curious, and angry at being spied upon, it came back in a half-circle and, without revealing itself, started uttering the well-known sawing call of a panther from the jungle in front of me and immediately beyond the dead cow. Panthers often make these sounds when returning to an animal they have killed, but this one had not done so up till now.

I remained quite still and the effect on that thendu was amazing. He walked around the area in a wide circle, taking care to keep out of sight, till he got behind me. Then, as if conscious that he was at an advantage, redoubled—if that was possible—his sawing, alternating with snarls. At one stage he ceased abruptly and silence reigned for a while. Either he had gone away or he was preparing to attack. But panthers, even the large thendus, do not do that sort of thing unless they have become man-eaters, and I knew this animal was no man-eater. For there had not been a single report of any person having been molested by tiger or panther in this area since the reign of the Jowlagiri man-eater. [3]

The doubt was settled a little later when he worked himself around to a direction in front of me but half-left, and from there he began to call again. This gave me the hope that if I remained absolutely still he might become bold enough to advance upon the kill, or at least show himself for a minute or two. But it turned out a futile hope. Finally, he abandoned the task of trying to terrify me with his calls and departed, his grunts of disapproval and disappointment gradually fading away in the distance.

I remained till midnight without any sign of his return, and then, deciding he had gone for good, I stepped out of my hiding place and walked the short distance to Sulekunta, where I woke up Muniappa and told him what had happened. Muniappa said that he thought I had done wrong by coming away and that I should have remained in hiding, as he was certain the panther would return in the early hours of the morning. He even suggested that I go back and re-enter the lantana bush. But I was of a different opinion, being just as confident that the thendu would not return, because, all his efforts to dislodge me having failed, he would hardly be so foolish as to come back and show himself, when I might still be concealed.

Muniappa challenged me to a bet on this issue. I accepted it and suggested a stake of five rupees—about six shillings. He said that was too high a figure, but he was prepared to bet me a rupee that the thendu would return. I accepted the challenge.

It was agreed that I should walk back to Jowlagiri alone and spend the rest of the night in the small forest rest house there, while Muniappa would remain at Sulekunta, inspect the kill early next morning to see if the panther had come back, and then follow to Jowlagiri and report.

I spent a late morning at the Jowlagiri rest house and awoke to see Muniappa peering in at me through the iron bars of the little window which I had left open. The time was 8.30 a.m. Getting out of bed, I went out on to the verandah, where Muniappa told me he had won his bet and come to collect his money. The thendu had returned and eaten well, but he said he thought there was enough left over for a third meal. That would mean that the panther would be at the kill that very evening. Muniappa also said that he had taken the precaution of covering what remained of the carcass with leaves, in order to hide it from the vultures.

Beckoning him into the bedroom of the rest house, I solemnly handed over the stake money of one rupee and then told him I would prepare some tea for him if he would take my camp-kettle to fill at the little stone-lined well about a hundred yards behind the bungalow. He did that with alacrity, and soon the roar of my Primus stove told us both that refreshment was on the way. Without bothering to shave, I buttered some cold chappaties and opened a large tin of sardines to keep them company. Being a caste man, Muniappa would have nothing to do with my buttered chappaties and sardines, but he accepted the big mug of tea I offered him. Then we tried to chalk out a line of campaign for the forthcoming night.

Now I did not favour the idea of sitting in the bush again, for I was almost certain the panther would inspect it carefully before approaching his kill, if he did return at all. If he found me inside, which he was sure to do, he would repeat his performance of the night before. True he had come back in the early hours of the morning, as Muniappa had predicted. But I felt he would not have done so had I returned to the bush the previous night, as my henchman had suggested, or had I remained there. So a plan began to form in my mind, but I did not tell Muniappa, whose opinion it was that I should reoccupy my old hide. Instead, I told him to go to his house in the village of Jowlagiri, half a mile from the forest rest house, eat an early lunch and be prepared to return with me to Sulekunta at exactly one o'clock.

Eating a cold lunch myself, I left the bungalow at twelve thirty and walked to the village to collect Muniappa, but my retainer had not even started on his meal when I arrived. However, by dint of much cajoling, I managed to get him on the move by one-thirty in the afternoon. It was blazing hot, but we maintained a brisk pace, reaching what remained of the dead cow at exactly three-thirty. We were both streaming with perspiration. I then began to seek for the means to put my secret plan into operation. You will probably have guessed what I was looking for: a convenient tree, overlooking the bush inside which I had sheltered the night before, quite regardless of whether the kill was visible from the tree or not.

As soon as he realized what was in my mind, Muniappa told me plainly that he did not think it a very good plan. Fancy sitting up over an empty bush! To him the whole idea was stupid. We found a tree—a half-grown jumlum —about thirty yards away. It commanded a fairly clear view of the lantana bush, but from it nothing could be seen of the dead cow, because the latter was at a right angle to a line drawn between the jumlum tree and the lantana bush. The three points represented the three corners of a right-angled triangle. That was why I had not selected the jumlum in the first instance in preference to the bush.

Choosing a convenient branch, I instructed Muniappa to erect a machan , which he did quite efficiently within a little over an hour, concealing the platform on the four sides as well as from below with leaves from the same tree. While he was busy I let him into the second phase of my secret plan, by hanging a spare khaki shirt inside the lantana bush where I had sat the night before.

It was ten minutes to five when I climbed into the jumlum tree and told Muniappa to wait for me at Sulekunta. He departed with a rather glum expression. Plainly he thought that I was very silly; but as he walked away he did what I had previously instructed him to do: he talked aloud to himself so that, should the panther be lurking in the vicinity, he would gain the impression that the man who had been near his kill was now going away. I sat perfectly still and silent. The next hour or so would prove whether I was right.

The sun had not set and it was quite bright when a large thendu walked gingerly out of the jungle to the right, halted some twenty paces from the bush, and stood regarding it intently. He was at right angles to me, absolutely motionless and broadside on, presenting a perfect shot—either behind the left shoulder or at the neck, as I might prefer.

Very slowly I raised my rifle, fitted the stock comfortably into my shoulder, and started to align the sights on the panther, which remained quite still, staring into the bush. What a perfect picture he presented, his gloriously spotted hide a thing of beauty! Each rosette was clearly visible. His cocked ears and slightly tilted head were ready to catch the faintest sound or movement from the bush. Only the tip of his ringed tail twitched spasmodically from side to side, registering the nervous tension which was not at all evident in his bold posture.

I had almost squeezed the trigger when I thought of the two nights of excitement and entertainment with which this animal had provided me. Was I now justified in butchering him in cold blood when he was quite unaware of my presence, and when he had committed no crime? Twice he had had me at his mercy, but had done nothing. Now he was at mine. What was I going to do about it?

I hesitated another moment—and was lost!

Lowering my rifle, I called pleasantly to him, 'Good evening.'

He looked up at me, very startled. Then he returned my greeting. 'Wroof! Wroof!' he said, and was gone!

I listened to the familiar and always delightful calls of the birds as they went to roost, and returned to Sulekunta at about 9 p.m., with the news that the panther had not shown up. I admitted to Muniappa that I had erred greatly in not listening to him by sitting over the kill. He nodded in a superior kind of way and said rather haughtily: 'I told you so, but you would not listen to me. You thought you knew better. The next time you will do well to remember that I, Muniappa, the best shikari in Jowlagiri, know all about the animals of the jungle and their ways.'

It would never do to let my retainer think his dorai had become suddenly soft and sentimental. Better to be thought wrong, than to be considered a maudlin idiot. But I never regretted my last-moment decision to spare the life of that beautiful animal.

Incidentally, I do not know if that official did Muniappa's creditor the favour that was required of him. Probably not; because he never got the tiger's skin—nor a panther's, for that matter. But I do know this much: Muniappa never paid his debt of one hundred rupees. He told me so, many years later, blaming me for being the direct and only cause of his dishonesty, because I failed to shoot the panther and procure the pelt.

From Mauler to Man-Eater

THIS STORY IS THE SEQUEL TO TWO EPISODES I HAVE RECORDED IN THE earlier books of adventures. The first of these began when a tiger began to behave very strangely by mauling the graziers of the hamlet of Rajnagara, at the foot of the Dimbum escarpment in North Coimbatore district in what is now known as Madras state. The unique feature was that this tiger never bit any of its human victims nor was there any authentic proof that it had killed or eaten anybody. It merely rushed at its victim and, when close enough raised itself on its hind legs and severely mauled him with the claws of its forefeet in the region of the head, chest, back and arms. I attempted to bag this elusive animal, but failed completely.

Then the scene changed to a very much wider area of operations, varying from sixty to one hundred miles north and northeast of Rajnagara. A tiger killed and carried off a boy at another little hamlet in the jungle, called Pegepalyam. That boy was the first of several victims, some of whose remains were recovered. The bodies bore unmistakable evidence of having been severely mauled by the claws of the tiger which had attacked them, while teeth marks, other than where the flesh had been eaten, were conspicuously absent. In one case, two men who had climbed up a tree saw their companion actually being mauled by this tiger, which attacked him on two separate occasions, clawing him across the face the first time, and killing him with a blow of its paw the second time, before it carried him off.

The human remains that had been found indicated that there was apparently nothing wrong with the animal's teeth or jaws, as had at first been conjectured. For he had eaten a good meal from each, which would hardly have been possible with impaired teeth or a broken or otherwise maimed jaw.

His constant mode of assault, however, which was by clawing and striking with his forepaws and not by biting, appeared to indicate beyond doubt that this animal was none other than the earlier 'Mauler of Rajnagara' that had strayed northwards into an area of jungle far larger than his original habitat. My son Donald made two attempts to bag this beast, the first at Pegepalyam itself, and the second near the road between Lokkanhalli and Bailur, in the very area where I had encountered the Ramapuram Tiger some years before.[1] But he had met with bad luck, for on both occasions this tiger had not returned to the remains of the human victims he had killed and over which Donald had, with the utmost difficulty, persuaded the bereaved relatives to allow him to sit.

Naturally, both Donald and I scanned the newspapers keenly for further reports of man-killing, besides receiving such reports as the Forest Department sent us from time to time. From these sources scanty news trickled through at long intervals. Human beings began to fall victim to a tiger in scattered areas and in the most remote north-eastern corners of the Kollegal taluk in North Coimbatore district, just south of the Cauvery river, which separates it from Mysore state on the northwest and the Salem district, which is a part of Madras state, on the north and east.

Two definite and authentic items of news eventually arrived. The first was a report that, while grazing her cattle, an old woman had been carried off by a tiger which never so much as touched any of the browsing herd. Her remains were never found. This happened at a cattle patti named Gulya. The second report was that a man grazing cattle had been attacked and mauled, but not killed, at another patti named Alambadi just across the Cauvery river from Salem district; in this case it was reported that the herdsman, who was standing in the midst of his cattle while the animals were feeding in the jungle looked up in time to see a tiger spring from an adjacent bush and regardless of the beasts all around, come straight at him. He yelled at the tiger, and as it came within reach he pluckily swung at it with the wooden staff he was holding. It appears that the tiger then reared up on its hind legs and severely clawed his chest and arms, knocking him down. But among the man's cattle were five buffaloes, and these animals happened to be grazing nearby. As buffaloes often do, the five of them joined together and charged the tiger, which turned tail and fled. Although severely injured the man was able to stagger back to the patti where there were several other herdsmen to succour him.

A patti is a patch of jungle which has been let by the government to a number of herdsmen for kraaling cattle at night that have been licensed to graze in the reserved forest. These animals are permitted to feed during the day in the jungle within a radius, generally, of three miles around the patti in any direction. The grazing period lasts for about six months out of twelve: after the monsoons and during the hot dry weather, when there is no fodder to be found near the villages. The licence costs four annas per animal for the six months, which works out to about one shilling for three head of cattle for six months. This breaks down to two-thirds of a penny per animal per month for the right to feed all day within an area approximately twenty-eight square miles.

However, to get back to our story: because the scenes of these two incidents, and Alambadi in particular, were close to the Cauvery river, with Salem district on the other side, with reasonably good roads and communications, the news spread quicker and in greater detail, so that we heard about it in Bangalore within a month of the incidents in question. This is not a long time for such conditions and such remote areas. It was therefore reasonably certain that this tiger was not entirely devoted to man-eating. He was following the general practice of man-eating panthers, attacking human beings only when an exceptionally easy opportunity turned up or perhaps when the mood seized him. At other times he was obviously living on wild game, as there were no more than the usual number of cattle being killed in the area by tigers and panthers.

Time passed and we were beginning to forget about this tiger when reports came in quick succession that two persons had been killed and eaten at a small hamlet with the rather curious name of Bejahahai. It was reputed that the body of the first victim was never recovered, but the second was found after it had been half-devoured. This man had been badly mauled and clawed about the face and chest.

Donald agreed with me that at last we had something concrete and authentic to work upon. The elusive tiger of Pegepalyam, which we suspected to be no other than the mauler of Rajnagara, appeared to be again at work. According to the map, the hamlet of Bejahahai was situated almost 3,000 feet above sea level in a valley to the east of the highest mountain peak in Kollegal taluk, named Ponnachchi Betta or Ponachi Malai, itself nearly 5,000 feet up. Donald had long determined to shoot this tiger and solve the riddle of its strange habit of mauling its victims before killing them. So he decided to set out on a month's 'safari', as he called it, to accomplish his objective. What follows is Donald's story, as he told it to me:

After receiving reports of the two human kills that had taken place at Bejahahai, I decided at all costs to get the tiger that had been responsible, especially as I was sure it was the same beast I had tried unsuccessfully to shoot almost a year before at Pegepalyam.

There were two curious things about this tiger. The first was that he was reported to claw the people he attacked rather than bite them. The second was that he never returned to a human kill; I had already sat up for him over human bodies without success.

So I got things ready in a hurry and collected as much cash I could, nearly 300 rupees, to pay for my baits and general expenses while I was out on safari. Although this was a good deal of money, it was well worth spending if I could shoot this tricky animal that had proved such a menace for so long. So at five o'clock one morning I set out in my car, which although old, had proved itself over and over again as very good for jungle work.

I stopped for a couple of hours at Pennagram to pick up Dad's old shikari, a fellow named Ranga, whom I regarded more as an old friend than a servant. I then made a diversion down a jungle road to a place called Muttur, seven miles away in a valley on the banks of the Chinar river, where I persuaded Byra, another old shikari friend, to accompany me too. Byra is a Poojaree, an aborigine who was born and bred in the jungle. Dad and I have known him for many years. Although he is pretty old, I still think he is even better than Ranga when it comes to jungle knowledge and work. He is certainly a better tracker.

We motored back to Pennagram and then turned due west, to cover another ten miles to a hamlet named Hogenaikal, on the banks of the Cauvery river. There are some water-falls here which have become famous for religious reasons, at least so far as the Hindu faith is concerned. Years ago another very good shikari lived here, who had at one time got into trouble with the government through shooting an elephant on one of his poaching trips. He also knew me from an early age, but he was now dead. A mile from Hogenaikal is a village named Ootaimalai, where Dad has a one-roomed brick hut which he used in the old days as a camping place when game was plentiful in the area and he came regularly on hunting trips. Conditions have changed since then, however, and there is not much to shoot in the locality.

I left my car in front of his hut and in charge of the local Forest Guard. Then I distributed all the kit I had brought between Ranga, Byra and myself and we set out to cover the rest of the journey to Bejahahai, about 9 ½ miles, on foot.

First we walked three miles down the road that led northwestwards from Ootaimalai, along the banks of the Cauvery river, towards a place named Biligundlu. At the third mile there is a ferry across the river, and we had to use this to reach the Alambadi cattle patti on the further bank. Incidentally, this ferry is not a regular wooden boat, but a circular, basket-work affair, perhaps eight feet in diameter, covered with tough buffalo-hide and hardly drawing six inches of water. These leather-cum-basketwork jobs are known locally as coracles. They are controlled by one man with a short wooden paddle; he is highly skilled in negotiating the strong river currents and in avoiding the sharp edges of rocks that often lie just below the surface. When we set foot on the opposite bank near Alambadi we were in Kollegal taluk, which is a part of North Coimbatore district and has quite a separate Forest Department administration. Alambadi was one of the places at which this tiger had seriously mauled a man some months earlier. I tried to get more information about the animal from the herdsmen living in the patti, but I could gather very little.

Two facts were prominent, however. The first, that everyone was terribly scared and walked about in fear of their lives. The second, gained from those who had seen the man who had been mauled, was that he had been severely clawed about his shoulders, chest and back, but had not been bitten anywhere. The poor fellow had since succumbed to his wounds as a result of blood poisoning.

The place for which I was bound was the hamlet named Bejahahai, on the eastern slopes of a mountain chain about ten miles in length, running almost north and south, which has its highest peak at a point named Ponachi Malai, about four miles from the northern end. A stream called Gulyatha Halla rises somewhere south of this chain and flows in a northeasterly direction, joining the Cauvery river a little north of Alambadi. There is a footpath from Alambadi to Bejahahai, which more or less follows the tributary I have just mentioned for about five miles, and then turns westwards for the remaining mile and a half to Bejahahai. The three of us set out along this footpath. It was close on three in the afternoon. The sun was really fierce, and walking along the narrow and stony track was arduous. We crossed the tributary about half-a-dozen times; it became increasingly rocky and boulder-strewn as the land rose perceptibly towards the mountain chain ahead.

Our trek was not altogether uneventful. We had practically completed the first five miles and were at the last river-crossing before the pathway left the stream to turn westwards to Bejahahai, when we came upon a herd of elephants resting from the heat beneath the shade of the muthee and tamarind trees that grew along both banks of the tributary. They were not feeding at the time and so we did not hear them, and as the breeze was blowing down from the hills, past them and towards us, they did not scent us. I was wearing rubber-soled boots, while Ranga and Byra were barefooted. Hence they did not hear us coming, with the result that we almost walked into their midst. Pandemonium broke loose as the elephants scented and spotted us simultaneously. As if to show how cowardly these huge beasts really are, even when in large numbers—there might have been about thirty in all—the herd rushed away headlong, the shrieks of the frightened females being exceeded by the terrified trumpeting of the tuskers. The piglike squeaking of the calves, bundling as fast as they could at their mother's heels added to the confusion. What was most amusing was that the big tuskers, whom one might expect to put up a rearguard action to protect the cows and babies, actually jostled them aside and vied with one another in showing a clean pair of heels. In a few moments, where there had been many elephants and much noise, there was nothing but a deep silence.

We reached our destination without further event at about five in the evening. Although it was a comparatively long time till sunset, the whole area was already in shade, for the sun had sunk behind the frowning ridge of the mountain chain. The actual peak of Ponachi

Malai towered to the northwest, a little over a mile away.

Bejahahai was like all jungle hamlets, and consisted of about a dozen huts clustered together. Most of them had walls of thorn and roofs of dried jungle grass, the thorns and the grass being kept together with spliced bamboos tied with lenghts of dried jungle vines. One or two of them, which were clearly 'better-class' buildings, had three foot walls of dried mud, plastered with cow dung, but with the same roofing of jungle grass. The cattle-pens which adjoined the rear of each hut had low walls of woven bamboo, topped by a stockade of thorns. The latter were necessary to keep out marauding panthers and tigers.

Our advent caused quite a stir. Two or three dozen men, wearing nothing but wisps of rag around their loins, bare-breasted women with tattered and torn sarees, and pot-bellied children, affected by enlarged spleens owing to the ever-present malarial mosquitoes, timidly stepped out of their huts or stood in the doorways to watch us suspiciously and rather fearfully. One or two of the men salaamed nervously.

We came to a stop in the centre of this group of hovels. Obviously, if I expected them to answer questions, the first thing to do was to set the inhabitants at ease. With that in view I judged that Byra would be the best person to speak. For one thing he was an aborigine himself, and these scared folk would understand him. I knew from experience that Ranga was rather haughty towards people whom he considered his social inferiors, and would call them by such disparaging names as 'jungle monkeys' and 'stupid apes'. If I spoke to them myself they would perhaps become even more nervous. Certainly they would not believe me.

I told Byra to introduce us. Never have I been so flattered as by his words. Byra said that I was a great hunter who had shot hundreds of tigers, elephants, panthers and similar insignificant creatures, and that hearing of the plight of the inhabitants of Bejahahai I had come many miles to deliver them. He said that an essential contribution from them would be all the information and help I could get. His speech was a bit long-winded, but I must say it accomplished its purpose. Smiles crept over some of the faces surrounding me. But anyway, the tension clearly eased.

I can speak Tamil and Hindustani, and understand some Kanarese. Most of my hearers were Tamil, although I could make out a few Sholagas who, like Byra, are aborigines and have inhabited the Coimbatore forests from time immemorial. So at this stage I took an active part in the proceedings by addressing the gathering in Tamil. As simply as I could, I told the people that my purpose was to rid them of the terrible menace that had come into their lives. I also told them I was confident of success. There was but one condition: that I should receive their unstinted and active co-operation. I said that I expected every able-bodied man in the village to assist me to the utmost. My simple speech appeared to have the desired effect. Villagers in India do not applaud by clapping their hands as do the people of the West. But they do something as good, if not infinitely better. They smile, even laugh in approval. The inhabitants of Bejahahai smiled widely that evening.

Having won their goodwill, I began questioning them about the tiger. I asked if any of them had seen him, if there was anything distinctive about his methods or appearance, if he had any particular or peculiar habits or any favourite locality in which he was likely to be found. Several of the simple folk replied that they had seen the man-eater, but from their generally contradictory answers it was soon evident that either there were many different-looking tigers about the place, or that the people were saying they had seen this beast just to please me.

As one might expect, the majority proclaimed that he was an animal of colossal dimensions, with a head about two feet in diameter and a body at least twelve feet long. One or two of the women who said they had glimpsed the marauder prowling near the outskirts of the hamlet were emphatic that this was a tigress and not a tiger. But in one respect they were all in close agreement: that it would be quite useless for me to attempt to shoot the man-eater. He, or she, was protected, they were confident, by a forest goddess that sat astride the neck and accompanied the animal on its hunting forays. Indeed, they were quite sure that the goddess led the man-eater directly to each unsuspecting victim.

While this harangue went on, I noticed that one man, who squatted on the ground slightly apart and never so much as opened his mouth, wore a rather cynical smile while the rest tried to outdo one another in their wild statements. He was a middle-aged fellow, clearly a Sholaga, and wore only the briefest of loin-cloths. Thinking he might not understand the Tamil I spoke, I asked Byra to question him.

But the man interrupted by saying: 'I can understand you, dorai, and I shall speak as soon as these liars around us have stopped talking.'

Those words had a silencing effect and the throng ceased jabbering at once. The Sholaga then began to speak and his words were as unusual as they were dramatic.

'For one thing, dorai,' he said, 'the man-eater is male and not female. I know this for certain, for just three days ago, when I had climbed up a tree to catch an oodumbu that was sheltering in it, he came out of the jungle and calmly squatted down at the foot of the tree, waiting for me to descend. I shouted at him and hurled twigs, but he only growled and glared up at me menacingly. I thought he would never go away, but towards midday, when the sun reached its zenith and the waves of heat danced above the ground, he became thirsty and suddenly walked off into the jungle. I thought it was a trick and that he would be hiding in the undergrowth, waiting for me to descend. So I remained in the tree for another two hours. Just as I was wondering what I should do, there was a great hubbub and a pack of about a dozen wild dogs chased a sambar stag into the clearing beneath my tree and tore him to bits in a few moments. Then they started feeding on the carcass. This I knew was my only chance. No tiger, not even a man-eater, will dare to show itself in the face of a pack of wild dogs. If I came down from the tree and made my escape the dogs would not harm me, while the chances were that the tiger had fled long ago.

'So I did that, dorai. The dogs stopped feeding, stood up, and looked at me inquiringly. But not one of them ran away. It was as if instinct told them I was unarmed and helpless and that they could kill me if they wanted. And while they were still looking at me I stole off and managed to return to the hamlet without harm, although I do admit I was terribly afraid, once I got away from the presence of the wild dogs which had actually been the means of saving my life, as I was sure the man-eater would have returned to the vicinity after slaking his thirst in one of the few remaining pools that are fast drying up in the streambed.

'Well, dorai, I saw the animal clearly. It is not such a big tiger as these people try to make out, but only of average size. But it has quite a long tail. I noticed that particularly, as it kept twitching it from side to side while glaring up at me. And that glance, dorai! I have never seen such diabolical hatred in the eyes of any living creature as I saw in the eyes of that tiger.'

'How is it that you did not return and tell the other villagers what you had seen?' I asked suspiciously.

The Sholaga remained silent for a while. Then he said: 'There is a reward for the death of this animal. I intended borrowing my uncle's muzzle-loading gun and trying to shoot it. My uncle is due back in this village the day after tomorrow. I wanted the reward, for I am a poor man. Nor would I have told you about the incident, but my stomach was turned at hearing the silly tales these villagers have been telling you.'

A murmer of anger and protest rippled through the throng, but the Sholaga continued. 'This tiger has no magic nor goddess to protect it, dorai. But it does have brains, much more brains than most of the people standing here. However, if the dorai is really in earnest and means to shoot it, I will help him. For I have brains, too; more brains than the tiger or these folk around us.'

And that was how I made the acquaintance of Lotta the Sholaga —outspoken and unusually arrogant and self-opinionated for a simple aborigine. But as I was to find out very soon, he knew his jungle and its inhabitants intimately, and he was a tremendously brave man, too. I told him I would welcome all the assistance he could give me, whereupon, in token of agreement, he came and stood at the side of the two henchmen I had brought along with me.

As there was little more information to be gained from the inhabitants of the hamlet, I led my three followers into the jungle for about a furlong, where we squatted on the ground to work out a plan of action. By the time all this talk was at an end another forty minutes had elapsed: it was exactly 5.40 p.m. It was too late to tie out live baits, an operation which includes the complex but very essential task of selecting the most likely places in which to tether them, and the erecting of machans in advance, if possible, at those same places, so as not to cause a disturbance later on, should a kill have been made.

Lotta told us that the tiger's pug-marks were frequently to be seen in the morning, leading across the dry sands of the Gulyatha Halla stream, and that these tracks were invariably found just south of a hillock about 500 feet high that rose sharply from the left-hand or northwestern bank of the stream, a little over a mile away, coming from the same direction as we had that very evening. In fact, the pathway we had followed to Bejahahai, after leaving the stream, had passed this same hillock on its northern side. He told us there was a small cave near the top of the hillock in which he believed the man-eater lay up during the day. Although the whole hillock was clearly visible from the bed of the stream five hundred feet below to the southeast, Lotta said the cave itself was hidden from view by a large intervening boulder. According to him, the lower two-thirds of the hillock were covered with jungle, but the higher slopes were comparatively bare, consisting of tumbled boulders, piled on top of each other. Therefore, anyone approaching the cave would be at a disadvantage. Not only would he be visible to the tiger from above, but however silently a man might climb he was bound to make some sort of noise in negotiating the rough terrain and in jumping from boulder to boulder, or in trying to pass between them.

We asked Lotta what made him think the tiger used the cave on the hillock as a shelter. He answered that, apart from the frequency of the tracks that crossed the riverbed and seemed to come from the hill and lead back to it, he had several times heard the langur monkey's cries of alarm on the hill, generally too. Also, about four nights ago, a tiger had called from somewhere on the hillside.

Byra pointed out that none of these happenings in themselves conclusively proved that the man-eater lived on the hill, but that all the facts put together, plus the presence of the concealed cave Lotta had mentioned, suggested it might be so. The only way of settling the question was to climb the hill and investigate the cave, if possible. So we determined that early next morning we would procure two live baits and tie one of them on the streambed to the southeast of the hillock, where the tracks appeared so often, and the other on the footpath along which we had just come, and which, as I have already told you, passed the hill on the northern side. In addition, just after midday, when the sun was at its hottest, I determined to climb the hill and try to find the cave. In doing so it was possible that I might stumble across additional evidence that the tiger lived there. There was also a slim chance that I might catch a glimpse of it—perhaps even be able to get in a shot.

Daylight was fading fast by the time all this was discussed and settled, and so we withdrew to Bejahahai to camp for the night. The problem of accommodation arose. I had brought no tent with me because of the extra weight to be carried on our long march. Besides, it was the last week of March, when not only is the weather very dry but growing uncomfortably hot. Dad and I generally camp under the trees at all times except monsoons. Lotta offered us the use of his hut. It would have been rude to refuse, but as I stood at the tiny, low entrance and looked into the small, dark and rather smelly interior without ventilation of any kind, I politely but firmly said that sleep would not come to me in such a warm and enclosed place, and that I would prefer to sleep outside. Now anyone who has tried to sleep in close proximity to any hamlet in southern India will at once agree with me that it is well-nigh impossible. Not only is the ground covered with refuse and filth of every description, but it is freely used as a latrine by the inhabitants after darkness has fallen. So to avoid the refuse we walked to an open spot about 150 yards away and decided to sleep there for the night. Lotta said he would stay with us, and I lay on the ground while my three followers gathered wood and soon had a fire burning merrily.

The first item on the programme was to brew some tea, and while the water was boiling I ate a little of the cold salt beef and chappatties I had brought from home. Then, as I sipped the hot tea, I listened to the tales my three friends had to tell me. And indeed I was happy. The starry sky above, as it began to pale with the glow from the rising moon, the flashes of fireflies against the sombre background of jungle trees, the towering and serrated outline of the Ponnachchi Betta mountain chain to the west, the homely flickering light of our camp-fire with its slumber-inviting warmth, and the wisps of smoke that curled and eddied and finally disappeared in the darkness—all contributed towards that happiness.

Ranga and Byra had been taught to read the time from a watch, so at eight o'clock I took off my wristwatch and handed it to Ranga, instructing him to remain awake and alert, and to feed the fire till ten-thirty. Then he was to awaken Byra whose guard-duty would extend till one. Then came my own turn, till three-thirty. Finally, I would hand over the responsibility to Lotta (who did not know how to read the time) till the dawn came at six.

I fell asleep immediately and awoke only when Byra gently shook me by the shoulder at one o'clock. I saw that the other two men were fast asleep and Byra soon joined them. The fire had died down to a few embers and there was not much wood left to keep it alive. Finally, despite the season, it became decidedly chilly. My watch passed uneventfully. An elephant trumpeted in the distance, and a sambar stag called three or four times closer by. But the calls were not of sufficient duration to indicate the passing of a carnivore. Perhaps something smaller had frightened him, for the stag soon got over his fear and fell quiet. I began to feel sleepy again and was glad when my watch showed three-thirty. I awoke Lotta, whispered to him to husband the few remaining sticks so as to keep the embers alight till dawn, and fell asleep once more.

It was past six-thirty when I awoke to find my three assistants busy with a large fire they had built, on top of which I was glad to see the kettle boiling for tea. Then we set to work in real earnest. By dint of much bargaining, I managed to hire two brown bulls for ten rupees apiece. The man who hired them made it plain that he could not sell the animals outright, since he was not their owner. The true owner lived in a faraway village and had entrusted him with some thirty-five head of cattle for grazing over a period of six months. His salary for this was three rupees a month (4s. 6d.) plus as much milk as he might want to drink. No wonder he was tempted to hire them to me for a few nights for twenty rupees, which represented almost seven months pay. But he made it clear that if either of the animals was killed I would have to pay a hundred rupees in compensation. In addition, nobody should be told he had lent the animals for bait. He would tell the owner that the bull had been killed by a tiger while grazing. No doubt the owner would fine him by stopping two or three months' pay, but as he had received a hundred rupees from me, he would make a profit of at least ninety rupees. Such is the simple logic of an otherwise honest jungle-man.

We retraced our steps along the path by which we had reached Bejahahai the previous evening, and after covering a little over a mile found ourselves just to the north of the hillock Lotta had described.

Just as he had said, more than half of the lower portion was jungle-clad, but beyond that the hill was bare of vegetation except for a few thorny bushes between the piles of boulders.

A tamarind tree beside the track provided an ideal site for the first machan, to be tied some fifteen feet above the ground, which is about the ideal height. We tethered one of the bulls by a foreleg to a stake driven into the ground in the middle of the path; then my companions set to work on making a machan. As all three of them were well skilled in jungle-craft, I did not have to tell them what to do. Indeed, the completed structure, which took about seventy-five minutes to erect, was a work of art and so well camouflaged that it was barely visible even from a distance of thirty feet.

From the tamarind tree we followed Lotta along a short cut through the jungle and reached the stream (Gulyatha Halla) within half a mile. Turning up-stream for another quarter mile, we found ourselves due southeast of the hillock and at the place which Lotta had described the evening before. His story needed no corroboration, for within a few minutes Ranga found a fresh set of tiger pug-marks leading across the sands of the tributary. Clearly the tiger that had made them the night before had descended from the hillock. A few yards away a half-grown plumfig tree provided another suitable place for the second machan to be tied. An hour and a half later this had been done, and we tethered the second bull to a stake driven into the bank of the stream just below the tree.

It was now past noon and the next step in our campaign was for me to climb the hillock and try to locate the cave. As far as the two live baits were concerned, there was nothing more to be done except to hope that the tiger would kill and eat one or other of them during the coming night—or the night after that.

Quite a sharp argument arose among my three retainers as to which one of them should accompany me, each of the three insisting that it was his particular duty. Ranga was very emphatic, claiming he had carried me when I was two months old and so had known me longest. Byra was equally insistent, saying that when it came to 'smelling' a tiger at close quarters, he was the most competent, and that therefore he would be of the most use to me. Lotta, although only recruited the day before, claimed that clearly he was the most eligible as he alone knew the position of the cave.

Obviously the man to take with me was Lotta, for his claim was the most justifiable. But here a tricky situation arose. The complexities of the eastern mind are somewhat difficult to fathom at times, and I well knew that, if I chose the new man to come with me, I would deeply wound the feelings, pride and affections of my two old henchmen. And to select either one of them in preference to the other, would cause even deeper hurt to the one left behind. So I made up my mind quickly. There was nothing for it but to go alone.

I announced my decision as nonchalantly as possible and asked Lotta to indicate, from where we stood, the approximate position of the hidden cave. A renewed outburst was the result, all three proclaiming that such an undertaking was extremely dangerous. In fact, realizing my embarrassing position in having to choose between them, all three volunteered to step down to allow me to choose between the other two. But this did not make matters any easier. I still had to pick on one of the three to the detriment of the remaining two. Besides, having said I intended to climb the hill alone, to change my mind now would show that I was afraid. So I said very firmly that I had made my decision: I would go alone.

Rather sheepishly Lotta pointed out a boulder standing a few yards from the summit of the hillock, and told me that the entrance to the cave lay right behind it. He suggested that, rather than approach the cave from directly below, I would do well to climb the hill at an angle till I reached the top, and then creep along the summit till I could overlook the cave, which I ought to have no difficulty in finding if I kept the boulder as a marker.

With these instructions in mind I said no more, but crossed the stream to the opposite bank and began the ascent. The jungle that clothed the lower two-thirds of the hill effectively shielded my approach if the tiger happened to be lying near the entrance to the cave. By the same token, it hid the tiger in case he happened to be lying in the undergrowth, waiting for me to come near enough to spring upon me.

I went forward very warily, intently scanning every thicket and bush ahead. Of necessity my progress in this fashion was rather slow, so that it was some time before I saw that the undergrowth was becoming perceptibly thinner as I approached the higher part of the hill where the boulders predominated. But at last I reached it, only to find that I was now considerably worse off than when negotiating the jungle-clad area. I was clearly visible to any watcher from above. The tiger could creep down upon me, and merely by lying in wait behind one of the boulders he could pounce upon me as I drew abreast; or he could wait for me to pass and then attack from the rear. But having committed myself to the task, there was nothing for it but to go on.

Some of the boulders were quite large, being ten feet high or more. Others were small, about three feet high. In many cases it was difficult to pass between or around the smaller ones as they were jumbled together. Often I had to climb on to one and jump from it to the next. That made me very conspicuous from above. Besides, I was bound to make some noise in my movements, in spite of my rubbersoled boots and the infinite caution I exercised. At this stage I regretted my foolhardiness and began to wish that I had brought one of my companions with me.

However, my luck held out and at last I stood on top of the hillock, almost at its right end. I had now to creep along the summit towards the other end till I came in sight of the boulder that hid the entrance to the cave. This I did, standing on tiptoe from time to time to see if I could see the boulder. But a fresh difficulty arose. From my position I could only see the top of each boulder and not its base, which was hidden from my view by the curvature of the hillside. And there were so many boulders that I had no means of identifying the one that Lotta had indicated. In this dilemma I still advanced, when quite unexpectedly the problem was solved for me.

Suddenly a large grey shape shot out from behind a rock just in front of me and bounded away. Startled out of my wits and thinking it was the tiger, I had raised my .470 to my shoulder. Then I saw that it was a solitary langur monkey. He leapt from rock to rock towards the other end of the hill and in a few moments had disappeared from view. The langur's presence seemed very reassuring. Had a tiger been in the vicinity, I knew quite well that the monkey would not have been there. More rapidly, and with less caution, I advanced towards the place where the langur had vanished.

Then a strange thing happened. The langur gave a cry of alarm; 'Har! Har! Haar!' The next instant he reappeared and came bounding back. In a series of prodigious leaps from rock to rock, he dashed past and was lost to sight behind me.

Now why had the langur called in alarm? Why had he dashed back so wildly, almost on top of me?

More cautiously I approached the spot where the monkey had reappeared. As I drew nearer to the end of the hill and could look over the edge, I caught sight of the upper half of a boulder. It came more into view as I advanced, till soon I could see it wholly, and then I knew it was the boulder that Lotta had indicated from the streambed. I was standing at that moment above the cave itself. The realization came to me in a flash. The langur had cried out and bounded back because he had probably seen the tiger lying at the entrance of the cave, or had come to realize the proximity of his age-old foe. The question that now arose was whether the tiger was outside or inside the cave, and the only way to find an answer was to go still closer.

So I crept forward, inch by inch, till I came to the edge of the hill and the land fell away sharply before my feet. Dropping to my hands and knees and craning forwards, I was at last able to see the entrance to the cave—a narrow opening in the rock, which I judged to be about five feet high and perhaps a yard wide. No tiger was to be seen. I pondered what I should do next. I was tempted to call out or to throw down a pebble, in order to make the tiger charge out and so show himself. But I curbed myself in time. The tiger might not be at home. Moreover, stone-throwing would needlessly frighten him. He might come out from a second cave connected with the first, of which Lotta knew nothing, and then just run away to some other part of the forest, where the job of coming to grips with him would have to be started all over again. All said and done the wisest course seemed to be not to give myself away or to frighten him, but to withdraw quietly and let events—in the form of his taking one or other of the two baits—take their own course.

So, as silently as I had come, and glancing back every now and again against a surprise attack from the rear, I retraced my footsteps to the point where I had first reached the summit of the hillock, and continued down the further side till, eventually, I stood among my followers on the bed of the stream. We remained in camp that evening so as not to disturb the jungle unnecessarily and made a point of going to sleep early, although we continued to keep watch, one at a time, just as we had done the previous night. This time we took the precaution of gathering in advance a large pile of brushwood, among which were some quite big logs, so that the question of having to husband our stock should not be repeated.

Dawn found us on the way to examine our first bait— the bull we had tied on the pathway leading to the hamlet. He was well and unharmed. Nor were any pug-marks to be seen along the track. We followed the same short cut to the stream and our second bait. But that animal was also alive, but with this difference: casting around, we found that the tiger had seen him. He had come as close as fifteen yards, squatted on the streambed and closely scrutinized the animal, no doubt wondering whether he should kill it or not. And then, for some unaccountable reason, he had just walked away. His pug-marks on the soft river sand told us the story as clearly as if we had been watching him.

With nothing to do, we returned to the hamlet to find that Lotta's uncle had turned up on schedule, bringing his matchlock with him. The presence of the gun (not of the uncle) urged Lotta into action. He put before me an idea which had his definite recommendation. Rather than spend a third night in camp, doing nothing, he strongly advocated I should beg, borrow or steal two more cattle for bait and tie them at the two remaining sides of the hill which were roughly to its east and west, and that I should sit over one of them, while he did the same with his uncle's matchlock over the fourth bait. He reasoned that, as the tiger had closely approached but not taken one of the first two baits, having clearly become suspicious, it was very likely he might do the same with baits numbers three and four if he came upon them after descending from the cave on the hillock. So Lotta suggested that I should sit over the live bait to the west, while he sat over the bait to the east. Then either of us might find a chance of shooting the tiger while he was examining the bait. Of course, if the tiger happened to kill either of these two new baits it would be all the better for us in ensuring an easy shot.

By nature I am a restless person and the idea of remaining inactive day and night while waiting in the hope that the tiger would take one of the first two baits did not appeal to me at all. Several times I had toyed with the idea of trying to flush him out of his cave, but Byra and Ranga had cautioned me against the plan in case we succeeded only in frightening the tiger away. Under these circumstances I welcomed any plan that savoured of action and immediately fell in with Lotta's idea. Entrusting him with the task of procuring two more bulls, and that quickly, I began to prepare a hasty lunch out of some of the tinned provisions I had brought with me.

Lotta succeeded more quickly than I expected and by noon turned up with a half-grown black bull and a buffalo heifer. The four of us soon set forth with Ranga and Byra carrying my greatcoat, water-bottle, sandwiches and an empty beer bottle filled with tea. There was also my torch equipment, which could be fastened to my rifle with two clamps. Lotta brought up the rear, driving the bull and the heifer.

I admit I acted rather selfishly in choosing the eastern side of the hillock in preference to the western, as suggested by Lotta, as I had reasoned the tiger was more likely to approach in this direction, since it overlooked the stream. I also selected the buffalo heifer in preference to the black bull as tigers are sometimes rather shy of a fully black animal. Secondly, having refused one of the baits last night —a bull—I hoped the tiger would not refuse a young buffalo.

Next came the task of finding a suitable place in which to sit, and this presented some difficulty as the jungle growth on the lower two-thirds of the hill consisted mainly of bushes, grass and trees that were neither high enough nor strong enough to bear my weight in a machan. I was soon forced to face the fact that there was no suitable spot whatever on this part of the hill, unless I was prepared to sit on the ground in a bush, which would be very hazardous.

The idea then came to me to climb a little higher, among the rocks that were piled in profusion on the upper slopes. We did so, and in a little while came across a formation that seemed to suit my purpose admirably. Two boulders, each over twelve feet high, touched a third wedged in between them and a little higher than the first two being about fifteen feet high. The three rocks were at an angle to one another of slightly less than ninety degrees. The space in front was open and overlooked the hillside and the Gulyatha Halla rivulet below. If I sat at the base of the centre and highest of the three rocks, after getting my retainers to cut thorns and wedge them firmly into the spaces between the bases of the three rocks, I would be quite safe against attack from the rear. To get at me the tiger would have to jump on to one or other of the three rocks, which he could easily do, but even then I would not be directly visible to him owing to the curvature of the boulders. He would have to leap down into the amphitheatre in the centre first, and then turn to find and attack me, which would leave me time enough for a shot.

The only other way in which he could get at me would be to come around from the exposed area in front, where I intended to tether my buffalo heifer, at a spot about fifteen yards away. I reasoned that, even if the tiger discovered my presence and had brains enough to sneak around the outer edge of the rocks, he would find the heifer confronting him, which would be a definite deterrent. He might make up his mind to kill it; he might walk around to inspect it; but its presence would definitely confuse him and confuse his original plan of attack. Lastly, the buffalo would be visible to the tiger from the top of the hill and would serve to attract him. Of course, if he tried to creep through one or other of the spaces between the rocks, he would need to clear away the thorns and the noise would afford me ample warning.

I was therefore very pleased at my good fortune in finding such an excellent and comparatively safe hiding-place. I explained my plan to my three companions, who unanimously agreed that it was a really good one. While I sat at the entrance keeping guard over them with my rifle, they scurried a short way down the hill and came back carrying quantities of cut thorns, which they proceeded to wedge tightly into gaps at the base of the boulders. Finally they tethered the heifer by its forefoot to a stake they hammered into the earth at a spot exactly twenty paces from where I was going to sit.

It now remained to find a suitable place on the other side of the hill for Lotta to hide in with his uncle's ancient matchlock. I wanted to help in this and so, rather than walk directly across the hill from where we stood, or climb over its crest as a short cut, when in either case the tiger might see or hear us and take alarm, we descended to the base of the hill in single file and made a detour, walking along the streambed for a short distance and then through the intervening jungle, led by Lotta, before climbing the hillock again on the opposite face.

The conditions here were exactly the same as on the eastern side. There was no tree big enough for a machan on the lower slopes and so we climbed higher, into the zone of the rocks and boulders. It was too much to expect to find such an ideal 'hide' as the one I had secured, and after clambering over and stumbling in between the heaped rocks, Lotta finally selected an almost flat slab of rock that was slightly higher on the end that raced the summit or the hillock. He said that this was all to the good, and that he would lie prone on top of the rock and tie the black bull in front of the higher end, from where it would be in uninterrupted view of the tiger, whose cave was around the corner or shoulder of the hill, out of sight of the flat rock and considerably higher up.

It was now about 4 p.m. and too late for us to go back to camp. The upper surface of the flat rock, being to the west of the hillock and directly exposed to the rays of the afternoon sun had become far too hot for Lotta to take up his position immediately. So we all helped in tethering the black bull, and then left Lotta with his matchlock sheltering in the shade on the lee side of his rock. He said he would climb up at about five-thirty, as soon as the rock had cooled.

Once more Ranga, Byra and I slithered down the hill, detoured through the jungle and down the bed of the stream, and came to the place where I would have to start climbing to regain the three rocks where I was going to sit. Here I parted company with my two servants, after giving them strict instructions that they should return to the hamlet and remain there till morning, when I would come back to them.

It was a few minutes after five when I got back to my hiding-place. The heifer, quite undisturbed, was resting on the ground, half asleep. The sun had already sunk below the crest of the hillock to the west, so that it was comparatively cool at the foot of the rocks and entirely in the shade, particularly as I was sitting to the east of them and had the rocks between me and the ridge of the hill over which, as I have just said, the sun had already set. There being no jungle in the immediate vicinity, hardly any sounds reached me other than the distant twittering of the hundreds of bulbuls that fed on the clusters of blue-black lantana berries at the foot of the hill. Lower yet was the belt of greenery which denoted the tamarind, muthee and jumlum trees bordering the stream. From that direction I heard the occasional cries of jungle fowl and spurfowl as the cock-birds sent out their evening challenges to their rivals before settling down for the night.

It grew quite dark soon after six o'clock, although I could still see the trees that grew along both banks of the stream far below me, the scrub jungle in the middle distance, and the heifer only twenty yards away. I remember comparing the scene to a picture on a cinema-screen, where the spectator in the audience sits in darkness while the screen is illuminated. But very soon that picture faded, too; and then all around me was a dense, heavy blackness, relieved only by the few stars that twinkled directly overhead. The rocks around me seemed to shut me in from the usual and pleasant sounds of the jungle.

Then, just as my watch showed ten minutes past eight, the silence was rudely shattered by a sudden, distant, wailing scream, followed in a second or two by the deep boom of a muzzle-loading gun. Then there was complete silence till, in another half minute, a distant sambar doe, somewhere in the valley below, as startled by the sounds as I had been, began to utter her resonant cry of alarm, that echoed and re-echoed down and across the dells and the jungle-clad aisles of the forest, to fade into nothingness in the mountain fastnesses.

I sprang to my feet. Without doubt something terrible had happened to poor Lotta. The weird cry I had heard, although it had sounded inhuman, could only have come from his lips. The report of a muzzle-loader, quite distinct to experienced ears from that of a rifle or breech-loading gun, could only have emanated from the ancient musket he was carrying. The fact that the scream had come first indicated that Lotta had either been attacked or severely frightened and then had fired in self-defence. But Lotta was not the sort of man to be easily frightened.

It was doubtful whether Ranga and Byra, back at the hamlet over a mile away, would have heard the musket-shot, particularly as it came from the other side of the hill. They would certainly not have heard the scream. And I had emphatically instructed them not to leave the village. So there was but one thing to do—and at once. I would have to go to Lotta myself, and see what aid I could give him.

With the help of the torch that was clamped to my rifle I stumbled downhill through the scrub jungle to the bed of the stream, up which I ran for a short distance. I did not know the short cut leading across the belt of jungle to the spot at the foot of the hillock from where we had started climbing to reach the flat rock, for it was the Sholaga himself who had led us along that path. So I followed the only alternative, which was to cut across from the stream to the foot of the hillock towards the west, and start climbing in a half-left direction that would, sooner or later, bring me within hearing-distance of the injured man, who would answer me if he was still alive.

I felt myself trembling with excitement and nervousness as I forced myself to climb upwards through the scrub belt, flashing the beam of the torch from side to side in fear that the man-eater might ambush me at any moment. Finally the scrub peterred out and those awful rocks began. I could see the top of the hillock outlined against the starry sky and, keeping this to my half-right, I pressed forward as best I could in that difficult terrain. In a few moments, judging that I was within earshot of Lotta, I began to call his name as loudly as I could, conscious as I did so that I might succeed in accomplishing one of two things—either in driving the man-eater away or in attracting him to me.

For quite a long while there was no answer to my calls. Then I heard a feeble groan. I stopped walking to catch the direction from which the sound had come, and shouted again: 'Lotta, where are you? Answer me, and I will come to you.'

I heard a subdued moan, followed in a few seconds by a faint cry, ' Dorai , I am here. I can see your light. You are going too high up the hill. Walk forward, but come a little lower.'

The voice had seemed to come from very far away, but I stumbled on Lotta within a hundred yards. He had fallen to the base of the rock on which he had been lying, but had managed to cling to his matchlock, although he could not reload it. The Sholaga had been badly clawed down his back, buttocks and thighs. Very fortunately he had not been bitten.

In a whisper he told me that the tiger had evidently seen him from somewhere on top of the hill and had worked around to the rear, while he had been lying on the sloping rock facing uphill, where we had tied the black bull. Without warning it had sprung on to the rock from behind and then had jumped on to his back and begun to claw him. Unable to turn around or point his weapon, he had just pressed his finger on the trigger. The roar of the explosion, and no doubt the flame and smoke from the black powder, had evidently frightened the beast, for it had sprung away, knocking him off the rock in doing so. Lotta had been lying at the foot of the boulder, expecting the man-eater to return at any moment, when he had seen the light from my torch and heard me calling his name. Had he fallen to the left of the rock instead of to its right, it would have come between him and me, and he would never have been able to see my light.

A closer examination by torchlight revealed that, although severely and deeply clawed, and bleeding profusely, no very serious or dangerous wound had been inflicted. The man was obviously suffering from severe shock and was in great pain, but there was no trace of a bite.

I pointed out to him that we would have to get back to the hamlet somehow, as no help would reach us till morning. At first Lotta said he could not stand, but as the effects of shock wore off I drew him to his feet; after abandoning his matchlock, which he was loth at first to do, he clung to my neck with both hands. I supported him with my left arm while I held my rifle, with the torch still alight, in my right hand. In this manner we began a nightmare journey down the hill.

With difficulty, and only after a long time, we reached the streambed, where Lotta collapsed with exhaustion. From there I carried him on my shoulders, fireman's lift fashion, and by the time we got back to the hamlet I was dead beat, while the cells of my torch, that had been burning for so long, had grown very dim.

We awoke the inhabitants and all became a bustle of excitement as hot water was prepared. I then washed the Sholaga's wounds as best I could and poured on to them raw crystals of potassium permanganate, followed by iodine. It was crude treatment, I knew, and he groaned with pain. Finally, I injected the contents of two phials of penicillin procaine, which totalled eight lakh units, into his buttocks. Dad and I always make a point of carrying a hypodermic syringe, penicillin, iodine, a sharp knife, bandages, cottonwool and other items of first aid on our shikar trips, to meet such emergencies.

It was past 3 a.m. when I told the headman of the hamlet that he would have to press eight able-bodied men into service early next morning to carry Lotta on a charpoy to the Cauvery river and, after crossing by ferry, on the Ootaimalai, from where I would take him in my car to the hospital at Pennagram.

I was falling asleep from sheer exhaustion when Byra came to me with a dramatic idea. 'Dorai,' he said, 'let us make a last attempt to kill this tiger. After being frightened by the explosion from the muzzle-loader it has probably gone back to its cave and is hiding there. You go to sleep now. I will call you when the junglecocks begin to crow. We will go back to the stream and climb the hill as day breaks. You creep along the top till you reach the point at which the langur sprang back, overlooking the entrance to the cave. After allowing you sufficient time to get into position, I will come along the hill from one side and momentarily show myself before the cave. The tiger, provided it is inside, will probably growl first before he attacks, which he will then do by charging out. I will step back and hide flat against the rock so as not to get in the way. You shoot him through the back from above, with both barrels of your rifle. I have spoken.'

'Nonsense,' I began remonstrating, when Byra broke in: 'Go to sleep now quickly, dorai; you have hardly two hours in which to take some rest.'

And I was so tired that I fell asleep before I could argue.

Promptly at five Byra awoke me, and true to his promise I could hear the junglecocks crowing, although it was quite dark outside. Still undecided as to whether I was being wise or foolish, I followed him. The torch gave out long before we reached the bed of the stream. Believe it or not, although I had been most careful to check all the equipment I had brought with me from Bangalore, this most important item— extra torch batteries—had been overlooked. But I had the utmost confidence in my old jungle friend, Byra, and so I kept behind him as we groped through the heavy belt of trees and eventually found ourselves on the dry sands of the stream. Here we sat for another half-an-hour, till dawn began to break. Then I removed the torch and the clamps from the barrel of my rifle, as these would now be a needless impediment, rechecked the rounds in the two barrels of my .470, and began to follow Byra up the hill.

When we had almost reached the top, he took me by the arm and whispered: 'You go on from here, dorai. Make no sound whatever. Creep along till you reach the summit. Then turn to your left and continue until you are directly above the cave. Lie down there and be ready with your finger on the trigger. I will give you plenty of time before I show myself. When you shoot, fire both barrels to make sure.'

Then, without another word he disappeared behind a boulder. With many misgivings I did as the little old man had told me. To reach the top of the hill and work my way along the ridge to the left was easy enough. But to recollect the very spot to which I had followed the langur monkey was a very different matter. Thrice I misjudged the place and, looking down from above, saw no cave. Then I remembered the rather tapering boulder that served to hide the cave-entrance from sight when standing on the streambed. At last I spotted it, and keeping it in view as a marker, soon recognized the exact place from which I had overlooked the mouth of the cave after the langur monkey had rushed back. Once more the cave was directly below me.

Now another thought began to worry me. Had Byra given me enough time to allow for the three mistakes I had made in finding the place? I had heard no sound, so nothing could have happened. Silently I lay down on the bare rock above, so that the muzzle of my rifle overhung the narrow entrance to the cave. And there I waited and waited. But still Byra did not appear.

Then abruptly, before ever I was aware of his proximity, the little man came into view from below and to the left of me. Calmly but gingerly, so as to make no sound before the right moment had come, he walked towards the narrow cave-mouth, stood before it, kicked a loose stone with his foot, and cleared his throat. Like lightning, after that, he nipped back the way he had come and disappeared from my view behind a ledge to the left.

Events followed quickly. The ground on which I lay seemed to rumble as if with an approaching earthquake as the tiger growled within the cave below me. Then he roared loudly, and the next second had dashed into view from out of the very bowels of the earth.

As the man-eater hesitated for a moment, not knowing where the man who had so impertinently disturbed his privacy had gone, my first shot took him behind the neck. He somersaulted and fell on his back, the white of his belly turned towards me—all four legs threshing the air wildly. My second shot went through his chest.

He had hardly stopped twitching when Byra reappeared around the corner, and with hands on hips smiled up at me broadly, the smile of one whose plan of campaign has worked out to perfection. In great excitement, I slid down the rock from above, arriving in a most undignified manner, all of a heap, at Byra's feet and uncomfortably close to the tiger which we were both not quite certain was really dead. There we waited for about five minutes. Then Byra threw a stone that glanced off the animal without bringing any response. That told us what we wanted to know; the tiger was dead.

And now the moment for unlocking the secret which had puzzled Dad and me and a host of others for practically five years. Why had this tiger formed the habit of scratching and clawing, rather than biting, its human victims when it first attacked them?

The mystery was solved at last when we examined the dead animal. The whole of its nose had been blown away by an old gunshot wound, probably caused by a .12 shot-gun or perhaps a muzzle-loader, which had also shattered the bone at the bridge, extending from the nostrils to between the eyes. What must have been a ghastly and extremely painful injury had healed marvellously, but the tiger had doubtless never forgotten to associate that terrible wound with the human race, and so had taken great care to keep the organ out of the way and safe from possible harm every time he attacked a man. This could be the only explanation, as such cattle as had been killed by this tiger had been done to death in the normal manner, with teeth as well as his claws. Besides, he had eaten normally. The wound, as I could see, had healed perfectly. Therefore it was very unlikely that he still suffered pain in the act of biting. Assuredly, but for this injury, he would have remained like any normal tiger, quite harmless to the human race.

In great exultation we hurried back to the hamlet and told the good news. Lotta was loud in his congratulations. Every man, woman and child of Bejahahai turned out and climbed the hill to see the dead man-eater for themselves.

It was a joyful procession that walked back to Ootaimalai a little later, with Lotta on a charpoy carried by eight men, and the skin of the tiger, rolled in a bundle, on Byra's head. Although the jolting must have caused the Sholaga considerable pain he never complained or murmured once, but was garrulous in his praise of me as the slayer of the tiger, and of the little old poojaree, Byra, whose jungle cunning had brought about its end and whose fearlessness had flushed the man-eater from its den.

I felt guilty for having delayed the medical attention that would otherwise have been rendered Lotta earlier by my action in going back for the tiger. But I am glad to say he made a quick and easy recovery. Nothing Byra did could have raised him higher in my estimation. My admiration for him was at its peak. Old Ranga was a bit crestfallen that his competitor had managed to steal a march over him on this occasion. But the two of them, joined now by Lotta, are always awaiting us as faithful friends, companions and assistants, ready to serve Dad and myself at any time.

The Kenneth Anderson Omnibus

Brought together for the first time, three of Kenneth Anderson's most-loved books.

TALES FROM THE INDIAN JUNGLE

Ace hunter and wildlife chronicler Anderson recalls real-life jungle tales, some macabre and some incredible, of adventures in pursuit of man-eating tigers and leopards.
He writes about the danger and excitement generated by the clash of the world of human beings and the world of animals.

MAN-EATERS AND JUNGLE KILLERS

Called upon to rid a locality of prowling man-eaters, Anderson the hunter rises to the occasion. Step by step he takes the reader through his adventure, explaining his modus operandi and the terrible excitement and lurking danger he experiences. Stirring tales of cunning wild animals pitted against human wit and presence of mind, told by the ace hunter and master storyteller himself.

THE CALL OF THE MAN-EATER

Anderson's love-hate relationship with panthers and tigers, who terrorized villagers and were eventually hunted down by the author in hair-raising encounters, is legendary.
In this book, the jungle is crowded with a hyena, a jackal, a bear, a barking deer and even a few snakes that the hunter-writer tamed and kept as pets. A thrilling read.

Introduction

THE FIRST FIVE CHAPTERS OF THIS BOOK ARE DEVOTED TO PANTHERS. Perhaps you may wonder why I have concentrated on panthers and not written of the other animals of the jungle too. Well, for one reason, panthers are still very common in India. Secondly, they are comparatively easy to find, inasmuch as to this day they are met within a few miles of some of the big towns. For a third reason, hunting panthers is fairly inexpensive and well within the reach of the average person's pocket. A panther will come for such bait as a dog, a goat or a donkey; whereas a tiger must be attracted by a buffalo or a bull, which costs much more.

In return, shooting panthers by the sporting method of sitting on the ground instead of in the safety of a tree machan offers quite as great a thrill as tiger hunting.

I have also written a chapter about tigers and other animals, and something more about snakes. Why I have included snakes is because, although a great deal has been written and is known about tigers, elephants, lions and big animals in various parts of the world, not much has been written about snakes, and most people know very little regarding them, except that in general they should be avoided. I hope I am able to throw some light upon these equally interesting creatures. Nor must the reader think for a moment that tigers, panthers, bears and elephants are the most dangerous creatures to be encountered in an Indian jungle. Far quicker, far less visible, and far more potent is the poisonous snake that lurks in a bush or in the grass.

I have also told the story of a very gallant bison and two adventures with tigers. These last two will give you an idea of the many difficulties, hardships and disappointments involved in trying to shoot a man-eating tiger. In one case I failed completely; in the other I succeeded, but only by pure chance. I have closed with a brief account of a tiger that behaved very strangely. He is alive as I write this—and he is still an engima.

As I record these adventures, the sights and sounds of the present fade way and memories come rushing in. The blackness of the forest night with the star-filled sky above and the twinkling gems of the jungle carpet below, the myriads of fireflies that glitter together like elfin lamps amidst the dark foliage; and those other, brighter, living lights, the glowing eyes of a tiger, panther or bison, and the green eyes of graceful deer tripping daintily through the undergrowth, reflecting the beams of my torch as I walk beneath the whispering trees.

Come with me for the few hours it may take you to read this book into the domain of the tiger, the panther and the elephant, amidst the stupendous swaying heights and deep shade of the giant trees whose boles form the structure of this marvellous edifice. Forget the false values and ideas of what is called civilization, those imposed rules on the free and simple truths of life. Here in the jungle you will find truth, you will find peace, bliss and happiness; you will find life itself. There is no room, no time at all, for hypocrisy, for make-believe, for that which is artificial and false. You are face to face with the primitive, with that which is real, with that which is most wonderful —which is God.

If I can succeed in spiriting you away for a few moments from all that is mundane in your life, into the marvels of a tropical jungle and its excitements, where your life depends on your senses, your wits, your skill, and in the end on Providence, as you creep on the blood-trail of a wounded man-eater through dense verdure or among piled boulders, then I shall feel myself amply rewarded.

One

A Panther's Way

EVERY PANTHER DIFFERS FROM ANY OTHER PANTHER. SOME PANTHERS are very bold; others are very timid. Some are cunning to the degree of being uncanny; others appear quite foolish. I have met panthers that seemed almost to possess a sixth sense, and acted and behaved as if they could read and anticipate one's very thought. Lastly, but quite rarely, comes the panther that attacks people, and more rarely still, the one that eats them.

A man-eating beast is generally the outcome of some extraordinary circumstance. Maybe someone has wounded it, and it is unable henceforth to hunt its natural prey—other animals—easily. Therefore, through necessity it begins to eat humans, because they offer an easy prey. Or perhaps a panther has eaten a dead human body which was originally buried in a too-shallow grave and later dug up by jackals or a bear. Once having tasted human flesh, the panther often takes a liking to it. Lastly, but very rarely indeed, it may have been the cub of a man-eating mother, who taught it the habit.

Generally a panther is an inoffensive and quite harmless animal that is fearful of human beings and vanishes silently into the undergrowth at the sight or sound of them. When wounded, some show an extraordinary degree of ferocity and bravery. Others again are most cowardly and allow themselves to be followed up, or even chased like curs.

If from a hill-top you could watch a panther stalking his prey, he would offer a most entertaining spectacle. You would see him taking advantage of every bush, of every tree-trunk, and of every stone behind which to take cover. He can flatten himself to the ground in an amazing fashion. His colouration renders him invisible, unless you have the keenest eyesight. I once watched one through a pair of binoculars and was amazed at the really wonderful sense of woodcraft the panther had. Then comes the final rush. In a couple of bounds, and with lightning speed, he reaches his prey.

With unerring aim, he seizes the throat with his powerful fangs from above and behind, so that when the animal falls to earth the panther may be on the side opposite and away from its threshing hooves, which might otherwise cause serious injury. The prey is forced to the ground and that vice-like grip never relaxes till the animal is dead. Even then, the panther retains his vicious hold while sucking the lifeblood of his victim through the deep punctures he has made in its throat.

Imagine, then, the stillness of the jungle and the stealthy coming of the panther as he approaches his kill or stalks the live bait that has been tied out for him. If you want to hunt the panther, watch very carefully: try to penetrate every bush, look into every clump of grass, be careful when you pass a rock or a boulder, gaze into hollows and ravines. For the panther may be behind any of these, or be lying in some hole in the ground. Not only your success, but even your life will depend upon your care, for you have pitted your wits against perhaps the most adept of jungle dwellers and a very dangerous killer.

One of the most difficult and exciting pastimes is to try to hunt the panther on his own terms. This is known as 'still-hunting'.

To still-hunt successfully, you must have a keen sense of the jungle, a soft tread, and an almost panther-like mind; for you are going to try to circumvent this very cunning animal at his own game. You are about to hunt him on your own feet—and remember, he is the most skilful of hunters himself.

The first thing to know is the time of the day he comes out to search for his prey. He is generally a nocturnal animal, and stalks the forest at night. You, being human, cannot see in the dark unless you are aided by a torchlight. But that would not be still-hunting. The next best time would be the late evening just before it grows dark. Then there is a chance of meeting an early panther. It is useless to go out during the day, for at that time he is resting. Besides, he does not like the hot sun.

Secondly, where are, generally speaking, the best places in which to look for him? To answer this, you should know the answer to the next question—on what does a panther normally prey in the jungle? The reply to that question is not going to be very helpful, for a panther will eat anything that is alive, provided it is not too large to be tackled. Jungle fowl, peafowl, rabbits, monkeys, wild pigs, and any of the deer family, excepting the very large stags. Near villages, domestic pigs, dogs, goats, sheep, donkeys and average-sized cattle are his staple diet. Even a stray village cat will fill the bill, provided it is foolish enough to stray too far from the huts.

Let us suppose for the moment that we are in a jungle where the panther hunts his natural food. How does the panther go about his hunting? Remember, he has marvellous sight and acute hearing, but hardly any sense of smell. What would you do, if you were in the panther's place?

Obviously, one of two things. You would either move around silently in localities where the food is to be found, or you would hide yourself near some spot where your food is likely to come. The panther does just that.

He moves about stealthily, on padded feet, in places where he thinks the birds and animals he is seeking are likely to be, or he lies in wait for them near some water hole or salt lick that they generally visit.

If he is stalking and wants to be silent, he cannot always move in the undergrowth, or among dead leaves, for they will crackle or rustle. So he walks stealthily along footpaths, game-trails, a forest fire-line, or in the shelter of the banks of a nullah or a stream. Alternatively, he hides at the approaches to water, or a salt lick, where he can pounce upon his quarry as it passes by. It is in such places that you must look for him.

Further, movement on your part will attract his attention. Therefore, take a walk around the jungle in the daytime and see if you can discover pug-marks—not just a stray set of pugs, but a series of marks, old and new. When you have found them, you will know you have hit upon a well-used panther trail. Try to select a point where two or more such trails meet or cross, or a spot where such a trail or a fire-line crosses a stream.

When you have found it, return the same evening and hide yourself behind a convenient tree-trunk or bush; and then, whatever you do, sit perfectly still while keeping a sharp lookout along the paths or sections of fire-line or streambed that are in view. If you are lucky, you may see a hunting panther walking along one of these, perhaps looking up now and again into the trees in search of a monkey or one of the larger jungle birds. It goes without saying, of course, that in such vigils you might also spot a tiger, an elephant, or one of the several deer species.

But let us continue to suppose for the moment that you are only after a panther. If you can locate a jungle pool or a salt lick, it would be convenient to lie down under some cover beside it, or behind an ant-hill, if available. You will derive much entertainment in observing the various denizens of the forest as they visit such a rendezvous. Don't be too surprised if, after a time, you notice a panther or tiger taking up a somewhat similar position to your own, although I may warn you that it will be very hard for you to become aware of them, so silently do they move. As I have already said, such places are favoured by carnivora when lying in wait for their natural food.

I remember that I was once lying in the grass behind the trunk of a tree overlooking a salt lick formed in a corner of a shallow ravine. Earlier examination had shown that spotted deer and sambar visited this salt lick in large numbers. It was growing dusk when the faintest of rustles a little behind me caused me to turn my head slowly and glance back. There I saw a panther regarding me with very evident surprise. Seeing he was discovered, he stood up and half-turned around with the intention of getting away. Then he looked back at me once again, as much as to say, 'Can't you get the hell out of here?' Finally he moved off.

It is fascinating to watch one of these animals with her cubs, or a tigress with hers. The solicitude of the mother is very noticeable. Carnivora do not bring their cubs out of the cave where they are born until old enough to walk stably and understand the rudiments of hunting. Till such time, they are sheltered carefully in the cave. When very young, they are fed entirely on milk. When they grow a little older, the mother begins to feed them on raw meat which first she herself eats and partially digests, and then vomits out for the cubs to feed on. As the cubs themselves become able to digest stronger meat, the mother brings her kills to the cave—perhaps a jungle fowl or peafowl, and as time passes, small animals, increasing to the leg of deer, or perhaps a deer itself.

Cubs are very greedy and if left to themselves will overeat and make themselves ill. I have kept a number of panther and tiger cubs, and have found the former particularly prone to gastritis. They will stuff themselves by gobbling chunks of raw meat, and will drink bowls of blood, till almost unable to move. Once they are attacked by gastritis, the malady proves practically incurable, and they die in three or four days in great agony. This complaint seems to affect them until they are about eight months old, and I have lost quite a few by it.

In the wild state, a mother appears to know this instinctively and gives her young just enough to eat, supplementing raw meat with natural milk till the cubs are quite big and start to bite and scratch her while she is suckling them.

If danger threatens the cave, in the form of intruding human beings or the male of the species, which is rather fond of eating his young, she will move them to a safer abode. This she does by carrying them in her mouth by the scruff of the neck, one at a time.

When the cubs are old enough to walk, the mother takes them out for education in the art of stalking and killing for themselves. This is quite a lengthy process. She begins by killing the prey herself, while the cubs hide in the undergrowth. Then she calls them with a series of guttural mewing-like sounds, allowing them to romp over the dead animal, bite it and get the taste of a fresh kill and warm blood. The ferocious sounds emitted by the cubs when doing this are quite amusing to hear. They bolster up their courage and lash themselves into a fury, growling and snapping at each other and even at their mother.

The next lesson starts when she only half-kills the prey, or hamstrings it, allowing the youngsters to finish the task as best they can. This they begin doing by attacking the throat and biting the animal to death—a very cruel process.

Education in the art of killing goes much farther in the case of tiger cubs than in that of panthers. Panthers choke their victims to death by gripping the throat and hanging on, whereas the tiger very scientifically breaks the neck. Hence tiger cubs take much longer to teach, and it is a common occurrence for a tigress to kill four or five cattle in a herd while teaching her young which, equally often if left to themselves, make a mess of the job by merely biting or mauling an animal, which eventually escapes.

I have mentioned that a tiger is a very scientific and neat killer. He generally leaps half across the back of his quarry, bending over and seizing the throat on its other side, while hanging on with his forepaws in a powerful shoulder-grip. Then he wrenches upwards and backwards in a swift, violent jerk which topples the animal over. It is the combined weights of the quarry and the tiger, coupled with the sudden mighty twist of the neck, that breaks the victim's neck.

When a mother tiger or panther comes out on the hunting trail with her young, they follow behind, copying every action of the parent and sinking to the ground or behind the cover exactly as she does. At such times it is dangerous to be too near a tigress. She is liable to attack you in defence of her young. A pantheress is less likely to attack, although she will demonstrate by growling ferociously. Even so, one never can tell, and it is wise to have your rifle ready when a family procession comes into view.

But whatever you do, and unless utterly unavoidable and in self-defence, please do not shoot the mother, be it panther or tiger, for if you do the cubs will invariably escape into the jungle where they may starve to death, or if they are big enough they may develop into maneaters. You should remember they have not yet learned properly the art of killing their natural food, other animals. If you interrupt their education at this stage they may, by force of circumstances which you have created, turn to killing human beings to appease their hunger. Bear in mind always that a human being is much easier to stalk, attack and kill than any of the larger animals.

An interesting period to indulge in this pastime of stalking is during the Indian winter—that is, the months of November, December and January—for then is the mating season of both these species of carnivora.

Of course, you should remember that these animals are mostly active during the night, and that there is only an off-chance of hearing or seeing them towards dusk. It is thrilling to listen to the sound of a tigress calling her mate, and one can almost detect the note of impatience in her summons. I should warn you, however, that tigers are definitely dangerous during this season, particularly when courting the female, or in the act of mating. Their method is exceedingly rough, both the tiger and tigress often biting and scratching each other freely.

You may have observed the strange behaviour of domestic cats during mating. Multiply this many, many times, and you will have some idea of the savagery of tigers when making love. They lash themselves into a frenzy and a fury, and woe betide a human who intrudes upon their privacy at this time of sexual excitement. The tigress has the reputation of being even more excitable and consequently more dangerous than the tiger at this period. A tigress on heat, calling lustily, has often stopped forest operations and bullock-cart traffic through the jungle over large areas.

Panthers are much the same in this respect, but generally lack the courage to attack a human intruder, although they will demonstrate in no uncertain manner.

A panther resembles a cat more closely than does a tiger. The scratching up of sand or dead leaves by the side of a game-track reveals where a panther has answered the call of nature and then covered up the excreta, exactly in the same way as a domestic cat. A tiger, however, will not bother to do this, but leaves it exposed in the manner of a dog. The excreta, in both cases, consists mostly of the undigested hair of the last kill.

The hyaena, which is a carrion eater, swallows bones and all complete. So the droppings of this animal are easily recognisable as hard, white lumps of semi-digested bones. The track of a hyaena is identifiable in the great difference between the size of the fore and hind-paws; the forepaws are much larger.

Panthers, like tigers, retract their claws when walking, so that the difference between a panther's pug-marks and those of a hyaena, which are about the same in size, is that the 'ball' of the panther's pug is much larger than the hyaena's, while the points of the claws do not show at all. The hyaena, being unable to retract its claws, leaves their imprint clearly on the ground.

In the past there has been much controversy between those sportsmen who have claimed that the panther and the leopard are two entirely different species of animal and those who have said that they are one and the same. This argument has died out with modern times, when it has been recognized that they are indeed one and the same. Difference in environment and diet has caused some animals to grow to a much larger size than others. The forest-dwelling panther, with his richer diet of game-animals, generally grow, much bigger and has a darker and thicker coat than the panther that lives near villages, where his food is restricted to dogs and goats. Also, living among rocks and boulders as the latter generally does, his coat is paler, and the hair short and coarse. Incidentally, the darker coat of the forest-dwelling panther helps to camoulflage him very effectively against the dense vegetation of the jungle, while the paler coat of the 'village panther', as he is sometimes called, makes it very difficult to detect him among the rocks where he lives.

Very occasionally, however, there are exceptions in both cases, and Nature appears unaccountably to break her own rule. I have shot some very large panthers living near villages and far from the regular jungle, possessing dark rich coats of hair, and some quite small ones within the forest with pale coats.

Much the same applies to tigers. Those that have accustomed themselves to eating cattle become heavy and fat, while the true game-killers are sleek and muscular, carrying no fat at all, for they have a far more strenuous time hunting wild game than does the cattle-lifter, which procures its prey with little or no effort. Strenuous exercise reduces fat, not only in human beings, but in tigers also.

Man-eaters of both species are distinct anomalies and the products of unnatural circumstances, some of which have been mentioned already.

Panthers can climb quite well and they sometimes ascend trees after monkeys, or to escape when pursued by wild dogs. Tigers do not, although I have known one in the Mysore Zoological Gardens that has accustomed itself to climbing quite high and lying on a platform that had been specially built for it on a tree within its enclosure. This is an instance of the fact that tigers, like human beings, as individuals differ from one another.

Both panthers and tigers hunt monkeys by a quite unique method. Jungle monkeys are very vigilant and keep a sharp lookout for carnivora, which are their natural enemies. At the sound or sight of any of these animals they climb to the topmost branches, where they are safe. Knowing this, panthers and tigers charge at the foot of the tree up which the monkeys have climbed, uttering a series of terrific growls and roars. These fearsome sounds quite unnerve the poor monkeys, which, instead of remaining on their perches where they are safe, attempt to leap to the next tree; or, if that is too far away, jump to the ground from enormous heights with the intention of making a run to climb another tree. In this process some of them injure themselves or are stunned, and fall easy victims to the clever hunter.

One of the most intelligent animals, if not the most intelligent, in the Indian jungle is the wild dog. Shikaris of earlier days have variously given this place to the wild elephant, tiger and panther, but if you have studied the habits of the wild dog you may be inclined to disagree with them. When hunting deer they send out 'flankers', which run ahead of the quarry and ambush it later. In large packs of thirty or more, these animals are fearless hunters, and will ring, attack and kill any tiger or panther by literally tearing it to bits, despite the number of casualties they may suffer in the process.

Particularly in the forests of Chittoor District, in the former Presidency of Madras, they have earned quite a reputation for this, and I know of at least three instances where a very gory battle had been waged, resulting eventually in the tiger being torn to shreds, but not before he had killed a half-dozen of the dogs and maimed many others. I have never come across a panther destroyed in this fashion because, as I have said before, of their ability to escape by climbing trees.

The tiger takes to water and will swim across large rivers freely. Especially in hot weather, he is very fond, during the midday hours, of taking his siesta by the banks of a shady stream or pool, sometimes lying in the water itself. He hunts freely on rainy days, and his pug-marks are often seen in the morning after a night of pouring rain. This is not so with the panther. A true cat in every respect, he detests water, abhors rain, and is not given to swimming, although he can do so in emergencies, such as to escape from a pack of wild dogs.

The tiger was originally an immigrant into India from the colder regions of Mongolia. Hence his liking for cool spots in which to shelter from the heat. The panther is a true native of India and of the tropics.

Tigers very occasionally mimic the calls of sambar, obviously to attract and ambush them. Such mimicry is heard very rarely and only in forests where deer are plentiful. Panthers, however, do not follow this practice but rely entirely on their silent stalking, their ability to flatten themselves to the ground and hide in incredibly small places, and their final quick rush upon their quarry.

It was often said by the sportsmen of the past that the tiger is a 'gentleman' while the panther is a 'bounder'. I think these sayings have gained popularity from the experiences some of those hardy, old stalwarts have gained while following wounded animals of both species with their old-fashioned guns, frequently muzzle-loaders. Hats off to them, indeed. Ill-armed and awkwardly clad in the fashions of those days, wearing heavy boots and cumbersomely thick solar topees, they followed a wounded animal fearlessly on foot. How different from the modern 'hunter' who shoots at night from the safety of a motorcar, the lights of which dazzle the poor animal and give it not the ghost of a chance!

A wounded tiger generally betrays his whereabouts by growling as his pursuer approaches, but a wounded panther often lies silent and concealed, and attacks the hunter from behind, when he has passed. Hence there seems to be some justification for those who labelled the panther a 'bounder'. Actually, a tiger is generally far braver and certainly much more formidable, and when he attacks to kill he finishes that job very thoroughly. A panther, however—unless he is a man-eater—will maul his pursuer and then escape rather than kill him outright.

Panthers gnaw at the bones of their kills, even when they are in a very far advanced state of decomposition. As a rule, tigers do not visit their kills after the second day. For one thing, they eat much more and so have finished all there is to eat, after two or three meals. Also, on the whole, they are cleaner feeders. Decomposed flesh becomes embedded beneath the claws of both species. This breeds dangerous germs, and it is the scratches inflicted by these animals, more than their bites, that lead to blood-poisoning. Tigers are very conscious of this foreign matter under their claws, and clean them, in addition to sharpening them, by scratching upon the soft bark of certain trees. Panthers do this very rarely, so that their claws are generally more infected. Trees bearing such claw-marks at the height of six or seven feet, where a tiger has reared up on his hind legs and cleaned the claws of his forepaws, are a happy sign to the hunter of the presence of his quarry.

In other ways also, the tiger is a much cleaner feeder. Whereas a panther starts his meal by burrowing into his kill from the stomach end, and soon has the stomach, entrails, offal and so on, all mixed up with the meat of his kill, the tiger makes a vent near the anus into which he inserts his paw and removes the intestines and stomach, dragging them about ten feet away before he begins to eat a clean meal. To facilitate this procedure, he often removes the tail of the animal by biting it off near the root. The larger type of panthers found in forests occasionally do the same thing, but never the normal and smaller beasts, which soon get themselves mixed up in a repast in which the guts and excreta are all included.

The cave or den of a tigress and her cubs is very cleanly kept compared with that occupied by a family of panthers, and seems conspicuously free of bones and other waste matter which is almost always present where panthers live.

Apart from the mating season, tigers advertise their presence in a jungle much more than panthers do. The tribes of aborigines living in the forests of India will confirm this and will tell you the rough direction of the trails generally followed by tigers while out hunting. Their melodious, deep-throated and long-drawn moaning call, terminating in that never-to-be-forgotten 'oo-oo-ongh' that reverberates down the aisles of the valleys and across the wooded glens of the jungle in the stygian darkness beneath the giant forest trees, or in the phosphorescent moonlight, is music to the jungle-lover's ears. The harsher but less distance-carrying call of the panther, very closely resembling a man sawing wood, that occasionally penetrates the still darkness of the jungle night, is much less frequently heard.

Another habit peculiar to the tiger is his way of following a particular beat on his hunting expeditions. This may extend for miles and miles, maybe a hundred miles; but it invariably follows the same course; perhaps the bed of a certain dry nullah, along the banks of a river or stream, through some wooded valley or the shoulder of a hill. On a favourite trail you may find the pug-marks of the hunting tiger, imprinted in the powdery dust; and, once having found them, be sure you will find them again. Some days may pass, extending into weeks, a month, or perhaps longer, depending on the distance covered by his beat; but you may be almost certain that the tiger will pass that way again. He rarely returns by the route he has gone, but works around in an enormous circle, coming back to the place where you found his pug-marks and going on in the same direction once more.

While on his beat, if he is successful in killing an animal, the tiger will remain in the vicinity for a couple of days till he demolishes it, when he will resume his itinerary.

It is important to bear this peculiar habit in mind when trying to anticipate the movements of a man-eater, for he will always return to the same locality within a roughly calculable number of days, depending upon the stretch of territory covered by his beat. You may come to know the number of days and the line of his beat approximately by plotting on a map the human kills he has made, and the dates on which he has made them, followed by some very elementary mental arithmetic.

A panther never seems to follow any such pattern, but is here, there and everywhere. Like looking for the 'elusive Pimpernel', this habit of appearing anywhere and disappearing just as abruptly, makes the movements of a man-eating panther almost impossible to anticipate or forecast. He will turn up quite unexpectedly to claim his human victim, at a time and place very far from that predicted by the most experienced and astute of shikaris.

In this chapter I have tried to give you some hints on 'still-hunting', as well as telling you about some of the habits and peculiarities of the larger carnivora. I have deliberately abstained from recounting instances of animals shot by me on such occasions, as I feel they may not interest you much. After all, the fun of the game lies in pitting your skill, woodcraft, endurance and cunning against that of these animals and in beating them at their own game, rather than in merely killing them. In fact, I would very strongly advocate that you carry a camera along with you, and I would ask you to confine yourself to taking photographs of these very beautiful creatures in preference to shooting them. Take your rifle with you by all means, as a protection in emergencies; but try to abstain from needless killing if you can resist the temptation.

Remember always that a good, cleverly-taken photograph is a far more meritorious and commendable achievement than any stuffed trophy hanging on the wall or decorating the floor of your drawing-room. With the first you can view the animal as often as you wish in all the beauty of its living grace and strength; whereas a stuffed trophy, like a cast cocoon or broken eggshell, is just the husk of a once-beautiful animal which sooner or later will deteriorate and be destroyed by time and insects.

Two

The Man-eating Panther of the Yellagiri Hills

IT WAS MID-AFTERNOON. THE TROPICAL SUN BLAZED OVERHEAD, A veritable ball of fire. The jungle lay still and silent under its scorching spell. Even the birds and monkeys that had chattered all morning were now quiet, lulled to sleep in the torpid air.

Beneath the dark shadows of the forest trees some relief was to be found from the golden glare, even though the shadows themselves throbbed and pulsated in that temperature. Not the least movement of the air stirred the fallen leaves that thickly carpeted the jungle floor, forming Nature's own luscious blanket of crisp yellow-brown tints. When the monsoons set in, these same crisp leaves would be converted into mouldering manure, which in course of time would serve to feed other forest trees, long after the jungle giants from which they have fallen had themselves crashed to earth.

The heavy stillness was occasionally broken by a hollow sound from the wooden bells hanging from the necks of a herd of cattle that had been driven into the jungle for grazing. These wooden bells serve two purposes. The first and main object is to enable the herdsmen to locate in the thick underbrush the whereabouts of the animals that wear them. The second object is to frighten off any carnivora that becomes disposed to attack the wearers. Quite often the second purpose is successfully achieved, as tigers and panthers are suspicious animals and hesitate to attack a prey from whose neck is suspended a strange wooden object emitting queer sounds. But sometimes again the ruse does not succeed, depending upon the nature of the particular tiger or panther concerned, and even more on its hunger at the given moment.

This particular afternoon was to witness one such exception. A fat and brown young bull was browsing on the outskirts of the herd, munching mouthfuls of grass beneath the shade of a clump of ficus trees. With each mouthful that it tore from the ground it would raise its head a little to gaze in idle speculation at the surrounding jungle, while its jaws worked steadily, munching the grass. Nothing seemed to stir and the brown bull was at peace with itself and the world.

It would not have felt so complacent, however, if it had gazed behind. Not a rustle rose as a tuft of grass parted to show two malevolent green eyes that stared with concentrated longing at the fat brown bull. The eyes were those of a large male panther of the big forest variety, and his heavy body, nearly equalling that of a tigress in dimensions, was pressed low to the ground, the colouring of his rosettes merging naturally with the various tints of the grasses.

Slowly and noiselessly the panther drew his hind legs to a crouching position. His muscles quivered and vibrated with tenseness. His whole form swayed gently, to gain balance for the death-charge that was to follow.

Then, as a bolt from the blue, that charge took place. As a streak of yellow and black spots, the heavy body of the panther hurtled through the air and, before the brown bull was aware that anything was happening, the cruel yellow fangs buried themselves in its jugular. For a moment the bull struggled to maintain its equilibrium with its forefeet apart, hoping to gallop into the midst of the grazing herd. But with its air supply cut off, and its lifeblood jetting from the torn throat, its resistance was but momentary. It crashed to earth with a thud all four feet lashing out desperately in an attempt to kick off the attacker. The panther adroitly squirmed his body out of reach of the lashing hooves, but never released his merciless grip on the bull's throat. A snorting gurgle burst from the gaping mouth of the stricken animal, the feet kicked less vigorously, and then its terror-stricken eyes slowly took on a glazed and lifeless expression as death came within a few minutes of the attack.

Thus did Nathan, the herdsman, lose one of his best beasts, as the rest of the herd, alarmed by the noise made by the dying bull, galloped through the jungle for safety to the forest-line that eventually led to the village, a couple of miles away.

But this was not to be Nathan's only loss. In the next three months he lost four more of his cattle, while the other two herdsmen who lived in the same village each lost a couple. On the other hand, the panther responsible for these attacks concluded, and no doubt quite justifiably, that he had found a locality where food was plentiful and easy to get. He decided to live nearby in preference to moving through the forest in his normal hunt for game, which was far more arduous anyhow.

The monsoons then came and with the heavy rains pasture grew up everywhere and it became unnecessary to drive the herds of cattle into the jungle for grazing. Grass sprang up near the village itself, and in the few adjacent fields, and the herds were kept close to the village where they could be more carefully watched.

This change, of course, was not relished by the panther, and he became bolder, as he was forced by circumstances to stalk the herds in the new pastures.

The forest thinned out in the vicinity of the village, while the fields themselves were completely tree-less. This made the panther's approach more and more difficult, and often enough the herdsmen saw him as he tried to creep towards their charges. On such occasions they would shout, throw stones at him and brandish the staves they carried. These demonstrations would frighten him away.

Then his hunger increased, he found that he must choose between abandoning the village herds altogether as prey and go back to stalking the wild animals of the forests, or adopting a more belligerent policy towards the herdsmen.

The panther decided to adopt the latter policy.

One evening he crept as far as possible under cover and then dashed openly towards the nearest cow. Two herdsmen, standing quite near, saw him coming. They shouted and waved their sticks, but his charge never faltered till he had buried his fangs in the cow's throat. The herdsmen stood transfixed for the few minutes it took for the cow to die. Then they began to hurl stones and invectives at the spotted aggressor while he lay with heaving flanks across the still-quivering carcass of his prey.

When the stones thudded around, the panther let go his grip on the cow and with blood-smeared snout growled hideously at the men, his evil countenance contorted and his eyes blazing with hatred. Faced with that hideous visage and those bloodcurdling growls the herdsmen ran away.

At this stage of affairs the villagers requested the local forester to do something to help them; otherwise to enlist help from some other quarter. The forester, whose name was Ramu, had done a bit of shooting himself and owned a single-barrelled twelve-bore breech-loading gun. Although it was part of his duties as the representative of the government to check poachers, he himself was accustomed to indulge in a little poaching over water holes and salt licks, his quarry being the various kinds of deer that visited such spots, or an occasional jungle pig. As often as was possible he avoided letting his subordinates, the forest guards, know of these surreptitious activities, but when that was not possible he made sure of the guards' silence by giving them a succulent leg from the animal he had shot, together with a string of dire threats of what he would do to them if a word about it was breathed to the range officer. Despite all these precautions, however, the range officer had come to know of Ramu's favourite pastime. He was a conscientious young officer, keen to uphold the government's policy of game preservation, and tried to catch his subordinate in the act. But that worthy had so far succeeded in keeping a clean official slate. Perhaps he was too wily, or his threats to the guards so fearsome that the Range Officer (R.O.) had not yet succeeded.

So far Ramu had not tried his weapon against any of the larger carnivora, and when the villagers approached him for help to shoot the panther he was not over-keen to tackle the proposition. But the villagers persisted in their requests, and soon it was made very evident to Ramu that his honour was at stake, for he could not delay indefinitely with vague excuses of being too busy to come to the village, or of having run out of stock of ammunition, and so forth.

Therefore Ramu arrived at the village one morning carrying his weapon. He was hailed as the would-be saviour of the situation and immediately took full advantage of the fact by settling down to a very hearty meal provided by the villagers. After washing this down with a lota (tumbler) of coffee, he belched contentedly and announced his intention of indulging in a nap for an hour before tackling the business for which he had come.

Ramu awoke a couple of hours later, by which time it was past midday. He then demanded of the headman that a goat should be provided as bait. This was done and Ramu set out for the jungle, accompanied by five or six villagers.

Being the forester in charge of the section he was well-acquainted with the locality and had already selected, in his mind, the tree on which to build his machan. This was a large banyan, growing conveniently at the point where the track from the village and the forest fire-line met. It also happened that a nullah intersected the fire-line near the same spot. The panther was known to traverse all three of these approaches as had been evidenced by his frequent pug-marks, so that Ramu's choice was indeed a wise one; for if the panther walked along the fire-line or came up the nullah he could not help spotting his goat, while he himself, in the machan, could see up and down both these approaches as well as part of the track leading to the village.

On this tree, then, Ramu instructed the villagers who had accompanied him to build a machan twenty feet or so off the ground, and being well-skilled in the art of making hide-outs himself, contrived to conceal it cleverly with leaves, so that it would be quite unnoticeable to the panther.

It was past four o'clock that evening before the work was completed. Ramu climbed into the machan and the goat was then tethered by a rope round its neck to a stake that had been driven into the ground.

When the villagers left, the goat, finding itself alone, gazed in the direction of the village path and bleated lustily. Conditions were as perfect as could be, and the panther heard the goat and pounced upon it at about six, while the light was still good. Ramu had loaded his gun with an L.G. cartridge which he fired at the panther while the latter was holding the goat to the ground by its throat. There was a loud cough; and the panther somersaulted before dashing off into the undergrowth. The goat, which was already dying from suffocation and the wound inflicted in its throat, was killed outright by a pellet that passed through its ear into the brain.

Ramu waited awhile, then descended the banyan tree and hastily retreated to the village, where he told the people that he was sure he had hit the panther and had no doubt that they would find him dead the next morning.

With daylight a large party of men assembled and, headed by Ramu, went down to the banyan tree. There they found that the goat had been completely eaten during the night by a hyaena. Ramu pointed out the direction in which the panther had leaped and the whole party of men searched in close formation. It was not long before they came upon a blood-trail on the leaves of the bushes and lantana, indicating that in truth he had scored a hit. But of the panther there was no sign, although the party followed the trail for over a mile before it eventually petered out.

For two months after this no fresh attacks on cattle or goats were recorded, and everyone, including Ramu, was sure that the panther had gone away into some thicket and died.

Then one evening a lad of about 16 years was returning to the village along the same forest line. He was alone. Coming around a bend he saw a panther squatting on his haunches about twenty yards away, looking directly at him He halted in his tracks, expecting the panther to make of as an ordinary panther would do. But this panther did nothing of the kind. Instead, he changed his position to a crouch and began to snarl viciously.

The boy turned around and ran the way he had come, and the panther pursued him. Luckily, at the place he overtook the boy, a piece of rotting wood happened to be lying across the forest line. As the panther jumped on his back and bit through his shoulder near the neck, the boy was borne to earth by the weight, and in falling saw the piece of rotting wood. Terror and desperation lent strength to his hands and an unusual quickness to his mind. Grasping the wood, he rolled sideways and jammed the end into the panther's mouth. This caused the panther to release his hold, but not before he had severely scratched the boy's arm and thighs with his claws. Springing to his feet, the boy lashed out at him again; this unexpected retaliation by his victim caused the panther to lose courage and he leaped into the bushes. Still grasping the wood that had saved his life, and with blood streaming down his chest, back, arms and legs, the boy made a staggering run for the village.

That was the first attack made upon a human being. The next followed some three weeks later, and this time the panther did not run away. It happened that a goat-herd was returning with his animals when a panther attacked them and seized upon one. The herdsman was poor and the herd represented all his worldly wealth. So he tried to save his goat by screaming at the panther as he ran towards him, whirling his staff. It was a brave but silly thing to have done, knowing that a panther was in the vicinity that had recently attacked a human being without provocation. He paid for his foolish bravery with his life, for the panther left the goat and leapt upon him to clamp his jaws firmly in his throat.

The goats ran back to the village. Seeing no herdsman returning with them, some of the villagers wondered what had occurred, but for the moment did not attach any significance to what they had noticed. It transpired that this herdsman was alone and had no relatives, so that it was nearly an hour later and growing dusk before his absence was really accepted as a fact, and it became evident that something had happened to him. It was too late by then to do anything.

Next morning the villagers gathered in a party of about thirty persons, armed with clubs and staves, and left the village to try to find the goatherd. They went down the track leading from the village to the jungle. The hoof-marks of the herd of goats as they had run back to the village the previous evening were clearly visible along the trail. They proceeded a little further and there they came upon the spot where the panther had made the attack. Clearly impressed in the dusty earth were the pug-marks of the large spotted cat. There was also a distinct drag-mark where the panther had hauled his victim away. Scattered at intervals were a few drops of blood from the throat of the man that had trickled to the ground. But the earth away from the track was sun-baked and hard and had absorbed the blood, and it was difficult to locate, though the drag-mark was quite clear.

The panther had taken his victim off the track along which the man had been driving his goats, and had hauled the body into the jungle. But he had not gone very far from where he had originally made his kill, and within about a hundred yards the group of villagers discovered the body of the victim. The chest and a small portion of one thigh had been eaten. Thus the maneater of the Yellagiris came into existence.

The Yellagiris are a crescent-shaped formation of hills lying immediately to the east of Jalarpet Junction railway station on the Southern Railway. The opening of the crescent faces away from the Junction, while its apex, so to speak, rises abruptly some three thousand feet above sea level about two miles from the station. A very rough zigzag path winds up the steep incline, and in places one has to clamber from boulder to boulder.

Many years ago—in 1941 in fact—I had purchased a farm of small acreage at the top of this ridge. I had intended keeping this farm, which is about ninety-five miles from Bangalore, as a weekend resort, but had not found the time to visit it regularly. As a result, the open land was quickly being encroached upon by the ever-prolific lantana shrub.

I had decided to visit this place for about three days to supervise the removal of the lantana, and when I made this visit I happened to arrive a few days after the death of the goatherd. The coolies I had engaged for the work told me about the panther, of which no news had been published in any of the newspapers. They assured me that it continued to haunt the precincts of the village, for they had again seen its pug-marks only the previous day.

The news interested me and I thought I might as well make an attempt to bag the animal. I had brought neither of my rifles with me, but only my twelve-bore shotgun, as the Yellagiris abound in jungle fowl and during the few visits I had made there I had always shot a couple each time for the pot. Further, with this object in view, I had brought along with me only two L.G. cartridges for emergencies, the rest being number six shot for the jungle fowl. Therefore I would have to make sure of the panther with the only two L.G. shells available.

I stopped work on the lantana about midday and went back with the labourers to reconnoitre the ground. It was much as I had expected. The jungle fell away into a narrow belt of lantana which ceased only at the few fields that bordered the village. Clearly visible on a footpath at the end of one of these fields was the trail of a panther—a fairly large adult male, judging from his pugs. He had passed that way only the night before.

I went to the village and introduced myself to the Patel, or headman, whom I had never met before, and told him how I came to be there. He expressed great pleasure at my presence and was most enthusiastic in his promises of every cooperation. We held a discussion and I told the Patel that I would like to buy a goat to tie up as a bait in the initial stage of my operations against the panther.

And here was where the Patel's cooperation was needed, as no goats were available in his village. It was only with much difficulty and considerable delay that he was able to procure one for me from a neighbouring hamlet, a kid that was small enough in size to ensure that it would bleat when tied up. The Patel himself accompanied me, and four other men, one of them leading the goat, the rest carrying hatchets with which to construct a machan.

They led me back along the track to the place where the herdsman had been attacked, and finally to the spot at which they had found his remains. It was densely overgrown with small bushes of the Inga dulcis plant, known as the 'Madras thorn' or 'Korkapulli' tree. It was out of the question to sit on the ground there, as the thorns grew so close together as to prevent one from seeing any animal beyond the distance of a couple of yards. So we were compelled to retrace our steps along the track for about a quarter of a mile.

There we came upon quite a large and leafy jack-fruit tree which, with its thick leaves growing in profusion, seemed to provide the ideal setting for the construction of a machan. At about a height of eight feet the first branch led off the main stem of the tree. The third branch after that extended over the track itself and bifurcated conveniently at about fifteen feet from the ground.

Across this bifurcation I instructed my followers to build the machan. This they set about doing by first lopping small branches off the neighbouring tree and removing the leaves. They then laid the lopped sticks across the bifurcation, tying them to the two arms with vines cut from the jungle. By this means they had soon made a platform about four feet long by three feet wide. This would be sufficient for me to sit on. Finally, the four sides of the machan were well camouflaged with the leaves they had just removed from the small branches they had cut down to build the base of the machan. We also took great care to conceal the base of the platform itself with leaves, so that to a panther standing anywhere around at any angle, or even directly below, nothing would be visible of the occupant sitting in the machan, nor would anything seem to be out of place to arouse his suspicions unduly.

I got one of the men to make a stake out of a piece of wood, sharpened it a little at one end and then hammered it into the hard ground with a boulder at a distance of just over twenty feet from the machan, keeping in mind the fact that I was using a shotgun.

When all this was ready I climbed into the machan myself and made an opening in the leaves to face the stake and in such a position that I would have a clear view of the goat and a small portion of the ground around it. By the time we were ready it was nearly five in the evening.

As I have already stated, I had not come to the Yellagiris to shoot big game, so I had not brought my night equipment, the torch that I used to clamp to the barrel of my rifle. Instead, I had brought a small two-cell affair which I only used in camp. It threw only a diffused beam and was quite inadequate for the work which I now had in hand. Further, having no clamp, I would have to hold the torch itself in my left hand and close to the barrel of the gun. The outlook was not so good, since I had come during the moonless period of the month and would have to rely on sounds and my own senses to judge the presence and exact whereabouts of the panther in the darkness, would he turn up.

Bearing all these facts in mind, I settled down in the machan and made myself as comfortable as possible. Then I instructed the men to tether the goat to the stake and walk back to the village, talking loudly to each other. Not only would their withdrawal in this fashion cause the goat to begin bleating as it saw them going away, but should the panther be watching anywhere in the vicinity, their noisy departure, coupled with the bleating of the goat, would induce him to come out early to dinner.

According to instructions, the men tied the goat to the stake and began to walk back in the direction of the village, talking loudly. The goat immediately strained at the rope that held it to the stake and started to bleat so loudly and persistently that I mentally congratulated the Patel on the choice of the bait he had selected. I became certain that if the panther was anywhere around within a mile of this goat he would surely hear its cries and hasten to his intended victim.

But nothing that I expected came to pass. The goat called persistently and loudly, so much so that by the time the sun had set it had become quite hoarse and its cries dwindled to husky squeaks. Twilight found the goat so hoarse that it appeared to resign itself to the inevitable and a night in the open. Folding its forelegs first, it settled down on the ground and fell asleep. I now knew there was but little chance of the panther locating the goat unless it actually happened to pass by and practically stumble upon it. Still, I decided to wait till about nine o'clock and chance my luck.

The next two and a half hours were like many others that I had spent in the jungle under similar circumstances. The calls of the feathered denizens of the forest had long since died away at least those that belonged to the day. The only sound that could be heard occasionally was the peculiar low whistle of the 'herdboy' bird. This is a grey night-bird, some eight inches in length which emits a low but very penetrating cry exactly resembling the sounds invariably made by herdsmen as they tend their cattle while grazing in the forest, to keep them together. Hence its name, or to give it its Tamil original, 'mat-paya kurvi', by which it is known throughout southern India. Incidentally, it is a bird that appears to live only in jungly regions, or their immediate vicinity, as I have never come across it in the cultivated areas.

There is nothing more that I can tell you, beyond the fact that at 9.15 p.m. I decided to abandon the vigil. I shone the torch in the direction of the goat, but the spreading beam hardly reached the sleeping animal, which I could just detect as a faint blur as I heard it scramble to its feet. Had the panther attacked that goat I would not have been able to see it properly, so I consoled myself with the thought that perhaps it was just as well the panther had not turned up.

Climbing down from the tree I untied the goat and, taking it is tow, went back to the village, where I left it with one of the men who had helped to put up the machan, instructing him to look after it until the next day.

Early the following morning I returned to the village to glean as much additional information about the panther as I could. But there was nothing more that anybody could tell me, beyond the facts already related at the beginning of this story, which I slowly pieced together. Nobody knew exactly from where the panther had come and nobody could suggest any particular locality in which he might be living.

The work on my land occupied the next three days, and each evening of those three days I spent in the same machan, sitting up with different goats as baits till a few hours before midnight. But all those three evenings drew a blank, in that I heard no sound of the panther. Each morning I would scour the vicinity of the machan, the forest-lines, and various stream-beds, but there were no fresh pug-marks of the animal for which I was looking, showing that he had not passed anywhere nearby during those nights. Very probably he had moved off to some distant part of the Yellagiri Hills.

On the fourth morning I left for Bangalore, after handing the village Patel my name and address and money for a telegram which he was to send by a runner to Jalarpet railway station.

Over a month passed. No telegram came and I decided that the panther was not a regular man-eater or had perhaps left the Yellagiri Hills to cross the intervening belt of cultivated plain to reach the much more extensive range of forest that clothed to reach the Javadi Hills. This latter range is a wide one and leads far beyond the Yellagiris in a southeasterly direction towards Tiruvannamalai, which is a sacred hill inhabited by a sage said to be possessed of many gifts.

I was quite wrong, as events were to prove.

Seven weeks passed before the telegram, which I had almost forgotten, arrived. It told me that the 'mail-carrier', who brought the 'tappal', or post, from Jalarpet up the hill to the various villages and settlers at the top, had been killed by the panther.

The telegram did not reach me till after three in the afternoon. Nevertheless, by hurrying I was able to catch the Trichinopoly Express which left Bangalore at seven o'clock and reached Jalarpet at 10.30 p.m. I had brought my petromax lantern with me, and by its bright light walked from the station up the hill to reach the village, eight miles away, just before 2 a.m. Normally I would not have dared to risk that rough and steep boulder-covered track by night with a man-eating panther in the vicinity, but I knew that it would be quite safe as long as I had the petromax burning. My 405-rifle and haversack of equipment strapped to my back, plus the light hanging from my left hand, made quite a sizeable and uncomfortable load up that steep track, and I was drenched in perspiration by the time I reached the top of the hill. The village was still a mile away, and a cold breeze chilled my damp clothes as they dried on my back while I walked along.

I awoke the Patel, who in turn awoke most of the village, so that a concourse of a hundred dusky faces and gleaming white teeth surrounded me in the light of the petromax.

The Patel offered me food, which I politely declined, but I told him I would be grateful for some hot tea. This was soon prepared, and while sipping it from a large brass utensil belonging to the Patel, I heard the story he had to tell me.

Actually there was nothing much to tell. After my last visit everybody had been very careful when moving about in the day, particularly in the vicinity of the forest. At night they had remained indoors. Then as the weeks had passed without any further signs of the panther, as always happened vigilance was correspondingly relaxed.

The mail-carrier used to ascend the hill early in the morning, leaving Jalarpet at about 6 a.m. from the small post office situated adjacent to the railway station. All the mail trains passed during the night, from Bangalore as well as from Madras on the east coast and Calicut on the west coast. Postal traffic to the Yellagiris was comparatively small, and the few letters or articles that were destined for the hill-top were placed in individual bags by the sorters on the various mail trains and unloaded at Jalarpet Station. The mail-carrier, who was to ascend the hill, would open these bags in order to place all their contents into the one bag he carried up, slung across his shoulders or sometimes balanced on his head.

His one protection—which was intended not so much as a weapon of protection as an emblem and badge of office, as well as a sound-device to frighten away snakes—was a short spear, on the shaft of which were fitted a number of iron rings. This spear he would carry in his hand, striking the base of it against the ground at every few paces. The rings would jangle against the iron shaft and against each other, making the loud jingling-jangling noise that has been known to the mail-carriers for almost a hundred years throughout the length and breadth of India.

On that fateful day the mail-carrier had as usual set out from the small post office at Jalarpet at about six o'clock in the morning. But he never reached the top of the hill. The villagers had become accustomed to hearing him and seeing him as he jingled and jangled his daily route through the main street of the village. But that morning they had not heard the familiar sound. With the indifference and apathy peculiar to the East, nobody worried or thought anything about it.

After the midday meal, a party of men had started to descend the hill, bound for Jalarpet. About a quarter of the way down, they noticed the rusty colour of dried blood splashed on the rocks that formed a trail. They had stopped to wonder about it, when the sharp eyes of one individual had noticed the mail-carrier's spear lying away from the track and near a bush. Guessing what had happened, the whole party turned tail and hurried back to the village. There they had gathered reinforcements, including the Patel, and returned eventually to find the partly eaten corpse of the unfortunate mail-carrier.

The Patel had written out the telegram and sent it by the same party of men to be despatched to me from Jalarpet Station. With all the confusion it had not reached me till after three the following evening, a delay of some twenty-four hours, although Jalarpet is just eighty-nine miles from Bangalore. I was also informed that the police authorities at Jalarpet had removed the body for inquest and cremation.

By the time all this conversation was over and I had elicited all the information I required, or perhaps it would be more correct to say all the information that the Patel and the villagers knew about the panther, it was past four in the morning. The Patel lent me a rope cot which I carried to the outskirts of the village, where I lay down upon it for a brief sleep of two hours till dawn, when I awoke, not to the familiar calls of the forest, but to the loud yapping of a couple of curs who were regarding me on the rope cot with very evident suspicion and distaste.

As I have said, the Yellagiri Hills do not hold a great deal of regular forest, and there is therefore a complete absence of aboriginal jungle-folk of any kind. I realised that I would have to rely upon the villagers and myself to try to discover ways and means of locating the panther.

One of the questions I had asked earlier that morning concerned the panther's possible hide-out. No definite reply had been given to this, but a couple of cattle-grazers had stated that they had on three or four occasions during the past few weeks observed a panther sunning himself in the afternoon on a rocky ledge of a hill named 'Periamalai' or 'Big Hill', to give it its English translation. The Yellagiris themselves form a plateau at the top, and this Periamalai is the one and only hill rising above the level of the plateau and forms the highest peak of the crescent-shaped Yellagiri range. It is nearly 4,500 feet above mean sea level.

I went to the Patel's house and found him still asleep, but he soon woke up and offered me a large 'chumbo', which is a round brass vessel like a miniature water-pot, of hot milk to drink. I then asked him to call the cattle-tenders who had seen the panther on Periamalai and to ask them to accompany me to the hill and point out the particular ledge which the panther was said to frequent.

It took some time before these two individuals could be persuaded to go with me. They were most unwilling and I could see that they were definitely scared. However, the Patel used his own methods of persuasion, which included threats of retribution if they refused, so eventually I was able to set out accompanied by them.

Periamalai is situated about three miles to the east of the village and in the opposite direction to the path from Jalarpet, which ascends to the west. In all, about five miles lay between this hill and the spot where the unfortunate mailman had been killed. In addition, practically all the land between was cultivated. The jungle covering Periamalai itself receded down the slopes of the Yellagiri range in the direction of that portion of the crescent that faces north. I was not happy about this as I felt that the cattle-grazers might have seen another panther entirely, and not the one that had killed the postman.

Arriving at the base of Periamalai, my two companions pointed to a ledge of rock that jutted out some 300 feet above, and stated that that was the spot where they had seen the panther sunning himself on several afternoons. Thick lantana scrub grew from the foot of the hill right up to the base of the ledge and to about halfway up Periamalai, where the regular forest began. I could see that, as was happening with so many of the smaller forest tracks in southern India, the lantana pest was slowly but surely encroaching on the jungle proper and smothering the original trees. Like the Yellagiri range itself, Periamalai is a rocky hill consisting of piles of boulders and to look for a panther in that sea of lantana and among those rocks would be a hopeless task, as the former was impenetrable.

So I marked out a place under a tree growing at the foot of the hill and told the men that we would return to the village and procure a bait, and that they should come back with it and tie it at the spot I had selected.

Accordingly we went back and the Patel procured for me a donkey. A goat would have been of no use in this case as I did not intend to sit up with it. Should it be killed, the panther would devour it at one meal and there would be nothing left to justify his return the following night, whereas the donkey was big enough to warrant the panther coming back for what remained after the first meal. Against this was the disadvantage that a goat would more readily and quickly attract the panther by its bleating, whereas a donkey would be silent.

But I relied on the fact that if the panther lived anywhere on the hill, from his elevated position he would be able to see the donkey tied on the lower ground. So I borrowed some stout rope and instructed the cattlemen to take the donkey up and tether it at the spot I had already pointed out to them.

This done, the Patel himself and three or four villagers came along with me to point out the place where the mail-carrier had been done to death. It turned out to be at a spot about a mile and a half from the village, just where the track from Jalarpet passed through a belt of lantana and rocky boulders. I had, of course, passed the place myself the previous night when ascending the hill with the lantern, but had not noticed the blood in the lantern-light. No doubt this had been just as well or my tranquillity would have been greatly perturbed.

We came upon a few dried splashes of blood on the trail, and my companions pointed out me a spot nearby to where the unfortunate man had been dragged and partly eaten. As I have already said, his remains had been removed to Jalarpet for cremation, so that there was nothing to be gained by remaining there any longer.

A cashew-nut tree stood beside the trail about three hundred yards higher up, and beneath this tree I asked the Patel to tie another donkey.

Then we walked back to the village, and I suggested that a third donkey be tied at some place where the scrub jungle came closest to the village. The Patel once more used his influence to procure two more donkeys and sent them out by different parties of men to be tied as I had instructed.

It was past one in the afternoon by the time all this had been done, and I realized that there was nothing more for me to do but await events. I could only hope the panther would kill one of three donkeys that night, provided of course he chanced to come upon it. Since the panther had made but only a few human kills thus far, it was clear that he was mainly existing upon other meat.

The Patel set a hot meal before me, consisting of rice and dhal curry, mixed with brinjals and onions grown on his land and made tremendously hot with red chillies which had been liberally added. I must say I enjoyed that meal, though the sweat poured down my face in rivulets as a result of the chillies. My host was highly amused at this sight and began to apologise, but I stopped him with the assurance that I did enjoy such a meal. Copious draughts of coffee followed, and when I finally arose I was a very contented person.

To pass the time I went down to my small farm and pottered about for the rest of that evening. You may be interested to know that this farm of mine consists of only one and a half acres of land, but it is a very compact farm at that. There is a 'marking-nut' tree, from the nut of which a black fluid is extracted for making a marking-ink generally used by launderers and dhobis for writing the initials of the owners on the corner of each article they send to the wash. Once marked, this 'ink' cannot be washed out. Three 'jack' trees, which are of a grafted variety, produce fruit weighing from two to twelve pounds each or even more. There are a few guava trees, some peaches and a vegetable garden. The two existing buildings, or kottais as they are called are mud-walled affairs with thick thatched roofs made from a mixture of jungle grass and the stalks of 'cholam' grain. A small rose and croton garden fronts them. At that time I had about three dozen fowls, including leghorns, rhodes and black minorcas, and a few ducks. My drinking-water comes from a small well into which I introduced some fish, which I had originally brought from Bangalore to keep the water clean. A small stream in front forms one of my boundaries, and bamboo trees line the other three sides. Although such a small place, it is extremely 'cosy', and an ideal retreat for a quiet Sunday visit from Bangalore.

About half the land is low-lying and borders the stream I have just mentioned. I have tapped some water from this rivulet and grown a variety of black rice, known as 'Pegu rice' and originally imported from Burma. To my knowledge, my farm was one of the very few spots in southern India where this black Burma-rice then grew. I knew it had been sown in many places, but its cultivation had proved a failure for one reason or another.

An interesting feature about this farm was a story that one of the two kottais was haunted by the ghost of the brother of the Anglo-Indian lady from whom I had purchased it in 1941, lock, stock and barrel, poultry included, for the sum of Rs. 500/-; about £35 in English money. This man had died of a reputedly mysterious disease which I was told occurred in sudden attacks of excruciating pain in his left arm and chest—probably angina pectoris. He had been very much attached to the small farm and was said to have spent over twenty-five years there after purchasing it as waste land. Then he gave it to his sister, as he had no family of his own. However, as the story went, after his death, passing villagers had frequently seen him standing before his kottai in the evenings just as dusk was falling. Thereafter, needless to say, the villagers avoided the place.

His sister told me nothing about the alleged haunting till the day after I had purchased the farm and paid the cash before the sub-registrar when I had registered the sale deed, probably thinking the 'ghost' would put me off the transaction. Then she told me that her dead brother would sometimes roam about the two kottais at night, and also that she had clearly seen him many times in the moonlight attending the rose trees which had been his special hobby. She hastened to add that the 'spirit' was quite harmless, made no sound or troublesome manifestation, and just faded away if approached.

I have failed to mention that some very ancient furniture came to me with the kottais: a bed in each building, a broken-down dressing table, two almirahs and some three or four rather rickety chairs. The beds were of the old-fashioned sort, having battens.

I well remember the first night I slept in one of the kottais (incidentally the one in which the brother had died), for it was a rainy night and the roof of the other kottai was leaking. I had spread my bedroll, without mattress, on the battened cot and had lain down to sleep. The hard battens, however, were irksome and pressed against my shoulder blades and back. After failing to woo slumber for some time, I had decided that the floor would be far more comfortable. Of course, there were no electric lights, so I had lighted a candle to enable me to remove the bedroll and place it on the floor, when I had extinguished the candle and lain down to sleep. This time I was successful and had fallen asleep immediately.

I do not know when I awoke. It was pitch dark. Something heavy and cold and clammy moved and rested against my throat, and what seemed like two icy wet fingers extended across either side of my neck.

Now I am not an imaginative person. I am not afraid of the dark. Nor am I superstitious. But in a rush of memory I recollected the dead brother and his ghost, the fact that I had left my torch on the windowsill some feet away, and also that I did not know where I had left the matchbox. These thoughts came simultaneously, while the cold clammy wet thing distinctly moved and seemed to press its two extended fingers even more tightly on either side of my throat. I could feel my hair rising. To lie there any longer was impossible. With what seemed superhuman energy I scrambled to my feet and dashed towards the unfamiliar windowsill where I had left my torch. Probing wildly in the dark, I at last found that elusive torch. I pressed the button, expecting to see the ghost and its clammy hands, cold from the grave, before me! Instead, there on the floor was quite the largest toad I had ever seen in my life. A huge, black, slimy fellow, almost a foot long. He had come into the kottai because of the rain.

This just goes to show what human nerves can do. Hardly a few seconds earlier I had been scared stiff by the thought of the supernatural and the unknown. Now I laughed to myself as I guided the toad with the toe of my slippered foot to the door of the kottai, and then out into the rain.

Next morning all three donkey baits were alive, and so I spent the day on my land. No one had any news to give about the panther. Another night passed and the following morning found all three of the donkeys still in the land of the living. This time there was a little news. After the death of the mail-carrier the post was conveyed up the hill by three men instead of one, the party consisting of the relief mail-carrier who had replaced the poor fellow that had been killed, together with two chowkidars—literally, 'watchmen'—who had been pressed into service to accompany him as bodyguards. They were armed with crude spears in addition to the 'emblem of office' spear which had once been the equipment of the deceased mail-carrier and now automatically fell to his successor.

These three men excitedly reported at the village that they had seen a panther sunning himself on the ledge of a rock about a quarter of a mile downhill from the place where the previous mail-carrier had been done to death.

Upon hearing this news the Patel had despatched a villager to run and tell me. Taking my rifle, I accompanied him back to the village, where both the chowkidars offered to come along with me to point out the rock. We covered the distance of a little over two miles in good time. But only the bare rock-ledge stared us in the face. The panther that had been lying there, man-eater or otherwise, had gone, and it was too hot, too rocky and too hopeless to search for him among the piles of boulders. However, the news was encouraging, as it indicated the panther was still in the vicinity. Before returning to the village and my small farm, I once again examined the bait under the cashew tree and mentally selected the branch on which I would fix my machan if occasion arose.

That night brought good luck, though bad for the donkey beneath the cashew-nut tree, for the panther killed and ate about half of him during the hours of darkness.

Early next morning this fact was discovered by the party of men whom I had delegated to inspect, feed and water each one of the three baits in turn. They came back and told me, after having taken the precaution to cover the remains of the donkey with branches to protect it from being devoured to the bones by vultures.

I finished an early lunch and with my greatcoat, torch and flask of tea and some biscuit, proceeded to the village, where I readily obtained the loan of a charpoy from the Patel. Four willing helpers carried this to the cashew-nut tree, where it was slung up and secured with the ropes we had brought along with us. I personally supervised the camouflaging of the charpoy with small branches and leaves, till it was invisible from every direction, as well as from below. That this job should be done very thoroughly was, I knew, most essential when dealing with man-eating carnivora. The slightest carelessness might make all the difference between success and failure. A leaf turned the other way, with its under-surface showing uppermost, or any portion of the charpoy being visible from any angle, a remnant of twigs or fallen leaves at the base of the tree, any of these would be sufficient to arouse the suspicion of a man-eater, which is always extremely cautious in returning to its kill.

All arrangements were eventually completed to my satisfaction, and the only fault that I could find was that the machan was rather low, not more than ten feet from the ground. Also that the cashew-nut tree was easy to climb. It was about two-thirty in the afternoon when the party of men who had accompanied me left, after I had instructed them to return at dawn in case I did not go back to the village myself during the night.

I sat back on the machan and made myself as comfortable as possible.

It was a sweltering afternoon, the heat being reflected by the boulders that were piled around in all directions. The tree itself afforded little protection from the afternoon sun that beat down upon me. Indeed, I was glad when evening approached and the sun began sinking towards the Mysore plateau to the west. Far below me I could see Jalarpet railway station on the plains, and the puffs of cream-coloured smoke from the shunting-engines in the yard. At intervals a train would arrive or leave, and the whistles of the locomotives could be clearly heard. All else was silent.

Towards dusk a single peacock wailed in the distance and a couple of nightjars flitted around the tree. Except for them there were no signs of any other animals or birds.

Then the shadows of night descended. Sitting on the slope of the hill facing the west, I could see the plains grow dark as if covered by a black mantle, while yet the last vestiges of daylight lingered on the hilltop above me. The lights of Jalarpet began to twinkle one by one, prominent among them being the blue-tinted neon lamps of the station platforms and shunting yards. Here and there I could make out the red and green lights of the railway signals. From the north a train rolled towards Jalarpet, the bright headlamp of the engine cutting a swath of light before it. Then the train encountered an incline and the engine began to labour under its load. 'If she can do it … I can do it … if she can do it … I can do it.' Her puffs as she struggled to top the rise formed the words in my imagination, and I listened to the clanking of her worn big-end bearings. All these sounds seemed so close to me—and yet they were so far; they were over five miles away at least, as the crow flies.

Darkness fell around me. It was a moonless night. The heavy clouds scuttled across the sky, some of them merging with the tops of the Yellagiri range. No friendly stars shone down, and the darkness became intense. I would have to rely on my sense of hearing.

Insects were conspicuous by their absence, and even the friendly chirp of the wood-cricket was not to be heard. I sat still on the cot. Now and then a passing mosquito buzzed around my head, to settle on some part of my face or hands. Then came the faint sharp sting of pain as it imbedded its needle-pointed proboscis into my skin. I would move my fingers or hand a little, or noiselessly blow against my own face by slightly protruding my lower lip. This would disturb the mosquito, which would either go on its way or fly around in a further effort to take another bite at me.

I am accustomed to sitting up in the jungle on machans or in hide-outs and so lost count of the time, for in any case it served no purpose to keep looking at my wristwatch unnecessarily. I could not anyway make time pass quicker.

Thoughts of all kinds creep into a man's mind on such occasions, some pleasant, some otherwise, and some reminiscent. I remember that, that evening, for some unaccountable reason, I began thinking of some way of inventing a new sort of bicycle, something that one could propel fast and for long distances with the minimum of effort. Is it not strange what the human mind may think of when it is forced to be idle?

My reveries concerning this bicycle were disturbed by what seemed like a faint sigh. I knew the panther had arrived and was standing over the dead donkey. The muffled sound I had heard had been made by his expelled breath as he slightly opened his mouth.

I reasoned that to switch on my torch and fire at this juncture might be premature. Better to let him settle down to his meal. I wish I hadn't, for in doing so I lost what might have been a successful shot, and caused the death of another human being.

I waited expectantly for the sound of the meat being torn, and bones being crunched, which would have assured me that the panther was tucking in at the donkey, but instead I heard nothing. The moments slipped by and then I became uncomfortably suspicious that something had gone wrong.

I know from experience how noiseless any of the carnivora can be when they want to; particularly a panther which can come and go not only soundlessly, but also without being seen, and that too in broad daylight. Under the present conditions of intense darkness this animal might have been a yard away, or a mile away, for all the difference it made in that gloom.

I glanced down at the luminous dial of my watch, which showed that it was twenty minutes to nine. I waited without moving. Nine o'clock came and passed, and then, from a section of boulders to my right, I heard a deep growl, followed in a few seconds by another.

Somehow the panther had become aware of my presence. He could not have smelt me, as panthers have little or no sense of smell. He could not have heard me, for I had made no sound. Therefore, he had either looked up inadvertently and become aware of the machan, or some intuition had warned him. In either case, he now knew a human being was there. He might then have tried climbing up into the tree to pull me down, but as likely as not his sense of self-preservation had warned him that this particular human being was dangerous to him and not of the same sort as the men he had killed.

Of course, this panther might not be a man-eater, although in the light of his present conduct this seemed the less reasonable explanation.

The growls were initially intended as a warning. As they increased they were also clearly meant to bolster up the animal's own courage. Perhaps he would lash himself into a fury after a sufficient number of growls to attack the tree on which I was sitting and try to climb up. As I have had occasion to remark before, panthers frequently do this with monkeys, whom they terrify with a series of loud growls before rushing at the trunk of the tree. Then the monkeys generally fall off or jump down in sheer terror. As likely as not he expected the noise he was making to have the same demoralising effect on me.

Very soon the growls increased both in volume and tempo. The panther was now making a terrific noise. As I had just thought, he was either trying to frighten me away completely or off my perch; alternatively, he was building up his own courage to rush the tree. I prepared for the latter eventuality.

Some more minutes of this sort of thing went on and then out he came with the peculiar coughing roar made by every charging panther. As he reached the base of the cashew-nut tree I leaned over the edge of the cot, pushing aside the camouflaging twigs to point the rifle downwards while depressing the switch of my torch. I knew I had to be quick because, as I have told you, the machan was only about ten feet off the ground and, the tree being easy to climb, the panther would reach me in no time.

As bad luck would have it, one of the camouflaging branches fell down upon the panther. No doubt this served to delay, if not actually to deter, his progress up the tree. But it also served to screen him completely from the light of the torch. As I looked downwards I just saw the branch shaking violently and guessed that it covered the panther.

At that moment I did a foolish thing. Instead of waiting till the animal could break clear of the offending branch, I quickly aimed at the spot where I felt his body would be and pressed the trigger. The report of the shot was followed by the sound of a falling body as the panther went hurtling backwards to the ground. For a second I thought I had succeeded in killing him, but that thought lasted only for a second, for no sooner did he touch the ground than he jumped clear of the branch in which he had become entangled, and I caught a momentary glimpse of his yellow form leaping into the undergrowth before I had a chance to work the underlever that would reload my rifle.

I shone the torch at the spot where he had disappeared, but neither sight nor sound of him or his further progress came to me. Silence reigned supreme. He might be lying dead in the bushes, or he might be wounded there, or he might have disappeared and be a long way off. There was no way of knowing.

I continued to shine the torch around for some time and then decided to sit in darkness in the hope of hearing some sound of movement. But there was absolutely nothing. I waited for another hour and then made up my mind to fire a shot into the bushes in the direction in which he had gone, hoping it would elicit some reaction if he were lying there wounded. So, switching on the torch, I fired the rifle at the approximate spot where he had vanished. The crash of the report reverberated and echoed against the hillside, but there was no sound or response from the panther.

A goods train started from Jalarpet and began to climb the gradient to Mulanur on the ghat section that led to Bangalore. The banking engine at the rear, whose duty it was to help by pushing till the top of the gradient was reached, began to push vigorously and its puffing and clanking eclipsed the sounds made by the engine at the front, whose driver was perhaps taking it easy because of the ready help behind him.

I waited until 11.30 p.m. The loud whistling from the engine of the incoming Madras-Cochin Express decided me to come down from the tree and go back to my kottai for a comfortable night's sleep. I felt quite safe in doing this as, had the panther been wounded and in the vicinity, he would have responded to the noise of my last shot. Either he was dead or far away. Even if he had been lying in wait, that last shot would have frightened him off.

I came down from the cashew-nut tree and by the light of my torch made my way back to the village, where, before going on to my kottai, I related all that had happened to the Patel and the excited villagers.

Early next morning I came back to the village, where at least twenty willing men assembled and offered to help me. They in turn, under my advice and directions, gathered half-a-dozen village curs. Thus, safe and strong in numbers, we proceeded to the cashew-nut tree and the site of the previous night's occurrences.

The remains of the donkey had been untouched. A hole in the ground, directly below the tree, showed where my bullet had buried itself in the earth, nor was a speck of blood to be seen anywhere. We thoroughly searched among the bushes into which the panther had disappeared and into which I had fired my second shot, as well as the surrounding boulders and bushes for quite a wide area, but it was clear that I had missed entirely and that my bullet of the night before had failed to score the lucky hit I had hoped for. The panther had got completely away.

Ill-tempered and disgusted with myself, I returned with the men to the village, where I told the Patel that my time was up and that I would have to return to Bangalore. However, I asked him to send me another telegram should there be further developments. Then I went to the kottai, gathered my belongings and packed them in my haversack, and soon was repassing the cashew-nut tree on my descent to Jalarpet, where I caught the evening express from Madras that got me home by eight-fifteen the same night.

That was the end of the first round of my encounter with the Yellagiri man-eating panther.

Contrary to expectations, I heard nothing more from the Patel. When two months had elapsed I wrote him a letter and received a reply within a few days stating that there had been no further news of the animal. This made me think that it may have relinquished its man-eating habits or have crossed over to the Javadi range of hills which lay scarcely fifteen miles south of the Yellagiris. On the other hand, had the latter been the case I would still have heard through the Press or by government notification if any people had been killed on the Javadi Hills. I was therefore inclined to the former theory and felt that the panther had given up his tendency to attack human beings. Of course, my chance shot might have found its mark, and the animal may have crept away to die in some secluded place. But this last theory was hardly tenable.

Nine more weeks passed before the next news arrived in the form of a telegram from the Patel, despatched from Jalarpet railway station, stating that the panther had reappeared and once again killed a human being. The telegram asked me to come at once, and with two hours to spare I caught the next train.

This happened to be a slow train which brought me in to Jalarpet station at about half-past eight that night. There was no purpose in my climbing the hill immediately, for there was nothing I could do just then; so I decided to take a few hours' sleep in the waiting-room and make the ascent at dawn. This plan did not prove very successful, however. To begin with, the noise of the passing trains disturbed me each time I fell asleep, being a light sleeper. Secondly, the attacks of mosquitoes and bedbugs, with which the chair seemed to abound, impelled me to walk about the platform, which I did till five in the morning, when I set off for the foot of the Yellagiris about two miles away. It was dawn as I began the climb and I reached the Patel's village by 7.15 am.

My friend the Patel greeted me with his usual hospitality and brass 'chumbo' of heavily milked, hot coffee. Then he told me that the panther had attacked and killed a young woman three mornings previously, when she had gone to draw water from a stream running past the base of Periyamalai hill. He also informed me that the people of the village to which the girl had belonged had arrived shortly afterwards and recovered the remains of the victim for cremation. Apparently the panther had eaten but little of the unfortunate woman, perhaps because it had been disturbed by the party of men searching for her and had not had time to settle down to his meal.

This time I decided to tie a live bait in the form of a goat and sit up over it, as my stay on the Yellagiris could not exceed four days, as I had only that much leave. So the Patel offered to procure one for me from the same neighbouring village where he had got them the last time, but said that it would cost a tidy sum of money—about twenty rupees—as not only were goats scarce on the Yellagiris but their owners in that village, which was about three miles away, had become aware of the demand and had raised their prices accordingly. I agreed and handed over the money, and in the time that it would take for the goat to be brought, went down to my farm to see how things were getting along.

At noon, after consuming the cold lunch I had brought with me from Bangalore, I returned to the Patel's village only to find that the goat had not yet arrived.

It was two in the afternoon before the man who had been sent to fetch the animal returned with a black goat that was rather old, in the sense that it was past the stage where it would bleat for a long time when left alone, and so help to attract the panther. Secondly, as I have said, it was a black goat. Black or white goats occasionally cause suspicion among certain panthers. A brown bait, whether goat, dog or bull, is generally the best to use, in that they resemble in colour the wild animals that form the panther's natural food. However, there was no time now to change the goat and I would have to make the best of circumstances.

The Patel and four or five men accompanied me, the latter carrying axes, ropes and the same charpoy I had used on the last occasion. We reached the village to which the girl had belonged in a little under an hour. There another couple of men joined my party, who offered to point out the exact spot at which the young woman had been killed.

It was perhaps three-quarters of a mile from the village. A stream, bearing a trickle of water, ran from west to east and skirted the base of Periamalai Hill perhaps a half-mile away. This stream was sandy and bordered by a thick outcrop of mixed lantana and wait-a-bit thorns. At the spot where the girl had been attacked a shallow hole had been dug by the villagers to form a pool for watering their cattle when the weather became dry and the rest of the stream ceased to flow. It was to this place that the girl had come for water when she had been killed the previous day. The lantana grew quite close to the pool, and it was evident that the man-eater had stalked her under cover of this thicket, and from there had made his final pounce.

As matters stood, this panther had again confirmed that he was most unusual in his habits, even for a man-eater. He had repeatedly attacked his human victim in broad daylight. Only tigers do this, as man-eating panthers, being inherent cowards at heart, usually confine their activities to the hours of darkness. I was inclined to think that this animal was perhaps already lying up in the thicket before the girl arrived and could not resist the temptation of a meal so readily offered.

With this idea in mind, I went down on hands and knees and began a close examination of the lantana bushes and the ground in the vicinity, where I shortly found confirmation of my theory, for one of the bushes provided ample shelter for a regular lie-up. Beneath it the carpet of dried lantana leaves rendered impossible the chance of finding any visible track, but a faintly prevailing odour of wild animal inclined me to confirm my guess as correct, and that the panther used this place now and then to lie up, as it offered ideal proximity for attack on any prey that might approach the pool to drink.

This was encouraging for, if the panther had used it before, there was every likelihood that he would use it again. Further, as I have already told you, Periamalai Hill lay about half a mile away. The panther might have his regular den among the rocks and caves higher up the hill and would find this lantana lair a most convenient place in which to await the coming of an unsuspecting victim.

As I studied these conditions an idea suddenly came to me. I would create a scene as close as possible to what the panther might expect it to be. I would tether the goat to a stake beside the pool to make it appear like an animal that had come there to drink. And I would forestall the panther's arrival by hiding myself beneath that very same lantana bush. Should he hear the goat, or catch a glimpse of it from higher up the hill, from where it would be clearly visible, he would make straight for this point of attack and would find me waiting for him.

I explained my idea to the Patel and the men who had acompanied me. They thought it clever, but the Patel decided it was foolish, in that it entailed too great a risk. I convinced him that there was really little danger as, due to the denseness of the surrounding lantana and the thickness of the bush itself, the panther would have difficulty in getting at me from any of the sides or rear, and could only reach me through the entrance to this under-cover shelter, while I would be expecting him to arrive from that direction and would be ready. Further, his attention would be concentrated on the goat and he would scarcely suspect an enemy would await him in his own lair.

The stake which we had brought along was accordingly hammered deep into the sand with the aid of a stone from the streambed. I crept under the bush and took my time in making myself quite comfortable for the night. I also clamped the torch to the barrel of my rifle, and tested it to see that it was in good order. This torch I had lately purchased. It was a three-cell arrangement of the fixed-focus type. Finally, I took a long drink of tea from my water-bottle before ordering the men to tether the goat to the stake by its hind legs.

While all these preliminaries were going on the goat had been kept some distance away, so that it should not come to know that a human being was sheltering in the bushes so close by; for once it knew that, there was very little chance of it bleating from a sense of loneliness. On the other hand, if the goat really felt it had been left alone, there was much more reason why it should cry out.

While the goat was being tied I remained perfectly silent. After finishing their job, the Patel and his men went away and I was left by myself to await what might happen.

It was hot and still beneath the lantana, and long before sunset it was quite dark where I was sitting. The goat had bleated a few times at the beginning and then had stopped. I could only hope that it would begin calling again when darkness fell. But I was sorely disappointed. Occasionally I had heard the sounds made by the goat as it kicked and struggled against the tethering rope, but these had now lapsed into silence and I came to the inevitable conclusion that the damned animal had gone to sleep.

Of necessity, in my position I had to keep wide awake and alert the whole night and could not share the goat's slumbers. I envied that blasted goat.

Mosquitoes worried me, and insects of all kinds ran over my body. Bush mice, which are even smaller than the domestic variety, rustled the leaves and crept along the stems of the lantana. Once something long and soft slithered through the dry leaves and along the sides of the bush. It was a snake. Whether harmless or poisonous I could not know. I sat absolutely motionless in spite of the mosquitoes and insects, and the slithering died away.

The panther did not come. No sounds penetrated the silence under the bush, not even the calls of a night-bird. Time moved on its long and tedious course. The luminous hands of my wristwatch very slowly clocked the passing hours. I felt drowsy but dared not give in to my inclination to close my eyes even for a few fitful seconds. I tried to think of other things and other events to get my mind off the panther. The only thing I could think of was to damn the goat.

The greying light of a new day gradually filtered in, not even heralded by the call of a jungle fowl, peafowl, or any other bird. I came out of that bush the most disgusted man in the whole of India. The goat, which had been lying curled up and fast asleep by the stake, lazily got to its feet, stretched leisurely, wagged its stumpy tail and regarded me in a quizzical fashion as much as to say, 'Come now, who is the real goat, you or me?' Knowing the answer, I refrained from a spoken confession.

Instead, I untethered that wretched animal, which followed me back to the village where the Patel lived. That worthy, with the same party of men who had accompanied us the day before, was just about to set forth to see how I had fared. Telling him to return the black goat, I said that I would snatch a few hours' sleep and then go myself to find a more satisfactory bait. I went to my kottai and slept till noon.

I was feeling hungry when I awoke, so I opened a tin of salmon, which I ate with some bread I had brought with me from Bangalore. The bread had become rather dry, but was improved by the tinned butter I spread thickly upon it. This served to fill me for lunch. I had already set my portable Primus stove to boil water for tea and the beverage was indeed refreshing. While eating my lunch I brewed a second kettle of tea to put into my water-bottle. Gathering the necessary equipment for another night's vigil, I returned to the Patel's village. Fortunately the weather was warm as the previous night, so that an overcoat was unnecessary.

I took the Patel along with me to add force to my argument, and walked to the village where the goats were available. There, after some picking and choosing, followed by some red-hot bargaining, I was able to select a half-grown animal that was more likely to bleat. It was past 3.30 p.m. when we set out for the place where I had sat up the night before, but really there was no hurry, as the spot had already been selected and there was no machan to fix.

Before five o'clock I had crept into the bush, the new goat was tethered and the men were on their way back.

Hardly were they out of sight and earshot than the goat began to bleat, and he kept this up incessantly. I silently congratulated myself on my selection.

With evening it again became quite dark beneath the lantana, the goat called loudly and I waited expectantly for the panther. An hour passed. Then I heard an almost imperceptible rustle, the faintest sound of a dry twig being trodden upon, and I sensed the panther was coming. The crucial moment had almost arrived. Now I had to be careful not to shine the torch before the panther was fully in view. If I did so, I knew he would disappear. On the other hand, if I delayed too long, he might see me first and perhaps make a charge, or even vanish.

With all my senses at full stretch, I waited. There were no fresh rustlings or other sounds. Then I heard a faint hiss. Instinctively I knew the panther had seen or sensed me. He had curled back his lips in a snarl, preparatory to the growl that would most likely follow. That curling of his lips had occasioned the slight hissing sound I had heard. It was now or never. My thumb went down on the switch-button of the torch. Its beam sprang right into the twin reddish-white eyes of the panther. I could clearly see his face and chest perhaps ten feet away. Aiming quickly at the throat I pressed the trigger of the Winchester. The panther appeared to come forward a pace. Then he reared up on his hind legs, but not before my second bullet took him full in the chest. He fell over backwards out of sight and threshed the bushes for a few seconds. Next came the unmistakable gurgling sounds of a dying animal; then silence.

I waited another half-hour before deciding to take the risk of leaving the bush. I thought it reasonably safe to do so, as I was almost sure the panther was dead. Holding the cocked rifle before me, I crawled out of cover and stood beside the goat. My first impulse was to cut it loose and take it in tow along with me. Then the thought came to my mind that the panther I had fired at might not have been the man-eater after all, but just an ordinary animal. If that were so, I would need to exercise every precaution in returning to the Patel's village in the darkness and could not afford to hamper myself by leading a goat that would necessarily distract my attention. So I left it where it was and set out for the Patel's abode, where I arrived after slow and cautious walking. The people were still awake and I told them what had happened. Then I went to my kottai for a sound night's sleep.

Next morning we found the panther where he had fallen. An old male, with a somewhat craggy and pale coat, he showed every sign of being the man-eater, for his canine teeth were worn down with old age and his claws were blunt and frayed.

But only time would tell whether I had bagged the real culprit.

By noon I was on my way down the hill with his pelt.

Many years have elapsed since that incident took place, but no more people have been killed on either the Yellagiri or Javadi ranges, and so I am reasonably sure I succeeded that night in bringing the man-eater to bag.

Three

Old Munuswamy and the Panther of Magadi

THE TOWN OF BANGALORE, WHERE I LIVE, LIES PRACTICALLY IN THE centre of a straight line drawn from the city of Madras, on the east coast of India bordering the Bay of Bengal, to the town of Mangalore, on the west coast bordering the Arabian Sea. Bangalore is on a plateau just over three thousand feet above mean sea level. Nobody who has lived there can ever forget its; unique climate—neither too hot nor too cold, and neither too rainy nor too dry—with lovely misty mornings in the cold weather, from November to the middle of February, and with bracing cool mornings even in summer. The name, Bangalore, is an Anglicised version of the Kanarese words 'bengal uru' meaning 'bean town' as translated literally, whence it has become known as the 'city of beans'; and nobody who has eaten them can ever forget Bangalore's luscious fruits and vegetables of both tropical and European varieties.

Bangalore was far from being a city until the end of the Second World War, when its strategic military position, its great potential to grow into a large industrial city, and all its other assets have joined together to make it the most popular place in India. Following a wide influx of refugees both during and after the war, it has trebled its population, has become highly industrialised and is now a fast-growing city.

But this is not going to be a description of the merits of Bangalore; it was merely to say that I live in a very beautiful city. Bangalore is built on a number of hills, and if you stand on any one of them and look around, you will see three very high hills on the horizon, respectively to the north, the northwest and the west. They are all within a radius of thirty-five miles and each is above four thousand feet in height. The hill to the north is the highest. It is really not one but three hills, consisting of three peaks together which make up the Nundydroog group. 'Droog' means 'hill fortress', and the easternmost of these three peaks is crowned by the remains of an old fort, still in a good state of repair, built by that redoubtable Mahommedan warrior Tippoo Sultan, the 'Tiger of Mysore'. It embraces a point overlooking a sheer drop of some 600 feet. This is known as 'Tipoo's Drop', because it was here that this hoary soldier dispensed with those who annoyed him by making them walk, blindfolded, on a narrow swaying plank out over the abyss. If they could walk to the end of the plank and return, they were spared. There seems to be no record of anyone accomplishing this feat. Perhaps the plank swayed too much—or maybe it was made to sway too much. Who knows? Historians are not very clear on this point.

To the northwest of Bangalore is the hill called Sivanaganga. It has a temple at the summit and is a place of pilgrimage for Hindus. It also has a well at the top that is said to be so deep that it is bottomless. Another version is that this well is the beginning of a secret underground passage running all the thirty-five miles to Bangalore.

The third hill to the west is known as Magadi Hill. Viewed from the rising ground in Bangalore it appears to be sugar-loaded in shape; but when you get there you find it has two humps like a dromedary. Between them is a heavily-wooded valley difficult to enter, for the approaches are slippery; if you should slip, you will not end much better off than did those blindfolded prisoners with whom Tippoo amused himself on Nundydroog.

This is the valley that brings me to the beginning of the story, for it was here that the panther that terrorized Magadi was said to have his cave.

Magadi hill is surrounded by gorgeously wooded and hilly country. To the south lies a stretch of reserved forest, covering a series of hills, extending southwards for over seventy miles to the Cauvery river, near a place called Sangam. Not all of this area is reserved forest, but a large part is, while the rest is thickly covered with scrub jungle. About midway down this line of hills, and between the towns of Closepet and Kankanhalli, the peaks cluster particularly high and closely, and the area swarms with panthers. This hunting ground is my son, Donald's, particular paradise. He has shot forty panthers there and over a dozen bear, I think, and he is little more than twenty-three years old.

To the west of Magadi hill are plains of low scrub. Black-buck, hare, peafowl, partridge and quail abound. The hills continue to the north, but there they are much lower. To the east lies more hilly country, and Bangalore, about thirty-five miles away. The Arkravarthy river, a comparatively small stream, crosses the road to Bangalore near the twenty-three milestone, and it has been dammed just there. The catchment area is big enough to ensure an ample supply of water to Bangalore throughout the driest year. This dam is known as Tippagondahalli, and huge pumps send the water the remaining twenty-three miles to Bangalore.

There you have the full setting of the country where this leopard first appeared. It must not be thought that there is anything special about this animal because I have used the name 'leopard'. A leopard and a panther are one and the same creature. For no good reason that I know of, in India we more often call them panthers.

The events that I am going to relate took place before the last war.

This panther killed some goats and a village cur or two at some of the few scattered hamlets that lie at the foot of Magadi hill. Nobody took much notice of him, for panthers had been doing that sort of thing in that part of the country for generations and generations of panthers and the people have grown up with them.

Time passed and he grew more confident of himself. He killed some young bulls—and some cows too.

Now the bull is a sacred animal in India and no Hindu will touch his flesh. Nevertheless, the bull does all the hard work. He ploughs the fields and he draws the bullock-carts. He even turns the huge stone wheels that grind chunam or limestone. But with all his many uses and considerable value, people do not begrudge a panther eating one of their bulls now and again—provided he does not become too greedy. But when he goes in for killing cows—which supply milk and butter, from whence comes ' ghee', which is melted butter and a cooking medium used throughout the length and breadth of the country and of much value—he commits an unpardonable offence and it is high time something is done.

In Bangalore there lives—and I use the present tense because he is still there—an individual named 'Munuswamy', who claims to be a professional 'gentleman's shikari' guide. He is also a rogue. He brings in items of shikar news to town and passes them on to novices and greenhorns in the game. 'Master, there is herd of forty wild pigs can shoot near Whitefield, only twelve miles away.' Or, 'Master, on tenth mile on Magadi Road and eighteenth mile on road to Mysore City there plenty herds of black bucks got, fifty animals in each, which master very easily can shoot.' He demands a reasonable advance of money for the information, and should he turn up on the day appointed to accompany the novice to the place, the latter generally wonders what has become of those many wild pigs and blackbuck that were said to abound. But do not underestimate Munuswamy for a moment. He is quick-witted and a ready liar. 'See, master,' he will say, 'I told you come soon long time back. You no come. Only yesterday big crowd military officer sahibs come in car. Them shoot two pigs. All run away now. Master come again another day, eh?'

Wild pigs and blackbuck are only 'chicken feed' to Munuswamy. To see him at his best is to watch him bringing news of a panther to some unfortunate greenhorn who is about to learn the lesson of his life. He will present himself at the gate of the bungalow, or accost the sahib on the road, with somethihg like this: 'Sar, me big gentleman-shikari-guide. Me show master blackbucks, wild pigs, peacocks, hares, partridge and green pigeons. Or master like snipes and wild ducks? Them come plenty, plenty in December month—Kistmiss time got. Master like shoot very very big panther? Him large one got. Only fifteen miles from here, Kankanhalli road. Master give fifteen chips advance, me tie live donkey. Panther kill donkey, me come tell Master. Me also build machan very fine. Master shoot panther very easy.'

The novice is astounded. Only fifteen rupees for a live-bait? A panther only fifteen miles away? Who said hunting was an expensive or difficult hobby?

So the fifteen rupees are handed over to Munuswamy, who then remembers that master must give him another two rupees towards his food and three rupees for bus charge, when he brings master news of the kill. The greenhorn thinks this is very reasonable and forks out another five rupees. Munuswamy goes away most contented.

His first call is at one of the many local toddy-shops. He drinks only 'toddy' and eschews spirits in the form of 'arrack', which he says is too strong for him anyhow. But he drinks three bottles of toddy. This is the fermented juice of the coconut palm. Then old Munuswamy goes into a deep sleep.

The next day he wakes up and sets about the business of baiting the 'panther' in right earnest.

In Bangalore there are two animal 'pounds' for stray cattle, dogs and donkeys. The official charge for reclaiming your donkey, if it has been so impounded, is one rupee. After an interval of about ten days, unclaimed animals are sold by public auction to repay part of the expenses incurred in feeding them during those ten days. These auctions take place about twice a week, and it is a very simple matter for Munuswamy to attend one of them and purchase a donkey for about two rupees. Or he may even wrongfully pose as the owner of one of the impounded animals and claim possession of it. After all, one donkey looks much alike another, and there is no means by which the official in charge can test the truth of Munuswamy's claim, particularly if he sends a friend or agent to make it.

So Munuswamy gets the donkey, for which the sahib paid him fifteen rupees, for only two rupees, thereby making a profit of thirteen rupees, representing a potential 650 per cent on his initial outlay. A good beginning indeed.

Then he sets out on a long walk of some miles to wherever he has told the sahib the panther is to be found and ties the donkey there for a couple of days. Early in the morning of the third day or so he kills the donkey himself. This is how he does it. He has one of those huge penknives that incorporate about a dozen appurtenances, among them a round sharp-pointed instrument originally intended to be used, I believe, for removing stones from horses' hooves. At least this is what I am told, but I am not quite sure myself. With this crude instrument, he stabs the unfortunate animal in its jugular vein, and when it falls down, he stabs it again, making four wounds in all, two on each side of the throat. With the blade end of the same pen-knife he cuts open the belly, scatters the entrails about and tears off some chunks of flesh from the outer skin. Then he covers the carcass with branches. Lastly, he removes from a dirty bag he has brought with him a mysterious object. Can you guess what it is? This is Munuswamy's ace trick. It is a panther's paw, crudely stuffed with straw. With this he makes a series of 'pug-marks' here and there.

With the scene set to his expert satisfaction, for a few annas Munuswamy thumbs a lift to town in a lorry, and in great excitement summons the sahib. The greenhorn becomes excited too. In frantic haste he makes the 'missus' prepare sandwiches for him and tea for his thermos flask, while he himself cleans his rifle, assembles rounds, torchlight, batteries and a number of other odds and ends—most of which he never uses and are quite useless anyhow. Then away he drives with Munuswamy at high speed to the place where, the 'panther' has 'killed'.

Munuswamy points out the 'pug-marks' on the ground and the panther's 'teeth-marks' on the donkey's throat, and the sahib is convinced. He also arranges a machan to be tied, using two coolies to do so, for whose services he charges two rupees each, though he pays them only twelve annas. Finally, before the sahib ascends, he strikes a bargain. If master shoots the panther, he must give Munuswamy twenty rupees baksheesh. If master misses—that is master's own fault —he must give his faithful retainer ten rupes. If the panther does not turn up—master should not forget that panthers are very, very cunning animals and sometimes don't return to a kill—well, he, Munuswamy has worked very hard in the hot sun for master's sake and must get five rupees. The bargain is struck.

Strangely enough, Munuswamy trusts master, just as much as he expects master to trust him.

Well, the panther doesn't come—for the best of reasons: there is no panther. Munuswamy takes care to pocket his five rupees first, then consoles master by reminding him that panthers are unpredictable creatures and that this one might come next time. He offers to tie another donkey. And so the story goes on and on, till the greenhorn abandons the idea even of seeing one of these most elusive creatures and decides to confine his attention to wild duck or partridge. Even here, Munuswamy is still useful.

You may ask me: 'How do you know all this about Munuswamy?' I was such a greenhorn once and he 'had' me no less than four times. One day an accident occurred—for Munuswamy. He was pointing out the 'pug-marks' to me. A stray cur had been watching us interestedly and suddenly darted into a bush and came out carrying a cloth bag. Munuswamy, in great consternation, gave chase. The dog ran and something spotted dropped out of the bag. Munuswamy rushed for it and so did I. It was a panther's stuffed foot. Then, at the threat of the most violent death—even more violent than the donkey's—he related his modus operandi to me in detail, much as I have told you.

I am a long-suffering individual and believe in the adage to 'live and let live'. If there are greenhorns as foolish as I was, just waiting to be 'plucked'—well, why should Munuswamy not pluck them? So, I have never spoilt his game and Munuswamy rather likes me.

Don't think that, by telling you this, I am spoiling his game now, for Munuswamy assumes a different name each time he presents himself to a new recruit to the band of hunters that abound in Bangalore. He may be Ramiah, Poojah, Pooniah, or have a hundred aliases. But in case you should come to Bangalore at any time and aspire to join our ranks, I will give you one hint about him—a casual description. If an English-speaking 'gentleman's shikari-guide' presents himself to you—a lean, tall, oldish, very black man, with long hair drawn to the back of his head and tied in a knot, and large protruding eyes, whether he is wearing a turban or cap, dhoti, lungothi or baggy trousers or shorts, and even if he says his name is Jack Johnson, keep far from him and lock your purse up safely in a drawer. As likely as not it is my old friend Munuswamy, the happy-go-lucky 'crooked' guide.

In talking about this individual, I am aware that you may think I have strayed very far from my story. But really I have not, because he plays quite a prominent part at the beginning and at the end of it. And I am sure you have enjoyed making the acquaintance of this quite unusual and unique character, anyway.

This Munuswamy had come to hear about the activities of the panther that had begun killing bulls and cows in the Magady Hill area. Do not imagine that, although Munuswamy invariably manufactured his own panthers, he did not know anything about real ones. He did. In years gone by, when he was younger and times were not so hard, he had been a genuine shikari himself and knew a good deal about these animals. So when the information reached him, he went to Magadi by bus and made a first-hand investigation, during which he came to understand the panther had been killing goats and cattle rather frequently.

You will appreciate that because of his methods and the strange fact that nobody who went out shooting with Munuswamy ever saw a panther, and very rarely saw anything else, his reputation as a guide was getting somewhat tarnished. More than half the homes of gentlemen shikaris, both European and Indian, whether experienced or novices, were fast closed to him. This was a very deplorable state of affairs for Munuswamy and reacted directly on his exchequer and consequently upon his stomach. The time had come to remedy it and vindicate himself.

The fact that the panther was killing boldly and frequently should make him easy to bag, and it awoke Munuswamy's latent hunting instincts. He decided that he would shoot the animal and then advertise the fact in town by a procession, in which the panther would be taken around the streets of Bangalore on a bullock-cart to the tune of tom-toms. Even better than that, Munuswamy would have his photograph taken with the panther and present copies to such of his clients as were still on speaking terms. To those who were not he would post copies. On the back of each he would have a short statement to the effect that shikari Munuswamy had shot this panther on such and such a day, at such and such a place, because the sahibs who had come with him had been unable to do so, in spite of all the help he had given them.

The more he thought of it, the more old Munuswamy thrilled to the idea. That would give them something to think about. And it would give a tremendous fillip to his waning reputation.

Having sold his own gun long ago, he somehow contrived to borrow an old hammer-model .12 bore double-barrelled weapon. Then he revisited the scene and told the villagers that he, Munuswamy the old shikari, who had once served with generals and viceroys, had come to shoot the animal that was causing them such loss. He said he intended to live in the village of Magadi, which is situated about four miles northwest of the hill from which it takes its name, and told them to bring him news immediately if any of their animals were killed.

Two days later the news came that the panther had killed another cow. Taking the solitary ball cartridge, and the three others containing

L.G. shot that he had borrowed with the gun, Munuswamy repaired to the spot, tied his machan and shot the panther high up in the shoulder with the ball cartridge. The L.G. in the other barrel—for he had fired both barrels together to make certain—helped to pepper him too, but the panther got away nevertheless. Reviewing the situation later, Munuswamy decided he was too advanced in years to follow wounded panthers. Moreover, the advantages he might get out of the 'propaganda stunt' that had fired his imagination did not now appear to weigh sufficiently against the dangers of following up the blood trail left by the panther. So he decided to call it a day and returned to Bangalore.

Weeks passed, and then the old story, which invariably begins the same way, took its usual course. A panther began to attack dogs and goats outside some of the villages situated beside the twenty-two miles of roadway that stretches outwards from Magadi to Closepet. In two instances the people in charge of the herds had tried to save their goats and had been attacked. A man and a boy had been mauled in this way.

Then a jutka-man and his pony entered the picture. Three persons had detrained one night at Closepet railway station from the night train from Mysore. As there was no bus service at that hour, these three men had decided to travel to their destination, a village ten miles from Closepet, by jutka. A jutka, for those of you who are unfamiliar with the word, is a two-wheeled vehicle covered by an elliptical roof of matting reinforced with bamboos, and is drawn by a small breed of pony especially reared for the purpose. Jutka ponies resemble the ordinary village 'tat', except that they have shorter manes and shorter tails.

The jutka arrived at its destination and unloaded its passengers. The driver decided to sleep in the village and return to Closepet the next morning. He unharnessed his pony and fed it with some of the dried grass he carried in a gunny-bag, slung just below the floor of the vehicle. Then he went to sleep.

The pony evidently finished the grass and began to stray along the village street, hoping to find some more growing there. In this way it came to the outskirts of the village, which was after all a tiny place.

From the back of the last hut along the street something sprang up suddenly against its side, and began to tear at its throat. Neighing shrilly, the pony galloped back up the street. The something that had attacked it had tried to hold on, but had lost its grip on the pony's throat and fallen off, but not before it had inflicted a nasty wound. That something had been the panther.

The sounds made by the terror-stricken pony and the growls of the panther awoke the jutka-owner, who saw his animal rushing towards him. It halted, quivering with fright, blood pouring from its throat. He raised an immediate alarm.

The pony could not haul the jutka; so next day the owner walked it back to Closepet, where he reported the matter to the police. News spread and it became known that the area was threatened by a panther that might any day become a man-eater.

Shortly afterwards a man was pounced upon within two miles of Magadi village itself and badly mauled. Villagers, tending their fields some distance away, rushed to the rescue and found him on the ground, severely bitten and raked by the animal's sharp claws. They carried him into Magadi, and to the Local Fund Hospital there, for attention. A police report was made, and the local police daffedar, whose rank is about equivalent to that of a sergeant, being the most senior officer in the village and in charge of the police chowki or station, set out to make an on-the-spot examination of the evidence given, accompanied by a constable with a bicycle.

He was taken to the place at which the ryots had picked up the injured man. While he was looking at the blood marks and pug-tracks, and perhaps making copious notes in the way that policemen do, somebody looked up and said they could see the panther lying on a rocky outcrop at the top of a small hillock, hardly two furlongs away. The daffedar saw him, borrowed his constable's bicycle, and pedalled furiously back to the village for one of the three service-rifles that formed the entire police armoury there.

Though he pedalled furiously back, by the time he reached the place, his constable and one or two villagers who had remained, said the panther had disappeared over the top of the hill. The villagers told the daffedar that if he cared to make a detour around the hillock—the distance wasn't very great—he might yet be able to cut the panther off on the other side.

The daffedar was nothing if not keen and brave, and, taking one of the villagers along to indicate the short cut, hastened around the hill, loading a single 303 round into the weapon he carried. The constabulary in India are armed with rifles of the same type as the military, with the only difference that the magazines are generally removed, so that only one shell at a time can be fired, thus preventing a trigger-happy copper from using his weapon overenthusiastically at a time of riot of local disturbance. For this reason, the daffedar had only one round to fire with, and two or three others in his pocket.

They came to the other side of the hill, but they found no signs of the panther. Many boulders were scattered about, and the villager suggested they ascend the hill a little, as the panther was probably around somewhere. This they did, and from between or from behind some rocks the panther emerged. The daffedar was taken by surprise and fired from his hip, missing completely. The next second saw him on the ground with the panther on top, biting and clawing at his chest and arms. His companion was in full flight down the hill.

After the few seconds during which it had vented its rage, the panther, which had not yet become a man-eater, left the wounded policeman and sprang back to the shelter of the rocks whence he had come. The badly hurt daffedar lay where the beast had left him.

Meanwhile the fleeing villager ran back to the constable and the other villagers and told them what had happened. The constable leaped upon his bicycle and made for the police station in the village, where he summoned the other three members of the local force and told them their daffedar had probably been killed.

Taking the remaining two rifles from their racks, and two 'lathis' in addition, the four representatives of the law hastened back to the hill, being reinforced as they went along with more and more villagers. A party of over ten people finally picked up the daffedar, who was in a bad way, and carried him back to the Local Fund Hospital. The next day an ambulance was sent for from Bangalore, which conveyed him to the Victoria Hospital in the city.

The reports of the panther's various attacks had all been registered, but when he attacked one of their own force—and a daffedar at that—the police really got busy. It did not take them very long to find out who had been the root of all this trouble, and at this stage, old Munuswamy, the rascally shikari guide, re-entered the scene.

The police caught him. Witnesses had testified that he had built a machan and sat up for the panther. They also said he had wounded it. To have done that he must have used a firearm. Did he have one? Did he possess an Arms Licence? Was he hiding an unlicensed weapon? Did he borrow it? Who from? Why? When? Where? Did the owner have a licence? How many cartridges did he take?

There were a hundred-and-one questions to answer. Altogether, poor Munuswamy could see he was in for a bad time. The number of charges against him, culminating with the statement that if the daffedar died from his wounds he might be charged with 'potential manslaughter',—filled a page and would undoubtedly send him to jail for a long, long time.

Then Munuswamy's inborn initiative came to his rescue and he made his greatest bargain. He undertook to shoot the panther within four days and lay the body at the feet of the district Superintendent of Police (D.S.P.). If he failed, the police could do as they liked with him. If he succeeded, the charges should be forgotten.

The D.S.P., being a practical officer, was more interested in having the panther shot than in prosecuting Munuswamy. For it was obvious that this animal was well on the way to becoming a man-eater;

whereas Munuswamy, with all his rascally ways, was unlikely to rise to such heights of evil fame. So the D.S.P. gave him just four days and let him out of the lock-up.

The same afternoon I heard a voice persistently calling, 'sar, sar', at my front door. It was Munuswamy. With tears rolling down his cheeks —how he got them to flow so instantaneously is a secret which he has not yet confided to me—he related his whole tale of woe from beginning to end, and all the information that he knew or had been able to gather about this panther, much as I have told the story here.

He had just four days in which to shoot the panther, he insisted, failing which he would go to 'big, big jail' as he termed it. Laughingly I asked him why he did not run away. The idea had occurred to him, he admitted, but where else throughout the length and breadth of India would he be able to find such sporting sahibs who gave him money so freely; such obliging auctions where he could pick up live donkeys for as little as two rupees; and, oh! the many other advantages which come with living in Bangalore. The old man broke down at these thoughts and his tears flowed faster than ever. I would not have been surprised to learn that a few of them were genuine.

Would I please help him by shooting this panther? I would be saving him, and oh! so many other people that it might yet kill.

I conceded the latter point, but I told Munuswamy frankly that I wasn't too interested in the former. He was not offended. I said I would help him on one condition: that, as he had undoubtedly been the root of all the trouble, he would have to be beside me and not run away when the panther was shot.

The old boy actually smiled as he agreed. Strangely, his tears had vanished entirely.

That very evening I took him down to the house of the D.S.P., to whom I laughingly recounted the circumstances under which Munuswamy had presented himself. I told the police officer that I did not know if he had really been serious in allowing Munuswamy a reprieve of four days in which to kill the panther, but I pointed out that if this was so, such a time-limit was an encumbrance, as I wanted the old rogue with me to assist, and it would be a nuisance if the police butted in on the fifth day and took him away.

The D.S.P. replied that he had really meant to give him only four days in which to fulfil his undertaking, but in view of what I said he would not interfere so long as I went ahead and tried to bag this animal. He also helped by handing me a letter, calling upon all police officials to whom I might show it to render me every assistance.

Of course I did not tell this to Munuswamy. That would have made him relax his efforts. Instead, I mentioned that the D.S.P. sahib was beginning to regret having allowed him as long as four days and wanted to cut them down to three, but that I had interceded on his behalf and saved the situation in the nick of time.

This made Munuswamy more grateful to me than ever, and as impatient to be off on our trip. In the Studebaker we reached Magadi Hill early the next morning and started making inquiries at the various hamlets at its foot, including the place at which Munuswamy had wounded the panther. Asking questions as we went along, we worked our way right up to Magadi village itself, where I spoke to the police constables who had rescued their daffedar. Thence we set off in the car along the road to Closepet, stopping at each wayside village to ask questions. In this way we came to the village where the panther had attacked the pony, and eventually to Closepet town itself, where the Sub-Inspector of Police, to whom I showed the note given me by the D.S.P., immediately sent for the jutka-man. I interrogated him and he told me what had happened to his pony.

It took until late that evening to ask all these questions, but in spite of them I had found nobody who appeared to know where the panther was likely to be living, or his particular habits. Of course, I knew there was no hurry, but Munuswamy's dark countenance was even more haggard when he realised that one out of his four days of grace had passed already with no substantial results.

We came back to Magadi village that night and slept in the travellers' bungalow.

Early next morning a skinny-looking individual presented himself and stated that he earned a living gathering honey from the hives on the surrounding hills, by collecting herbs and other medicinal roots, and by snaring hare, partridge and quail when he got the opportunity. He said he had been told the night before that I had been around with Munuswamy, seeking information about the panther, and he had come to report that he was almost certain the animal lived in a cave in the recesses of the cleft between the two hummocks of Magadi Hill.

I asked him what made him so certain of this. He replied that some weeks earlier he had been there to collect herbs and had observed that an animal, dripping blood, had crossed some rocks, leaving a distinct trail. Following cautiously, he had found panther pug-marks where the animal had left the rocks. He had then stopped following. Later, he came to know that on the previous day someone had wounded a panther not far away. That somebody had been Munuswamy.

He knew of the cave, having taken honey from beehive in its vicinity many times in the past. A couple of days previously, just after the daffedar had been atacked but before my informant had come to hear of it himself through having been away for a week at Closepet, he had approached the cave to see if the bees had begun to build again. He was some distance away from it when an animal had growled at him. Remembering at once the blood-trail he had found weeks earlier, he had left the valley as fast as he could.

This was news indeed.

I started asking questions, and he undertook to lead me to the cave, provided that I was prepared to creep on hands and knees for a furlong or so through the dense lantana that led to the valley and the cave.

I agreed and told Munuswamy that the time had come for him to fulfil his part of the bargain, which was to accompany me and be in at the killing of the panther, to atone for his sin in having wounded it in the first place.

If I had expected him to show fear, I was mistaken. The police had so terrified him that he was more afraid of the remaining three days running out without bagging our quarry than of facing any panther.

I waited for the sun to become hot, while I ate a leisurely 'chota hazri'. This was in order to allow the panther time to fall asleep for the day within his cave. If I arrived there too early, he might hear me coming and beat a retreat.

We left the bungalow by car at exactly ten o'clock and in less than fifteen minutes reached a point on the road almost opposite the valley between the two hummocks of the hill. The lean man, who had given his name as Allimuthu, indicated that we should have to get out. I parked the car in the shade of a tree just off the road and the three of us got down. I worked the under-lever of my rifle, just to check that it was moving freely. Then Allimuthu, Munuswamy and I set off for the cave.

The hill is about two miles from the road. We reached the base and started climbing towards the valley, which was no longer visible, because of the trees around us. Over their tops I could just see the summits of the two hillocks above, and to the right and left of us.

We climbed for an hour and it was a stiff ascent. Then we came to a veritable sea of lantana bushes which had entirely enveloped the trees and the lesser jungle. This was the place. Alimuthu indicated, where we would have to crawl through and under the lantana for some distance.

I can assure you that covering the next furlong or so of ground was a strenuous effort. We were perspiring and scratched by thorns already as it was. Allimuthu crawled ahead; I followed closely, and Munuswamy was even closer behind. By the time we negotiated that lantana-belt we were dripping with sweat and my khaki shirt and pants were torn in many places. I am sure I left small portions of my face, neck and hands hanging from many of the barbed hooks that serrate each branch of lantana shrub.

We eventually broke free of the belt and entered the valley between the hummocks. It was strewn with boulders everywhere, covered to half their height by spear-grass. Allimuthu whispered that the cave was to the left and about three-fourths of the distance along the valley. It was an impossible place in which to spot a panther, even at a short distance. A dozen tigers would have been equally invisible there.

I took the lead now, with Allimuthu behind and Munuswamy immediately behind him. I kept to the right and skirted the foot of the right-hand hummock, so that if the panther charged from the cave, or any cover to our left, I should have a chance to see it coming. We drew opposite the cave. There was an overhanging cleft in the rock above it. I noticed that this rock was pitted with barnacles of wax that had been the sites of old honeycombs, although there appeared to be no fresh ones. The inside of the cavern was hidden by the long grass and piles of rocks that lay scattered outside it, many of which had apparently rolled down the hillside from above.

Then we heard it. An unmistakable growl. Allimuthu reached out to touch my shoulder to stop me, but I had already caught the sound.

It might have been made by a panther—or it might have been made by a bear.

I stopped to think. There were two courses open to me. There was no doubt that the sound had come from in front: from the cave or some place very close to it. I could throw stones or advance a little closer. I felt afraid to follow the latter course. The creature, whatever it was, could rush down upon me from the higher level of the cavern. If I failed to see it coming between the grass and rocks, or missed it with my first shot, I could expect real trouble.

Discretion got the better of valour and I whispered to Allimuthu and Munuswamy to hurl stones in that direction. They did so.

Nothing happened.

With my rifle cocked and ready, I watched for the slightest movement in the scene before me.

They hurled more stones, but still nothing happened.

Then I noticed a slight movement of the long grass away to the right, leading up the hill, beyond the side of the cavern where it adjoined the sloping ground behind.

That movement might have been caused by the breeze or by some animal slinking through the grass. Of one thing I was certain, it was definitely not a bear. Bruin is black in southern India, and I would easily have picked out such a black object against the brown grass. Nor for that matter could Bruin sneak about in such fashion—not even if he tried. He is a blundering type, who either bursts upon a scene or bursts away from it.

I strained my eyes and then saw part of the spotted shape as it drew level with the height of the rock that overhung the cavern.

The animal had stopped moving now and was undoubtedly looking back at us, although I could not make out its head or face in the grass. A couple of seconds more and it might be gone.

I covered that spotted patch in my sights and gently pressed the trigger.

The panther shot up and out of the grass, bent up double like a prawn, and then rolled backwards down the slope and was hidden from view in the grass. Scrambling upon a boulder, I tried to look down and see him. There was nothing to be seen.

I waited for ten minutes; then I crept forward, after motioning to Allimuthu and Munuswamy to take cover. Every now and then I leaped on to a boulder to see if I could catch a glimpse of the animal.

Eventually I did, and all my caution was unnecessary, for the panther was quite dead. That snap shot of mine had been a lucky one. The .405 bullet had passed through the back of his neck and into his skull.

Examination showed where the ball from Munuswamy's gun had travelled clean through the animal's back, high up and behind the shoulder-blades. It had made a big hole in leaving and had caused a nasty open wound in which maggots were crawling. Two L.G. pellets were embedded in the skin, but the wounds caused by them appeared to be healing. The main wound, however, would eventually have caused the animal's death, if it had not made him a man-eater before then. This was a middle-aged male, just under seven feet in length.

We had a lot of trouble lugging his body through that infernal lantana thicket, but we made it after more toil and sweat.

That evening we laid the body before the D.S.P's feet. Exactly forty-eight hours had passed since I had asked him to extend the time limit of four days. But Munuswamy and I had accomplished the task in half that time. The D.S.P. was all smiles.

The Black Panther of Sivanipalli

SIVANIPALLI HAS ALWAYS BEEN A FAVOURITE HAUNT OF MINE BECAUSE of its proximity to Bangalore and the fact that it lends itself so conveniently to a weekend excursion or even a visit of a few hours on a moonlit night. All you have to do is to motor from Bangalore to Denkanikotta, a distance of forty-one miles, proceed another four miles by car, and then leave the car and walk along a footpath for five miles, which brings you to Sivanipalli. The hamlet itself stands at the edge of the Reserved Forest.

Nearly three miles to the west of this small hamlet the land drops for about three hundred feet, down to a stream running along the decline. To the south of the hamlet another stream flows from the east to west, descending rapidly in a number of cascades to converge with the first stream that runs along the foot of the western valley. To the east of Sivanipalli itself the jungle stretches to a forest lodge, Gulhatti Bungalow, situated nearly five hundred feet up on a hillside. East of Gulhatti itself, and about four and a half miles away as the crow flies, is another forest bungalow at a place called Aiyur. Four miles northeast again there is a Forestry Department shed located near a rocky hill named Kuchuvadi. This is a sandalwood area, and the shed houses an ancient huge pair of scales which are used for weighing the cut pieces of sandalwood as they are brought in from the jungle, before being despatched to the Forestry Department's godowns at the block headquarters at Denkanikotta.

Northwards of Sivanipalli, thick scrub jungle extends right up to and beyond the road, five miles away, where you have to leave the car, before setting out for the hamlet on foot.

Sivanipalli itself consists of barely half-a-dozen thatched huts and is hardly big enough to be called even a hamlet. A considerably larger village named Salivaram is found three miles to the north, just a little more than halfway along the footpath leading to the main road.

Fire-lines of the Forestry Department surround Sivanipalli on all four sides, demarcating the commencement of the surrounding reserved forest at distances varying from half a mile to a mile from the hamlet. There is a water hole almost at the point where two of these fire-lines converge at the southeastern corner. The two streams that meet the west of the village at the foot of the three-hundred-foot drop wind on through jungle in the direction of another larger village named Anchetty, about eight miles southwestward of Sivanipalli itself.

I have given this rather detailed description of the topography of the surrounding region to enable you to have in mind a picture of the area in which occurred the adventure I am about to relate.

It is an ideal locality for a panther's activities, with small rocky hills in all directions, scrub jungle, heavy forest and two streams—apart from the water hole—to ensure a steady water supply, not only for the panthers themselves, but for the game on which they prey. Because of this regular supply of water, a fairly large herd of cattle is quartered at Sivanipalli, which is an added attraction, of course, so far as these felines are concerned!

As a result, quite a number of panthers are more or less in permanent residence around the area. That is the main reason why I was attracted to Sivanipalli the first day I visited it in 1929.

The jungle varies in type from the heavy bamboo that grows in the vicinity of the water hole to the thick forest on the southern and western sides, with much thinner jungle and scrub, interspersed with sandalwood trees, to the east and north.

The countryside itself is extremely beautiful, with a lovely view of the hills stretching away to a hazy and serrated blue line on the western horizon. Banks of mist float up from the jungle early in the morning and completely hide the base of these hills, exposing their tops like rugged islands in a sea of fleecy wool. On a cloudy day, the opposite effect is seen, for when storm clouds settle themselves along the tops of the hills, entirely hiding them from view, only the lower portions of their slopes are visible, giving the impression of almost flat country.

I have spent many a moonlit night 'ghooming'—derived, from the Urdu verb 'ghoom', meaning 'to wander about'—the jungles around little Sivanipalli. They hold game of every description, with the exception of bison, in moderate numbers. There is always the chance of encountering an elephant, hearing the soughing moan of a tiger, the grating sawing of a panther, or the crash of an alarmed sambar as it flees at your approach while you wander about the moonlit forest. You will not be able to see them—except perhaps the elephant, for both species of carnivora, and the sambar as well, are far too cunning and have long ago seen or heard you coming.

You may stumble upon a bear digging vigorously in the ground for white ants or tuber-roots, or sniffing and snuffling loudly as he ambles along. You will undoubtedly hear him, long before you see him as a black blob in the confused and hazy background of vegetation, looking grey and ghostly in the moonlight.

As far back as 1934 Sivanipalli sprang a surprise. A black panther had been seen drinking at the water hole by a herdsman returning with his cattle from the forest where he had taken them for the day to graze. It was shortly after five o'clock in the evening, which is the usual time for the cattle to be driven back to the pens in the village to be kraaled for the night. It is the custom to drive them out in the mornings to the jungle for the day's grazing at about nine, or even later, and to bring them back fairly early in the evening, the apparently late exodus and early return being to allow time for the cows to be milked twice a day.

Thus it was only a little after five and still quite light when the herdsman saw this black panther standing beside a bush that grew close to the water's edge, calmly lapping from the pool. He swore that it was jet black and I had no reason to disbelieve him, for there seemed no real point in a deliberate lie. When the herd approached, the panther had gazed up at the cattle; but when the herdsman appeared amidst his beasts it just melted away into the undergrowth.

Now the black panther is not a separate or special species. It is simply an instance of melanism. A black cub sometimes, but very rarely, appears in a litter, the other cubs being of normal size and colour. Black panthers are said to occur more in the thick evergreen forests of Malaya, Burma, Assam and similar localities than around this district. They have also been seen and shot very occasionally in the Western Ghats of India. I have every reason to believe the view that they prevail in these heavy evergreen forests, for then their dark colour would afford considerably better concealment. At the same time, as they are simple instances of melanism, they should occur anywhere and everywhere that panthers exist, regardless of the type of the jungle prevailing. I have only seen one other black panther in its wild state, and that was when it leapt across the road on the ghat section between Pennagram and Muttur near the Cauvery river, at about six one evening. They are one of Nature's—or rather the jungle's —mysteries that has never been quite satisfactorily solved.

If you look closely at a black panther in a zoo, you will discover that the rosette markings of the normal panther are still visible through the black hair, although of course they cannot be seen very distinctly.

When the herdsman saw this black panther, he came to the village and told the people all about it. A black panther had never before been seen or heard of in this area and his tale was generally disbelieved. Having seen the animal with his own eyes, of course, he had no doubts, although he sincerely believed that it had not been a normal or living animal he had laid eyes upon but Satan in just one of the numerous forms he often adopts in the jungle to frighten poor villagers like himself.

Some weeks passed and no one saw or heard of the black panther again. The herdsman's story was forgotten.

One day, some months later, in mid-afternoon, with the sun shining brightly overhead, another herd of cattle was taking its siesta, squatting with closed eyes or lazily munching the grass in the shade of neighbouring trees. The beasts lay in little groups of two to half-a-dozen. The two herdsmen had finished their midday meal of ragi balls and curry, which they had brought along with them, tied up in a dirty piece of cloth, and were fast asleep, lying side by side in the shade of another tree.

It was indeed a peaceful scene, as from an azure sky the tropical sun sent down its fiery rays that were reflected from the earth in waves of shimmering heat. The herd of cattle was relaxed, drowsy and unwatchful when the black panther of Sivanipalli took his first toll.

Appearing unexpectedly, the panther fastened his fangs in the throat of a half-grown brown and white cow, but not before she had time to bellow with pain and leap to her feet, lifting her assailant off the ground with his teeth locked in her throat.

The cow's agonized cry awakened one of the sleeping herdsmen, who was astounded by what he saw. He awoke his companion to look upon the Devil himself in an unexpected black form, and they watched as the stricken cow dropped to earth to ebb out her life, kicking wildly. The black panther maintained his grip. Thus she died. The men had leapt to their feet.

Ordinarily, in the event of an attack by a panther on one of their cattle, they would have rushed to its rescue, brandishing their staves and shouting at he tops of their voices, if not actually to save the life of the victim, at least to drive off the attacker before he could drag away the kill.

In this case neither of them found the nerve to do so. They just stood rooted to the spot and gazed in astonishment. As they did so, the panther released his hold on the throat of the dead cow and looked in their direction. Although he was some fifty yards away they could clearly see the crimson blood gushing from the cow's torn throat and dyeing the muzzle of the panther a deep scarlet against the black background of fur.

They turned tail and fled.

When the few villagers of Sivanipalli heard this account, they were very reluctant to go out and bring back the carcase before it was wholly eaten. This they would most certainly have done had the killer been a normal panther, but the presence of this unheard-of black monstrosity completely unnerved them. They had been told of a panther described as being jet black by the herdsman who had first seen him at the water hole. Being villagers themselves, they had allowed a wide margin for exaggeration in that case, but here were two more herdsmen, both saying the same thing. Could it be really true?

After that day, the black marauder began to exact a regular toll of animals from Sivanipalli. He was seen on several occasions, so that there was no more doubt in the minds of any of the villagers as to his actual existence and colour.

When the people came to know of his presence in the jungle, forcibly brought home to them by these frequent attacks on their animals, even their usual lethargy and apathy was shaken and they became more and more careful. Eventually a stage was reached when the cattle were not driven out to graze beyond a radius of about a quarter of a mile from the village.

Finding that his food supply was being cut off, the black panther started to extend his field of operation. He killed and ate animals that belonged to herds coming from Anchetty to the southwest and from Gulhatti and Aiyur to the east. He even carried off a large donkey from Salivaram which, as I have said, lay to the north of Sivanipalli and well outside of the forest reserve proper.

Just about this time I happened to pay a visit to Sivanipalli accompanied by a friend. We had gone there after lunch on a Sunday, intending to take an evening stroll in the forest and perhaps get a jungle fowl, or a couple of green pigeon for the pot. The story of the advent and activities of the black panther greatly interested me. Only once before had I seen one of its kind outside a zoo, and I was therefore determined to bag this specimen if possible.

I offered to pay the villagers the price of the next animal killed by this panther if they would leave it undisturbed and inform me. They must go by bus to the small town of Hosur Cattle Farm, which was the closest place to a telegraph office, where a message could be sent to me at Bangalore. I also asked them to spread the same information to all persons living at places where the panther had already struck. Finally, as a further incentive and attraction, I said that I would not only pay for the dead animal, but give a cash baksheesh of fifty rupees to him who carried out my instructions carefully.

Anticipating a call within the next few days I kept my portable charpoy-machan and other equipment ready at Bangalore to leave within a few minutes of receiving the telegram. But it was over a fortnight before that call eventually came. Moreover it arrived late! That is to say, it reached me just before four o'clock in the evening. I was on my way by four-fifteen, but it was about seven-fifteen and quite dark by the time I reached Sivanipalli.

I noticed that the telegram had been handed in at Hosur Cattle Farm at about one-thirty that afternoon, which was far too late, apart from the additional delay that had taken place at the Bangalore end because it had been classed as an ordinary message, instead of an express telegram, as I had specified.

There was a man named Rangaswamy living at Sivanipalli, who had assisted me as shikari on two or three previous occasions, and it was this man who had sent the telegram from Hosur Cattle Farm to say that the panther had made a kill at ten that very morning, shortly after the cattle had left the village for grazing. The herdsman in charge, who like the rest had been told of my offer to pay for the animal that had been killed, with a cash bonus as well, had very wisely not touched the carcase but had run back to Sivanipalli with the news which he had given to Rangaswamy, who in turn had made a great effort to reach Denkanikotta in time to catch the twelve-fifteen bus. This he had just managed to do, reaching the Hosur Cattle Farm telegraph office by one o'clock.

Commending Rangaswamy and the herdsman for their prompt action in sending me the news, I now had to decide between trying to stalk the panther on his kill with the aid of torchlight or waiting at Sivanipalli until the following evening to sit up for him. The former plan was a complete gamble as there was no certainty whatever that the panther would be on the kill, or anywhere near it, when I got there. At the same time I could not find any very convincing excuse to justify spending the next twenty-four hours cooped up in the hamlet doing nothing.

I enquired where the kill had taken place and was informed that it was hardly half a mile to the west of the village, where the land began its steep descent to the bed of the stream about three miles away. It seemed too temptingly close and this decided me to tell Rangaswamy and the herdsman that I would endeavour to bag the panther that very night while he was eating the kill, if they would lead me to a quarter of a mile from the spot and indicate the direction in which the kill lay.

I felt I could trust my own sense of hearing and judgement to guide me from there on.

They were both against this plan and very strongly advocated waiting till the following evening, but I said that I would like to try it anyhow.

By the time all this talk was finished it was ten minutes to eight and there was no time to be lost, as the panther would probably be eating at that very moment. I clamped my three-cell, fixed-focus electric torch which was painted black to render it inconspicuous, to my rifle and dropped three spare cells into my pocket together with five spare rounds of ammunition. Four more rounds I loaded into the rifle, keeping three in the magazine and one in the breech. Although the .405 Winchester is designed to carry four rounds in the magazine and one 'up the spout', I always load one less in the magazine to prevent a jam, which may occur should the under-lever be worked very fast in reloading. Lastly, I changed the boots I had been wearing for a pair of light rubber-soled brown 'khed' shoes. These would to a great extent help me to tread lightly and soundlessly. I was wearing khaki pants and shirt at the time, and I changed into the black shirt I generally wear when sitting up in a machan.

Rangaswamy and the herdsman came along with me up to a dry rivulet. Then the latter told me that this rivulet ran almost directly westwards with just two bends in its course to the spot where the panther had killed. He said the dead cow had later been dragged about two hundred yards inside the jungle roughly northwards of the place where the rivulet completed the second bend.

Their instructions were clear enough and I was grateful for the two bends in the stream which enabled them to be so specific. Telling the men to go back, as I would eventually be able to find my own way to Sivanipalli, I started out on my attempt.

I considered the wisest and most silent approach would be along the bed of this dry stream rather than along the top of either of its banks. Any slight sounds I might inadvertently make would then be muffled and less audible to the panther. Secondly, by walking along the bed of the stream I could easily follow its course without having to shine my torch to see where I was going, which I might have to do if I were to walk along the bank where the vegetation would impede me, the more so because it was very dark indeed and the sky very overcast, the clouds completely hiding the stars and whatever pale light they might have cast.

Accordingly I moved forward very carefully and soon felt the stream making its first curve, which was in a southwesterly direction. After a while the stream started to turn northwards again, and then straightened out to resume its westerly course. I had passed the first of the two bends the herdsman had mentioned.

Not long afterwards it curved into its second bend, but this time in a northerly direction. I moved as carefully as possible to avoid tripping upon any loose stone or boulder that might make a noise. Although from the information I had been given I knew the kill was still about three hundred yards away, panthers have very acute hearing, and if my quarry were anywhere in the immediate vicinity, if not actually eating on the kill, he would hear me and, as like as not, make off again.

Fortunately the rivulet was more or less clear of boulders and bushes along this part of its course and this helped me to edge along silently. A little later it had completed its northward turn and it began to curve southwards. After a few yards it straightened out once more and resumed its main westerly direction.

I halted. I had reached the place at which the panther had killed the cow and from where he had dragged the kill into the jungle for about two hundred yards to the north. I knew that I must now leave the rivulet and strike off into the undergrowth to try and locate the carcass and the killer, whom I hoped to surprise in the act of eating. In the deep gloom I had only my sense of hearing to guide me.

I tiptoed towards the northern bank of the stream which was, at that spot, only breast-high. With my feet still on the sandy bed, I gently laid the rifle on the bank and, folding my arms across my chest, leaned against it, listening intently.

Five minutes passed, but there was no sound of any kind to disturb the silence. Perhaps the kill was too far away to allow me to hear the panther eating; that is, if he was on the kill and if he was eating.

Putting my weight on my hands, I gently drew myself up to the top of the bank, making no sound as I did so. I then picked up the rifle and started to move forward very, very slowly. The darkness was intense. At the same time I knew I had really little, if anything, to fear from the panther should he discover me, as he was not a man-eater and had shown no inclination at any time to molest human beings. Nevertheless, this was my first experience with a black panther and I had heard several of the usual stories about them being exceptionally dangerous and aggressive. That made me quite nervous, I can honestly tell you.

Inching forward, I stopped every few yards to listen for sounds that would indicate that the panther was busy eating. Only they could guide me, as it was hopeless to expect to see anything without the aid of my torch, which could only be used when I was close enough to fire. The slightest flicker of the beam now would drive the panther away should he happen to see the light.

I went along in this fashion, taking what seemed an interminable time. Perhaps I had progressed seventy-five yards or more when, during one of the many stops I made to listen, I thought I heard a faint sound coming from in front and a little to the right. I listened again for some time, but it was not repeated.

Bushes and trees were now growing thickly around me, and my body, in pushing through the undergrowth, was making some noise in spite of the utmost care I was taking to prevent this. So were my feet as I put them down at each tread. I tried pushing them forward by just raising them off the ground and sliding them along, but I was still not altogether silent. I did this not only to try and eliminate noise, but to disguise my human footfalls should the panther hear me. He would certainly not associate any sliding and slithering sounds with a human being, but ascribe them to some small nocturnal creature moving about in the grass and bushes; whereas the sound of an ordinary footfall would immediately convey the fact that there was a man in the vicinity. An uncomfortable thought came into my mind that I might tread on a poisonous snake in the dark, and the rubber shoes I was wearing did not protect my ankles. I dispelled that thought and tried walking around the bushes and shrubs that arose before me. This caused me to deviate to some extent from the northerly course towards the dead cow I had been instructed to follow.

I stopped every now and then to listen, but the sound I had last heard was not repeated. It was some time later that I concluded that I had far exceeded the distance of two hundred yards from the rivulet at which the kill was said to be lying and also that I had hopelessly lost all sense of direction, enveloped as I was amongst the trees and scrub, under an overcast sky.

Then suddenly I heard the sound I had so long been hoping to hear —the unmistakable sound of tearing flesh and crunching bones.

I had been lucky indeed. The panther was on his kill at that moment and, what was more, was actually engrossed in feeding. Now all I had to do was to try to creep sufficiently close to enable me to switch on my torch and take a shot. But that was all very well in theory. The idea was far easier than its execution.

To begin with, the sounds did not come from the direction in which I was moving, but to my left and some distance behind me, indicating that I had not steered a straight course in the darkness. I had veered to the right, bypassing the kill. Perhaps the reason I had not heard the sound of feeding earlier was because the panther had only just returned. Or—and it was a most discomforting thought that came into my mind—maybe he had heard me in the darkness as I passed and deliberately stayed quiet.

I paused for a few moments and listened so as to make quite sure of the direction from which the sounds were coming. In the darkness I guessed the panther to be anything from fifty to a hundred yards away.

I now started to slide my feet forward very slowly and very cautiously towards the noise.

If the panther had dragged his kill into or behind a bush it would be impossible for me to get the shot I hoped for. On the other hand, all the advantages would be with the panther were I to fire and wound him, and if he attacked—the proposition was altogether a most unpleasant one.

At the same time, I tried to encourage myself by remembering that never before had this panther molested a human being, and that the light from my torch, when eventually I flashed it would fill him with fear and keep him from attacking me, if it did not drive the animal off entirely.

It is difficult to describe truthfully the minutes that ensued, or to recount what I actually did. My mind and senses were so alert and intense, that I negotiated all obstacles in the way of trees and undergrowth automatically. I knew that as long as I could hear the sounds made by the panther as he feasted I could be certain that he was fully engaged on the task at hand and was unaware of my approach. It was only when these sounds ceased that I would have to look out, for then the panther had heard me and had stopped his feeding to listen.

The sounds continued and so did I, creeping forward cautiously, never putting my foot down till I had tested each step with my toe. When I heard or sensed a leaf rustle beneath me, I groped for a place where I could tread more silently. All the while I kept my eyes strained upon the darkness before me and my ears pricked for the sounds of feeding.

Then suddenly those sounds stopped, and an absolute, awful silence engulfed me.

Had the panther stopped eating for a while of his own accord? Had he finished and gone away? Was he just going away? Or had he heard my stealthy approach and was even at that moment preparing to attack? The alternatives raced through my mind and I came to a halt too.

I remained thus, silent and stationary, for some time. Just how long I have no idea, but I remember that I was thinking what I should do next. To move forward, now that he had stopped eating, would certainly betray my approach to the panther—that is, if he was not already aware of my presence. However careful I might be, it would be impossible for a human being to move silently enough in the darkness to be inaudible to the acute hearing of such an animal. On the other hand, if I stayed put and kept quiet, there was a chance that I might hear the panther, should he approach, although panthers are well known to move noiselessly.

Of the two courses of action, I decided on the latter, so just stood still. As events were shortly to prove, it was lucky that I did so.

For a few moments later a very faint rustling came to my straining ears. It stopped and then began again. Something was moving. It could have been anything. It was a continuous sort of noise, such as a snake would make as it slithered through the grass and undergrowth. But a panther could just as easily cause it by creeping towards me on his belly. I can assure you that it was a very frightening thought.

One thing was certain. The sound did not come from a rat or a frog, or some small jungle creature or night-bird. Had such been the case, the faint noise would have been in fits and starts; in jerks, as it were, each time the creature moved. But this was a continuous sort of noise, a steady slithering or creeping forward, indicating slow but continuous progress. It was now certain beyond all doubt that the sound was being made by one of the two things: a snake or the panther.

I have taken some time in trying to describe to you my innermost thoughts as they raced through my mind. In fact, they raced through so fast that I had made up my mind within a few seconds of hearing that ominous, stealthy, creeping approach.

Another few seconds longer and I had decided that the panther was certainly creeping towards me, but as long as I could hear him I knew I was safe from any attack. Then abruptly the noise ceased.

Next came the well-known hissing sound comparable to that made by an angry cobra when it exhales the air from its body in a sudden puff. The panther was beginning to snarl. Very shortly he would snarl audibly, probably growl, and then would come the charge. I had heard the same sequence of noises often enough before and knew what to expect. Quickly raising the rifle to my shoulder, I pressed the switch of the torch.

Two baleful reddish-white eyes stared back at me, but I could make out nothing of the animal itself till I remembered I was dealing with a black panther, which would be practically invisible at night.

Perhaps it had at first no vicious intentions in approaching me, but had just sneaked forward to investigate what it had heard moving about in the vicinity of its kill. But having identified the source as a hated human being, that hissing start to the snarl showed that the black panther had definitely decided to be aggressive. His eyes stared back at the light of my torch without wavering.

I had plenty of time in which to take careful aim. Then I fired.

Instead of collapsing as I hoped and expected, or at least biting and struggling in its death-throes, the panther sprang away with a series of guttural roars. Had I missed entirely, or had I wounded the beast?

I felt certain that I could not have missed, but that was a question that could only be settled by daylight. I turned to retrace my steps.

This time, of course, I was free to use my torch, and with its aid I walked back roughly in the direction I had come.

I had thought wrong, however, and floundered about for half an hour without being able to regain the rivulet up which I had approached.

I looked at the sky. It was still cloudy and I could not pick out a single star that would help set me, even roughly, in the right direction to Sivanipalli village. Then I remembered that the land sloped gently westwards from the hamlet towards the ravine formed by the two rivers to the west. Therefore, if I walked in a direction that led slightly uphill I could not go wrong and would surely come out somewhere near the village.

I started walking uphill.

But I did not reach Sivanipalli or anywhere near it. To cut a long story short, it was past eleven-thirty that night when I landed, not at Sivanipalli or its precincts as I had expected, but more than halfway up the track leading northwards to Salivaram. After that, of course, I knew where I was and within half-an-hour had reached the village.

There I awoke Rangaswamy and related what had happened. There was nothing more to do then than bed down for the night.

I have told you already that Sivanipalli was a small place boasting scarcely half-a-dozen huts. Rangaswamy himself was a much-married man with a large household of women and children and I could not expect him to invite me into his hut. So I lay down in a hayrick that stood a little off the main path and pulled the straw, already damp with dew, over me to try and keep warm.

If you should ever wish to undergo the lively experience of being half-eaten alive by the tiny grass ticks that abound in and round forest areas in southern India, I would recommend you to spend a night in a hayrick at Sivanipalli. You will assuredly not be disappointed. The grass tick is a minute creature which is normally no larger than the head of a pin. After it has gorged itself on your blood it becomes considerably larger. But it is a most ungrateful feeder. Not only does it suck your blood, but it leaves a tiny wound which rapidly develops into a suppurating sore. This increases in size in direct proportion to the amount of scratching you do to appease the intolerable itch and eventually turns into quite a nasty sore with a brown crust-like scab, and a watery interior. Moreover, should many of these creatures favour you with their attention at the same time, you will surely get a fever in addition to the sores.

I hardly slept at all during the rest of that confounded night, but spent the remaining hours of darkness scratching myself all over. Dawn found me a very tired, a very disgruntled and a very sore individual, who had most certainly had the worst of that night's encounter with the enemy—in this case the almost microscopical little grass tick.

The first thing to do, obviously, was to make some hot tea to raise my morale, which was at a decidedly low ebb, and with this in view I went to Rangaswamy's hut, only to find the door closed fast. It was evident that the inmates intended making a late morning. This did not fit in with my plans at all, so I pounded on the solid wooden structure and called aloud repeatedly. After quite a time I heard sounds of movement from within. Eventually the wooden bar that fastened the door on the inside was withdrawn, and a very tousled-headed, sleepy Rangaswamy emerged.

I instructed him to light a fire, which he started to do on the opposite side of the village road by placing three stones on the ground at the three points of a triangle, and in the middle making a smoky fire with damp sticks and straw. I had not brought any receptacle with me for boiling water, so I had to borrow one of his household earthenware pots, which he assured me was absolutely clean, a statement which I myself was not quite prepared to believe from its appearance.

However, the water eventually boiled. I had put some tea leaves into my water bottle, after emptying it of its contents, poured in the boiling water, re-corked it and shook it in lieu of stirring. In the meantime the inmates of the other huts had come to life. They watched me interestedly. Some offered little milk, and someone else contributed some jaggery, or brown sugar, for which I was very grateful, having also forgotten to bring sugar. We boiled the milk and put some lumps of jaggery into my mug, adding tea and boiling milk. Believe it or not, it brewed a mixture that did have some resemblance to tea.

Breakfast consisted of some eggs which I purchased and hard-boiled over the same fire. By about seven I had restored enough interest in myself and events, after my dreadful encounter of the previous night with those obnoxious little ticks, to think of doing something about the panther.

I asked Rangaswamy to get the herdsman who had accompanied us the previous night and who had not put it an appearance so far that morning, or one of his companions, to collect a herd of buffaloes if they were obtainable and drive them into the thick undergrowth to dislodge the panther, as I felt confident that I had not missed the brute entirely with my one shot.

All present answered that there were no buffaloes in Sivanipalli; and no one was willing to risk his cattle being injured in a possible encounter with the panther. Just then my missing companion of the night before—the herdsman who had accompanied me—turned up. He said that he had a friend at Salivaram who owned a muzzle-loading gun. He had wanted to borrow the gun so as to come along and assist me, and with that in view he had set out to Salivaram early that morning while it was yet dark. Unfortunately, his friend was away with his gun and so he had been unable to borrow it. He had returned empty-handed.

I thanked him for his thoughtful intention to assist me, but inwardly I was more than thankful that he had been unsuccessful in borrowing the muzzle-loader. With an inexperienced user, a muzzle-loader can become mighty deadly weapon and I confess I would have felt most nervous with him and that gun behind me.

Having failed to obtain the use of buffaloes, I then tried to enlist the cooperation of the owners of such village curs as there were at Sivanipalli. After some humming and hawing, one solitary cur was produced. She was a lanky bitch, with ears cut off at their base, entirely brown in colour, with a tremendously long curved tail. The typical example of village 'pariah dog', as they are called, whose ears had been amputated when a puppy because of the ticks which would in later life have become lodged on and inside them. With villagers, it is a simple process of reasoning to come to the conclusion that it takes less effort, and far less time, to cut off the ears of their dogs when they are puppies than periodically to remove scores of ticks in later life.

By a strange coincidence, this bitch was named 'Kush', which reminded me of the name of the dog 'Kush Kush Kariya' owned by my old friend of jungle days,* Byra the poojaree. I don't know if this name is a favourite among the dog owners of the forest areas of Salem district, or whether it just lends itself to a natural sound emitted to attract the attention of any dog. Personally I am inclined to the latter idea. Whatever it may be, I did not know then that this bitch Kush would conduct herself every bit as precociously as her namesake, the animal owned by Byra.

Finally, accompanied by Rangaswamy, the herdsman, Kush and her owner, we set off to try and find out what had become of the panther.

We retraced our steps of the night before to the spot where my companions had left me, then followed in my own footsteps along the two bends in the rivulet and finally climbed its northern bank at the place I had chosen the previous night.

Thereafter I led the way with cocked rifle, Kush running between me and her owner, who came last in file. Between us came Rangaswamy, with the herdsman behind him.

As I had already discovered the night before, the undergrowth was dense, so that there was no means of tracing the exact course I had followed only twelve hours previously; nor, being daylight, was I able to pick out any of the trees or bushes I had negotiated in the darkness, although I knew roughly the direction in which I had gone.

The herdsman, of course, knew where the kill lay, but I did not want to go directly to it, my idea being to find, if possible, the place where I had fired at the panther. I did not succeed. Those who have been in jungles will understand how very different in size, shape and location just a small bush appears in daylight compared with its appearance at night. Darkness greatly magnifies the size of objects in the forest, distorts their shape and misleads as regards direction.

To help me find what I was looking for, I got the herdsman to lead us to the dead cow, which he found without difficulty. Incidentally, it had been half-eaten, although of course there was no means of knowing just then whether the panther had fed before my encounter with it, or whether I had entirely missed him and he had returned to feed after I had left. Panthers sometimes return to their kill if they are missed, although such behaviour, in my experience at least, is not very common.

Having reached the kill, I now tried to recollect and recast the direction from which I had come, so as to try and follow my own footsteps from there and eventually come to the spot where I had fired. Unfortunately I had no means of knowing exactly how far the panther had crept towards me, but had to rely entirely on my own judgement as to how far away he had been when I first heard him feeding. Sounds in jungle at night, when both the hearer and the origin of the sound are enveloped by the surrounding undergrowth, can be very deceptive, and the distance they may travel is hard to guess for that very reason. I felt that to the best of my knowledge, I could have been standing anything from fifteen to fifty yards from the dead cow.

Deciding approximately on the distance where I might have been standing, I paced off those fifteen yards and got one of the men to mark the spot by bending down a small branch. Then I paced another thirty-five yards to attain the maximum distance of fifty yards, which I judged would be about the greatest that could have separated me from the feeding panther I had heard the night before. Here we bent another branch.

Somewhere in between these two markers, and very approximately in the same direction as I was walking, I knew I should find some sign of whether my bullet had struck the panther. If I did not find anything then I would have to conclude that I had completely missed him.

By this time I was also sure that the panther, if he had been wounded, was not lurking anywhere in the immediate vicinity, for had that been the case he would undoubtedly have given some sign by now, hearing us walking about and talking. That sign would have been in the form of a growl, or perhaps even a sudden charge. The absence of any such reaction and the complete silence led me to conclude that even if I had hit him, the wound was not severe enough to prevent him from getting away from the spot.

I instructed my three companions to cast round in a circle, and search carefully for a possible blood-trail. I joined them, and it was not very long before Kush, sniffing at something, attracted her owner's attention. He called out that he had found what we were looking for. Gathering around him and the bitch we saw an elongated smear of dried blood on a blade of lemon grass.

My spirits rose considerably. Here was proof that I had not missed. The height of the blood mark from the ground indicated that I had wounded my quarry somewhere in the upper part of his body, and as I knew I had fired between his eyes as they had reflected my torchlight, my bullet must have grazed his head. Alternatively, if he had happened to be crouching down with raised hindquarters at that time (a rather unlikely position for a panther to adopt when creeping forward), my bullet might be embedded itself somewhere in the rear part of his back.

This was where Kush showed her merit. She was a totally untrained cur, but she instinctively appeared to sense what was required of her. For a little while she sniffed around wildly and at random, then started to whine and run ahead of us.

We followed and found more bloodsmears on leaves and blades of grass where the panther had passed. Between the bushes and clumps of high grass there were spots of blood on the ground too. This was an encouraging find, as it showed that the animal had been bleeding freely, clear evidence that the wound was not just a superficial graze.

The blood itself had mostly dried, except in some very sheltered places. There it was moist enough to be rubbed off by the fingers. However, it was neither thick nor dark enough to suggest that my bullet had penetrated a vital organ, such as a lung.

Kush set out very rapidly in a westerly direction, and it was quite obvious she was following a trail that would eventually bring us to the sharp decline in the land, down to the bed of the stream flowing from north to south before it joined the other stream lower down and turned westwards. This stream, before its confluence, is known as the Anekal Vanka. The combined streams are called Dodda Halla, which in the Kanarese language literally means the 'Big Gorge'. It has this name because so many sections flow through ravines and gorges as they twist and twine a torturous path past the village of Anchetty. There the river changes its course abruptly and turns southwards, past Gundalam, to its eventual junction with the Cauvery river. It is this same stream, the Dodda Halla, that was once the haunt of the man-eating tiger of Jowlagiri,* but that is another story. I have explored every section of it, right up to the place where it joins the Cauvery, and have nicknamed it the 'Secret river', partly because of the fact that due to the many miles of rough walking entailed in following its course, few people come that way, and it is delightfully lonely and far away from the sight and sound of human beings; also because I have discovered secrets of geological interest along its banks. I hesitate to divulge them, for with their publicity must automatically follow the next necessary evil, the violation of the sanctity of one of the most delightfully isolated jungle localities in Salem district.

Returning to events as they occurred that morning. The undergrowth was very dense, but to the unerring instinct of Kush this appeared to offer no obstacle. In fact, the trouble lay in keeping up with her. Her small and lithe brown body dodged in and out between bushes and outcrops of 'wait-a-bit' thorn. Our legs, hands and arms were severely lacerated by these thorns because we were moving at a foolish speed in order to keep the bitch in sight, taking no precautions whatever against a sudden attack by the wounded panther if he happened to lie immediately ahead of us. At times the brambles and other obstructions slowed us down, and Kush would get far ahead and disappear. It then became necessary to whistle her back, and when she did so, which was only after some minutes, she appeared to experience some difficulty in picking up the trail again.

We had no rope with us, so I borrowed the herdsman's turban and knotted one end of the cloth around Kush's neck, giving the other end to her owner. But it was a small turban and the cloth too short. The man had to stoop down to retain his hold, while Kush strained, spluttered and coughed in her anxiety to forge ahead.

In this fashion we progressed until we eventually reached the edge of the plateau where the land began to fall away sharply to the bed of the Anekal Vanka stream, which we could see between breaks in the tree-tops below us, the sun glinting on the silvery surface of the water as it meandered from side to side on its sandy bed. The stream itself was three-fourths dry at that time of the year.

A little later we came across the first concrete evidence that the panther had begun to feel the effects of his wounds. He had lain down in the grass at the foot of a babul tree and had even rolled with pain, as blood was to be seen in patches and smears where he had rested and tossed. Kush spent a long time at this spot and evinced another unusual characteristic by licking at the blood. Ordinarily a village cur is terrified of a panther, but Kush, as I have said already, was an unusual animal, and it was indeed very lucky that her owner had been willing to bring her along. Normally, villagers who will not hesitate to lop off the ears of a puppy at their base will vote that it is a cruel practice to employ a dog for tracking down a wounded panther or tiger and will flatly refuse to be parties to such a deed. As it was, without the invaluable aid rendered by this bitch, we would never have been able to follow the blood trail as we did that morning. It would not have been visible to normal human eyesight in the heavy underbrush.

As we descended the deep decline, vegetation became sparser and the ground became bare and rocky. Boulders were scattered everywhere, interspersed with tufts of the tough long-bladed lemon-grass.

Then we reached a stage where there were only boulders, big and small, and the descent had almost ended. This was the high-level mark reached by the waters of the stream when in spate during the monsoon.

Here, with the end of the vegetation, tracking became easy. Drops of tell-tale rusty brown, where blood had fallen from the wounded animal and splashed on the rocks, revealed its passage. Judging from the distance we had come and the quantity of blood that the panther had lost, it appeared to be more severely hurt than I had at first imagined. The wound must have been a deep one and the bullet had probably struck an artery. Had it been elsewhere, particularly in some fleshy part of the animal, there was a possibility that the bleeding might have lessened, if not ceased entirely, by the natural fat under the skin coming together and closing the hole made by the bullet.

We reached the narrow bed of the stream in which the water was still flowing. Here the panther had crouched down to drink, and there were two sets of blood marks, one nearer to the water's edge than the other. The marks further away indicated more bleeding than those closer. This was curious and it puzzled me greatly at the time, considering I had fired only one shot the night before. The solution was an even greater surprise.

At one spot the panther had stepped into his own gore and had left a clear pug-mark on a rock just before he had waded across the stream. The mark had been made by the animal's one of the forefeet and its size suggested a panther of only average proportions that was probably male. The blood had been washed off the foot by the time the animal had reached the opposite bank, but the dried drops on the stones and boulders continued.

After crossing the stream the panther had changed his course and had walked parallel with the edge of the water and alongside it for nearly two hundred yards, then he had turned to the left and begun to climb the opposite incline. The stones and rocks once more gave way rapidly to vegetation, and again we negotiated thickets of long grass, thorny clumps, small scattered bamboos and trees.

Up and up the panther had climbed, and now so did Kush on the trail, conducting herself as if she had been specially trained for the job. Eventually we came to the road which leads from Denkanikotta to Anchetty and which intersects the forest on its way downwards to the latter village. We had come out on this road exactly opposite the ninth milestone, which we now saw confronting us at the roadside. Incidentally this was the road on which I had parked my car near the fifth milestone when I had left it the evening before to walk to Sivanipalli.

Many carts had traversed the road during the night and in the earlier hours of that morning, and the scent was completely lost for a moment in the powdery brown dust. But Kush had no difficulty in picking it up on the other side, and we followed behind her.

The grass and bamboos gradually gave way to more thorns and more lantana, which tore at our clothing and every part of our anatomy they touched. In places, where the panther had crept beneath the lantana and thorn bushes, an almost impenetrable barrier confronted us. There was no way through and there was no way around, leaving no alternative but to follow by creeping on our bellies beneath the bushes.

My rifle was an encumbrance in such places and conditions, and I cursed and swore as the thorns tore at my hair and face and became embedded in my hands, body and legs. The plight of my three companions was infinitely worse, as they wore thinner and less clothing than I did. Perhaps their skins were thicker—I really don't know. But I am sure that the language that floated from all four of us would have won us prizes in any Billingsgate contest. Only Kush was unperturbed, and from her position ahead she kept looking back at us, clearly impatient at the slow, clumsy progress we were making.

But this time it was also evident that the wounded animal was heading for a large hill that lay about half a mile behind a hamlet named Kundukottai. This village was situated between the seventh and eighth milestones on the Denkanikotta-Anchetty road which we had just crossed. The top of the hill was known to hold many caves, both large and small, and what was worse, the arched roofs of some of the larger caves had been chosen by the big jungle rock-bees as safe and ideal places in which to construct their hives. I had often seen these hives as I had motored along the road to Anchetty on previous occasions.

I felt that my chances of bagging the black panther were becoming very dim indeed. Looking for him amongst those caves would be like searching for the proverbial needle in a haystack. In addition, the panther had the bees to guard him if his place of retreat happened to be one of the many caves they had chosen for their hives. I can assure you that these rock-bees, when disturbed, can be most formidable opponents.

We plodded along and broke cover below the line of caves where the thorn bushes thinned out and became less numerous owing to shelves of sloping rock, worn glass-smooth by centuries of rainwater as it ran down from above.

The scent led up and across the sloping shelf of rock to one of the larger openings that loomed above us. From where we stood we could see the black masses of at least half-a-dozen beehives hanging from the roof of the cave, each about a yard long by about two feet wide. The remains of old abandoned hives were scattered here and there amongst them, the wax sticking out from the rock in flatfish triangles of a dirty yellow-white colour, perhaps nine inches long.

My canvas-soled shoes enabled me to climb the slippery shelf without much difficulty, while the bare feet of my companions helped them even more. Kush's claws made a faint clicking sound as she scampered up the rock ahead of us.

We reached the entrance to the cave where a subdued rustling sound was all-pervading. It came from the movements of millions of bees as they crawled in and about the hanging hives above us. There was also a continuous faint droning, that arose from the wings of the busy insects as they flew in from the jungle with honey from the wild flowers, which they would store in the hives, and from those departing on a trip for more.

The little creatures were absorbed in their duties and paid no attention to us, but we realized that if we happened to disturb them, these same little creatures, so unoffending and peaceful now, would pour on to us in a venomous attack like a torrent of black lava and sting us to death in a matter of a few minutes.

We stood before the entrance of the cave, where the blood trail, very slight now, was still visible in the form of two tiny dried droplets. They showed that the wounded beast had gone inside.

Near its mouth the cave was comparatively large, some twenty feet across by about twenty feet high. Daylight filtered into the interior for some yards, beyond which all was darkness. I counted nine separate beehives, all of great size, suspended from the roof of the cave close to the entrance. The floor was of rock and appeared to be free of the usual dampness associated with such places. No doubt this accounted for the cave being inhabited by the panther—and the bees, too. For these animals and insects, particularly the former, dislike damp places.

I whispered to my three companions to remain outside and to climb up the sloping rock by the sides of the entrance to a point above the cave, and on no account to go downhill, as that was the direction in which the panther would charge if he passed me. They disappeared, and Kush and I entered the cave.

From that moment Kush seemed to know there was danger ahead. Gone was her erstwhile courage, and she slunk at my heels, gradually falling behind me.

I walked forward as far as I could see in the dim light that filtered in from outside. At most, this might have been for about thirty feet. Then we came to a halt. I could go no further as, not anticipating that my quarry would enter such a cave, I had not brought my torch with me from the village.

There were now two alternatives either to try to arouse the wounded animal, or to return to Sivanipalli for the torch, telling the men to keep watch from their position of comparative safety above to guard against the panther slinking out before I came back. I should, of course, have followed the second course. Not only was it safer, but more sure. I suppose, really, I felt too lazy to go all that way back and return again. So I thought I would give the first plan a trial and if possible save myself the trouble of a long walk.

I whistled and shouted loudly. Nothing happened. I shouted again. Kush, who had been simpering, then started to bark. Still nothing happened.

The cave had narrowed down to about half its dimensions at the entrace. Only silence rewarded our efforts. The deep, dark interior was as silent as a grave.

Had the wounded animal died inside? This seemed unlikely, as there was no evidence that the panther had lain down again after the first rest he had taken before crossing the Anekal Vanka stream. Had he left the cave before our arrival? This might easily have happened; but again there was no evidence to suggest that such was the case.

I looked around for something to throw. Just one large stone lay close to my feet. I picked it up in my left hand and found it heavy.

I am left-handed, for throwing purposes, although I shoot from the right shoulder. I had already cocked my rifle, and, balancing it in the crook of my right arm, threw the stone under-arm with as much force as I could muster. It disappeared into the blackness of the cave. I heard it strike the rock floor with a dull thud and then clatter on in a series of short bounces.

The next instant there came the all-too-familiar series of coughing roars as the panther catapulted itself at me out of the darkness. Being a black panther, I could not see it till it emerged from the gloom, two or three yards in front of my rifle. I fired—but the impetus of its charge made the panther seem to slide forward towards me. I fired again. The confines of the cave echoed and re-echoed with the two reports.

Then all hell was let loose. The sound of the bees, which had been registering all this while almost subconsciously on my hearing as a faint humming drone, rose suddenly to a crescendo. The daylight coming in at the entrance to the cave became spotted with a myriad of black, darting specks, which increased in number as the volume of sound rose in intensity. The black objects hurled themselves at me. The air was alive with them.

I had aroused the wrath of the bees. Gone was all thought of the panther as I whipped off my khaki jacket, threw it around my exposed back and face and doubled for the entrance.

The bees fell upon me as an avalanche. They stung my hands. They got through the folds of the jacket and stung my neck, my head, my face. One even got down under the collar of my shirt and stung my back.

The stings were horribly painful.

I slid down the sloping rock up which we had climbed just a short while before. As from far away, I could hear Kush yelping in anguish. As fast as I moved, my winged tormentors moved faster; the air was thick with them as they dive-bombed me mercilessly, I remembered comparing them to Japan's suicide pilots, who sacrificed their lives and their machines by literally throwing themselves upon the enemy. Similarly, each bee that stung me that day automatically sacrificed its life, for the end of every bee's sting is barbed, and in trying to extricate the point after it has stung an enemy the insect tears out its sting, with the venom-sac attached. These remain embedded in the skin of the victim. Thus, in stinging, the bee does irreparable damage to itself, from the effects of which it dies very soon.

I reached the foot of the sloping shelf with the bees still around me. In desperation I crawled under the thickest lantana bush that was available. Always had I cursed this shrub as a dreadful scourge to forest vegetation and a pest to man, encroaching as it always does on both jungles and fields, in addition to being an impediment to silent and comfortable movement along game trails; but at that moment I withdrew my curses and showered blessings on the lantana instead. It saved my life. For bees must attack and sting during flight, another resemblance they bear to the aforementioned dive-bombers. Clever as they are, they have not the sagacity to settle down and then creep forward on their feet to a further attack. The code with them is to dive, sting and die. The closeness of the network of lantana brambles prevented their direct path of flight on to my anatomy. And so I was delivered from what would have been certain death had the area just there been devoid of the pestiferous lantana I had so often cursed before.

For no matter how fast I had run, the bees would have flown faster and descended in their thousands upon me.

All the nine hives had been thoroughly disturbed by now, and the buzzing of angry bees droned and drummed in the air above me. I lay still and silent under the protecting lantana, smarting from the many stings the creatures had inflicted on me during my flight.

It took over two hours for the droning to subside and for the bees to settle down to work once more. I felt very sleepy and would have dozed were it not that the pain of the stings kept me awake. The hot burning sensation increased as my skin swelled around each wound.

It was three in the afternoon before I could crawl out of the lantana and wend my way downhill to the road; from there I walked to Kundukottai village. There I found my three followers. They had almost completely escaped the attention of the bees at their vantage point above the entrance to the cave. The bees had evidently concentrated their attack on the moving enemies immediately before them—myself and poor Kush, who was also with the three men now. She had been badly stung, and I had no doubt that the panther had also received their close attention.

All of us walked to the car where I had left it the day before. After we had piled in, I set out for Denkanikotta, where there was a Local Fund Hospital and Dispensary. It was quite late in the evening when we roused the doctor. He took us to his surgery in the hospital and with the aid of a pair of tweezers removed the stings embedded in Kush and myself. We had received, respectively, nineteen and forty-one barbs from those little demons in the cave. The doctor applied ammonia to our wounds.

We spent the night in the forest bungalow at Denkanikotta. The beds there are of iron with no mattresses. So I lay in an armchair. The three men slept on the verandah with Kush.

The stings brought on an attack of ague and fever. Kush suffered, too, and I could hear her whimpers. My neck, face and hands were still swollen. One bee had succeeded in registering a sting not far from the corner of my left eye, causing it partially to close.

Dawn made me look a sorry sight with my swollen eye and puffy face as I stood before the one blurred mirror the bungalow boasted.

We waited till past ten and then drove back to the ninth milestone. Retracing our steps—but this time along cattle and game trails where walking was comparatively easy—we came to the place below the rock-shelf where we had stood the day before.

The bees were once again busy at their hives. All was peaceful and serene.

Leaving the three villagers, I climbed the slope with Kush for the second time and cautiously approached the cave. I knew I was safe from the bees unless I disturbed them again. And I was almost sure my two shots the previous day had killed the panther. Even if they had not, the bees would have completed that work.

I was right. Lying a few paces inside, and curled into a ball, was the black panther, dead and quite stiff. Kush stayed a yard away from it, sniffing and growling. I put my hand over her mouth to quieten her for fear of disturbing those dreadful bees and bringing them down upon us once more.

Walking out of the cave, I beckoned to the men to come up to me. Together we hauled the panther down the slope. The herdsman, who carried a knife, then lopped off a branch to which we tied its feet with lengths of creepervine. All four of us then shouldered the load and carried it to the waiting car, where I slung the dead animal between bonnet and mudguard.

At the Denkanikotta forest bungalow I removed the skin. It was a male panther, of normal size, measuring six feet seven inches in length. The rosettes showed up distinctly under the black hairs that covered them. It was the first—and incidentally the only—black panther I have ever shot.

It was difficult to detect the bee-stings, embedded in the black hair, but I told the men to make a careful count of the barbs they extracted, which I personally checked. There were 273 stings in that animal, confirmed by the number of barbs extracted. There must have been many more that escaped our attention.

I rewarded the men for their services and returned to Bangalore well compensated for the punishment I had received from the bees—for I had a black panther skin, which is something very uncommon—and I had a wonderfully sagacious dog, Kush, whom I purchased from her owner for seven rupees.

There is one thing I nearly forgot to mention. You will remember that I had discovered two separate blood marks at the spot where the panther had stopped to drink in the Anekal Vanka stream. One of them had shown signs of greater bleeding than the other, and because I had fired only one shot I had wondered about it at the time. The reason was now quite clear. My one bullet, aimed between the eyes, had missed its mark, had furrowed past the temple and ear and embedded itself in the animal's groin. The second wound was the one that had bled severely. The first was only superficial. Evidently the body had been slightly twisted and crouched for the spring as I had fired that night, just in time.

Of the two shots fired in the cave, one (the first) had struck the panther in the chest, and the other, as the panther skidded towards me, had entered the open mouth and passed out at the back of the neck.

Five

Snakes and Other Jungle Creatures

MUCH HAS BEEN WRITTEN ABOUT THE ANIMALS OF THE INDIAN JUNGLE that is of great interest to people to whom any sort of animal and any forest form sources of secret attraction. Yeoman authors like Dunbar-Brander, Champion, Glasfurd, Best, Corbett and a host of others have blazed the trail and have recorded the habits of these animals as they personally experienced them. Some of them wrote a half-a-century ago, a time when, it must be remembered, the jungles of the Indian peninsula were literally alive with game, particularly carnivora. There writings were always appreciated, but it is only now that the real intrinsic value of their momentous works comes to the fore, and it will be safe to say that as the years roll by and the wild life of India becomes a thing of the past, the records of these great men will be of ever-increasing value, preserving for posterity knowledge that no riches could ever hope to buy.

It is a significant fact that the shikaris of India and even the great white hunters of Africa, who started their careers as trophy seekers or, in the latter case, as professionals, have during their lives invariably found an increasing love for the animals of the forests which they once hunted and killed. The great majority of them came to eschew the habit of killing in favour of the worthier but more difficult art of wild animal photography and the study of nature.

In the early years it was considered a rather hazardous undertaking to enter the jungle on a shooting trip. Apart from the dangers from the animals themselves which were deemed very great, there were the risks in the form of various poisonous snakes, scorpions, spiders and other creatures, and the threats to health in the jungle diseases such as malaria, black-water fever and so on.

For instance, in my father's day a journey to the forest at the foothills of the Nilgiri mountains, or to the jungles that clothed the districts of Shimoga and Kadur in Mysore state, or to the area around the Western Ghats, was considered a very risky undertaking. The mists that shroud these tracts in the early hours of the morning were regarded as a direct cause of bronchitis, pneumonia and particularly malaria. The jungle beasts were said to be most bold and terrifying.

The old writers have, on the contrary, shown us that the wild creatures were far from aggressive in their habits, and that almost without exception they were afraid of the human race. Science has since taught us that no poisonous spiders, lizards or frogs exist in India and only a few varieties of poisonous snake; also that bronchitis and pneumonia can be contracted anywhere, even in the hottest and driest cities of India. Sir Ronald Ross has shown that a particular species of mosquito carries the malaria parasite and not the damp mists and air of the forests. That parasite is found not only in jungles but throughout the length and breadth of the land. The malarial mosquito breeds in stagnant water and dirty drains, and such places abound even in the largest cities. Campaigns and measures by the authorities have done much to mitigate these evils, and medical science has produced rapid and almost certain cures for the complaints themselves, so that they no longer arouse the dread they once did.

As regards the dangers from wild animals and snakes, one's own experience has been and always will be the best teacher. But with a very few exceptions, and those in only particular places, it is safe and true to state that the dangers of a sojourn in the thickest of forests are far less than those run by a pedestrian when crossing any busy city street. The writers of the past have all shown this.

Of course a greenhorn to the game sometimes does something foolish that may involve him in trouble, but that trouble is entirely the outcome of his own inexperience and ignorance. Experience, particularly for him who is not only willing but anxious to learn, is easily acquired.

The tiger is acclaimed the king of the Indian jungles because the lion is not to be found anywhere except in the Gir Forest in the Gujarat peninsula, where it is very strictly protected. The tiger is a magnificent, beautiful and lordly animal, but it is the elephant who is in actual fact the real lord of the Indian forests by virtue of his great bulk, enormous strength and sometimes unpredictable temperament.

As a rule he is certainly a far more dangerous animal than the tiger, and aborigines living in areas where both these animals abound treat the tiger, with the exception of course of a man-eater, with contempt, while they have the greatest respect for the wild elephant. Walk along a jungle trail with any of these aboriginal tribesmen. Even should you be so lucky as to spot a tiger or panther, he will point it out to you with good-natured indifference. But should the sound of the breaking of a branch come to his ears, he will immediately halt in his tracks and say the one word in his vernacular which means 'elephant', judge the direction from which the sound came and endeavour to find a way that avoids passing anywhere near the locality in which the elephant is feeding.

This inherent caution is the outcome of the accumulated jungle experience of his forebears and himself. They and he have come to know the uncertain nature of these mighty beasts, and so they avoid taking any unnecessary risk.

As a matter of fact the wild elephant is in general a harmless creature, subject to moods and subject to sudden excitement, fright and irritation. To this generalisation there are four exceptions.

By strange contrast, and unlike African elephants, the greater the number in an Indian elephant herd the less the danger from its individual members. The four exceptions are: the accredited 'rogue' elephant that has already killed a human being, a 'musth' elephant in that periodical sexual state peculiar to the male of the species, occasionally a single male feeding apart from the herd, and a female accompanied by a young calf to protect which she will readily give her life. It is to be noticed that in each of these four cases the danger arises from a single animal and not from the herd. African elephants are reported to have the ability, when occasion demands, of acting collectively when they attempt to charge down upon a hunter en masse. The Indian elephant does not do this.

But in any of the four instances listed, the individual animal can be very dangerous and a creature of terrible destructiveness. It will pursue a human being inexorably, sometimes for as much as a mile, provided the man can keep going that far, till it can run him down. Then it will tear him literally limb from limb, or squash him to a pulp by stamping upon him and rubbing him into the ground with its feet, or beat him against the trunk of a tree or whatever happens to be handy, or toss him high into the air.

While sitting at a water hole deep in the forest I often amuse myself at the expense of the wild elephants that come there for their daily drink and wash-up, by calling like a tiger or imitating the sawing sound made by a panther. In the former instance, the elephants, if in a herd, usually trumpet shrilly and dash away to the accompaniment of much crashing of branches and underbrush. It is delightful to watch mothers with young babies practically carry their youngsters before them by supporting them under their bellies with their trunks, as they hurry away from the presence of that supposed tiger lurking somewhere in the bushes beside the water. Should an elephant have come alone, it invariably stands quite still when it hears the call, flaps his ears forwards to catch the sound and endeavours to scent the whereabouts of the enemy by 'feeling' the air with its trunk. Then it will turn around and slip silently into the jungle. An occasional elephant stamps its feet and tosses its head and trunk to and fro in anger, but within a minute, it too will disappear from the scene. I have not encountered a single elephant that stood its ground while I continued making the tiger-call. Obviously, despite their size and strength, they lack the nerve to remain in the presence of that dreaded feline. I have read somewhere that the elephant's eye has the property of magnifying the object it looks upon. Naturally this would make a tiger or a human being appear relatively larger to the elephant than they are in reality. Perhaps this is the real explanation of why elephants are afraid of tigers, panthers and human beings too.

Panther calls produce a somewhat different effect. If in a herd, the male elephants become aggressive and show signs of being prepared to defend the young. But a single elephant invariably makes off, although not nearly in such a hurry a when a 'tiger' calls. One or two have stamped the water of struck it with their trunks and then continued drinking. But it was clear they were decidedly nervous and uncomfortable.

These amusing little experiments of mine clearly indicate that elephants are far from courageous creatures, despite their great bulk and strength. On the contrary, they are decidedly nervous and timid. Perhaps I am safe in saying that, like all 'bullies', they will only take the fullest advantage of a situation in which their enemy shows signs of fearing them. But attack, apart from the four exceptions mentioned, particularly against anything that might retaliate, is not on the bill of behaviour of the average elephant.

Elephants appear to have an instinctive dislike for white objects. For this very reason milestones and furlong stones along roads in elephant-infested areas are painted black, for such objects, if white, would be immediately uprooted and flung away as soon as an elephant caught sight of them. For the same reason it would be unsafe to dress in white and roam in an elephant forest, for it would only invite attack. In years gone by white, solar topees were the vogue on the ground that, besides being sunproof, they kept the head of the wearer cool by reflecting the sun's rays. A gentleman of my acquaintance was once wandering in a jungle wearing such a white helmet. Why he wore it in the jungle I do not know, for apart from the aversion of elephants it would be very conspicuous and render hopeless any chance of successfully stalking living creatures. Anyhow, he wore it. He and his tracker, a Sholaga, were going along the ridge of a hill when they noticed an elephant about two hundred yards away, feeding on the other side of a clearing and a little higher up the hill. At the same moment the elephant saw them. Normally it would not have seen them at that distance, for elephants have extremely poor sight, and the breeze was blowing towards them, so that it could not have scented them. But that shining white helmet could not be missed against the green and brown background of the jungle. The elephant trumpeted and gave chase. The hunter and the Sholaga turned tail and fled. Fortunately the Sholaga was an experienced tracker, with years of recorded service and prestige in taking 'sahib log' into the jungle. He did not desert his protégé, but ran along behind him, telling him in which direction to run. The elephant gained on them rapidly. Then the Sholaga overtook the huntsman, snatched off his white hat and threw it to the ground, while urging the sahib to keep on running. The elephant reached the hat and lost interest in chasing them further. Needless to say, that nice piece of headgear also lost all semblance of shape by the time the elephant was through with it. He had not been interested in pursuing or harming them, but it had been too much to ask him to tolerate that dreadful white object. He just had to obliterate it.

Fights among male elephants have been known to go on, with but a few pauses for rest, for as long as three days. A fight may be occasioned by rival tuskers for the favours of a bulky lady, although such examples are few. More often it happens when driving a male elephant in musth out of the herd when his attentions to the ladies of the herd become too troublesome. Mostly it happens when a young bull, attaining the fitness that comes with the prime of his life, challenges the master bull of the herd for its leadership.

During such struggles, the bulls do great injury to each other by gouging with their tusks at any portion of the foe's anatomy that may offer itself. It goes without saying that during and after these fights the contestants are in the vilest of tempers and woe betide any living thing they may see.

There was an instance of a forester belonging to the Salem District Forestry Department who came upon a pair of bulls engaged in such a struggle in the fastnesses of the Dodda Halla valley of the Salem district. In that case a strange thing happened. The erstwhile contestants forgot their enmity and thundered down upon him together. He was a sorry mess when eventually his departmental colleagues came upon his remains some days later.

I have written about 'rogue' elephants in some of my earlier stories, so I won't add much about them here, beyond saying that they are the nastiest customers one could encounter in a jungle. Once having heard their trumpet-like screams of rage and hate, and seen their huge bodies bearing down upon you through bush and undergrowth, with trunk curled inwards, ears extended and short tail erect, you will remember the experience till your dying day. The degree of punishment they will inflict on a human being if they catch him varies. One rogue in the foothills of the Nilgiris tossed a forest guard high into the air. In falling, he became impaled on the broken end of a bamboo stem and eventually died. The rogue elephant of Segur, shot by the Reverend Bull, was a comparatively small animal, but was noted nevertheless for his sagacity and ferocity. He would literally stalk a human being or ambush him from behind a rock or clump of bamboos. He caught a coolie woman on the Segur road, stamped her flat, rubbed her remains into the ground with his feet and then playfully tore off the silver anklet she was wearing, as well as the string of wooden beads around her neck, both of which he threw some yards away. There was the case of a convalescent forester in the Coimbatore district who was suffering from guinea-worm. After long periods on sick leave, he eventually became so lazy that he would not —or more probably could not—work. He was transferred to the Biligirirangan Mountain Range, which is an area infested with elephants. It also harboured a rogue at that time, which had long been proclaimed as such but had never been shot. One day this man had the misfortune to meet the rogue. It chased him. In running he twisted an ankle while crossing a stream. The rogue caught up with him and tore him apart. It rampaged around his scattered remains for three days after that and would not permit any traffic to pass, before it had the grace to leave and allow his relatives to gather for cremation what remained. There was another rogue near Bailur in the same district which threw a bullock cart with its oxen off the road. It was killed by Mr Van Ingen, the famous taxidermist of Mysore.

It must be remembered that the incidents I have mentioned above were committed by rogue elephants and hence are unusual. The normal elephant, as I have tried to show, is a timid, retiring creature without any signs of boldness or bravery in its make-up.

For sheer, unsung grit, a wounded wild boar is the biggest-hearted animal in the Indian jungle. Within his comparatively small bulk, contrasted against the much larger animals, he packs more courage, more ferocity and determination, and above all more individual dash and stamina and thirst to kill than any animal I know. Wounded elephants, bison, and even tigers and panthers will invariably try to escape at first and only retaliate when cornered. But wound the old wild boar and just let him know where you are, and down he comes upon you. No lancer at Balaclava ever charged with more gallantry and determination than will 'porky' if you wound him and then reveal your position.

The tiger very closely follows the elephant as the most interesting animal in the jungles of India. I think he is fascinating. Except for the periodic man-eater which takes to killing and eating human-beings and becomes a terror within an area perhaps of some hundreds of square miles, the tiger otherwise well deserves the label of 'gentleman'.

Hunting him might very truly and justifiably be considered the king of all sports. Following him up when wounded is indeed a hazardous undertaking and calls for the best possible junglecraft on the part of the hunter. But to leave a wounded tiger in the jungle without attempting to finish him off is not only cruel, in that the wounded beast continues to suffer, but cowardly too, having regard to the poor folk who live in and near that area. For that very wound may be the point in his life that turns him into a man-eater. Moreover, he is a gallant opponent. He tries at first to avoid a conflict, but if followed and pressed too hard invariably turns and fights to the last.

A well-known military person of Bangalore, the Rev. Mr. Jervis, once followed a wounded tiger in Kumsi in the Shimoga district. It attacked him and practically chewed through his arm. His Indian car driver, who was also acting as his gun-bearer, but unfortunately knew nothing about using firearms, most pluckily drove the beast off his master while it was mauling him, by attacking it with the butt-end of the spare shotgun he was carrying. Very richly did he deserve, the reward he was given by the congregation of the church for this heroic act. The unfortunate padre was carried to the Kumsi travellers' bungalow, where the local doctor, with the best means available to him at that time, amputated the minister's arm, which was torn to shreds. The arm was later buried in the compound of the bungalow beneath a tree. A special carriage was attached to the next train running to Bangalore and the Rev. Mr. Jervis was sent back, though he died in the Bowring Hospital in Bangalore the next day and was duly buried with full military honours.

The panther does not approach the tiger in size, strength or grandeur. He can also be a very mean foe. I have said before that even man-eating panthers, despite their proclivity for human flesh, generally share the fear of the human species that is distinctive of the rest of their kind. They will rarely attack from the front, but will almost without exception creep upon their prey unawares from behind, as a rule favouring the hours of darkness for such an attack.

The average panther has a propensity for dog flesh which he appears to regard as a delicacy. There were a couple of panthers living on a small hillock crowned by a temple, hardly a mile out of Kollegal town in Coimbatore district. They made themselves a perfect nuisance to the American missionaries who lived not far from the foot of that hill, by eating up their dogs just as fast as the worthy missionaries could replace them. Eventually the panthers became so obnoxious that the local Sub-Inspector of Police, accompanied by some youths of the town, volunteered to get rid of them by smoking them out of the cave in which they lived. As a preliminary step, the grass in the area was fired. When that failed to expel the miscreants, lighted torches were thrown into the cave. This had the effect of bringing them out at the double, and in the fracas that ensued one panther was killed and some boys were hurt. The other got away after mauling one of the older members of the party. A missionary by the name of Buchanan went after it but was mauled, while the panther escaped.

'Bruin', the sloth bear of the south Indian jungles, is a short-sighted, bad-tempered animal; not brave by any means, but extremely excitable. He is generally a coward. Very recently a family party of three sloth bears—father, mother and rather a big junior—walked into a cave near Closepet in which a panther had already taken up his abode. The panther attacked the three bears. Junior fled on the spot. The two older bears tried to resist, but their courage turned to water before the razor-sharp claws of the infuriated panther, and they also fled. Not only that, but the he-bear was in such a hurry to get away that he did not look where he was going and rolled down a rock about a hundred feet high and broke both his forelegs. The villagers speared him to death the next morning.

Should he see or hear you coming the sloth bear will dash off at speed. If you meet him suddenly at a corner, he will attack without provocation—not impelled by bravery but by fright and a desire to get away from your presence. Possibly he thinks you may try to prevent him doing so, and to make sure that you do not he sets about mauling you. And he will do that very thoroughly, his objective being the eyes and face of the offending being, which he will invariably tear with his blunt four-inch talons. And he will make a better job of it by biting too. I have seen jungle-folk who had been attacked by bears: the wounds inflicted have been really ghastly, leaving the victims with disfigured faces for the rest of their lives.

Bruin often behaves like a clown when digging for roots or burrowing into the nests of white ants. The sounds he emits can resemble anything from a bagpipe being inflated to the droning of an aeroplane, from the buzzing of an angry wasp to the huffing of a blacksmith's bellows, the latter being a sort of background accompaniment to the buzzing and humming sounds. He will twist and contort his body into all shapes provided he can get at those tasty roots or at those most delectable and delicious termites. He is a heavy sleeper, often sleeping in the shallow holes he has dug in the ground, or between rocks, or in caves, or under shady trees and in grassy areas. He snores so audibly as to be clearly heard at a distance. When he is not snoring, an unsuspecting man may almost tread upon him before he awakens. That sudden awakening will almost certainly cause the startled bear to attack without a second thought.

The Sholagas of Coimbatore are very plucky in dealing with bears. They have been known to split open the skulls of many of these animals with their short, sharp axes. The bear rises upon its hind legs to reach for the face of its victim, thereby exposing its own head, face, throat and chest, and rendering it vulnerable to the sweeping stroke of an axe wielded by a powerful and determined man. The short, black woollen blanket, which a Sholaga generally carries wrapped around his left arm, serves as the only shield.

Although a vegetarian or insect-eater by nature, 'Bruin' is not averse to carrion. I have caught him several times robbing rotten meat from a tiger's or panther's kill.

One of the potential dangers of any jungle are the many varieties of reputedly poisonous snakes that are said to infest the forests. Actually the great majority of snake stories told to the visitor are grossly exaggerated. As a rule, snakes of all varieties are comparatively few in jungle districts and are not often encountered. They exist in much larger numbers in fields and near villages, the reason being that in such places grain is grown. Millions of field-rats live in holes in the ground to eat the grain. And the snakes eat the rats.

Furthermore, as far as humans are concerned, in the whole peninsula there are only five varieties of poisonous snakes capable of inflicting a lethal dose of venom. There are other species of poisonous snakes, too, but their bites would only cause a local swelling and some pain. The deadly varieties are the king cobra or hamadryad, the cobra, the Russell's viper, the saw-scaled viper or 'pursa', and the krait. The coral snake has a very poisonous bite, but its mouth is so tiny as to prevent it from getting a grip anywhere on a human being; apart from which, it has a very docile nature. The pit vipers are all poisonous, but a bite from them is never fatal except in very rare cases where the person bitten suffers from a weak heart and dies more from shock than the effects of poison. Most of the sea snakes are extremely deadly, some of them having venom as much as twelve times the strength of the cobra's; but of course they are only to be found in the sea.

Roughly speaking, the strengths of snake venoms and their consequent fatality, is as follows: a Russell's viper's poison is about twice as lethal as that of the saw-scaled viper; the cobra's poison three times as strong as that of the Russell's viper; and the krait almost twice as poisonous as the cobra. The king cobra's venom is not quite as strong as that of the ordinary cobra, bulk for bulk, but being a big snake, measuring sometimes fifteen feet and more in length, it makes up in quantity for this slight deficiency of strength, injecting about four times as much as is held in the glands of a cobra, so that a bite from this snake, which is incidentally about the largest poisonous snake in the world, causes death about three times as fast as an ordinary cobra's bite would do.

The hamadryad is found only in hilly regions in the midst of the evergreen forests where the rainfall is very heavy. It lives entirely in jungles and avoids human habitation as far as possible. Its food consists of other snakes, which makes it very difficult to keep in captivity. A specimen died in the Mysore Zoo recently after a full year of starvation, during which every effort was made to provide it with food in the form of various snakes of the nonpoisonous varieties, all of which it steadfastly refused to eat till eventually it died of starvation. Its death caused quite a controversy in the Press of Mysore, where some of the people of the city, on religious grounds, ventilated their strong disapproval of this cruel act on the part of the authorities at the zoo.

The hamadryad, as I have said, is a huge snake, generally of an olive-green colour, banded with white. In Burma and the Malayan region the male is said to be almost jet black, although the white bands still persist. The hood is not so well developed in proportion to the length of the snake as in the common cobra, and does not bear the well-known 'vee' mark. It is said to be very aggressive, attacking on sight, particularly the female of the species while guarding her eggs, which she lays in a nest prepared from fallen, mouldering leaves. However, this aggressiveness I have not experienced myself, although I twice met a hamadryad at very close quarters. The first time I was digging out tree ferns for my garden in Bangalore, while at the same time attempting to catch some rare fish with flaming-red tails that were swimming in a stream deep down in a valley of the Western Ghats, near a place called Agumbe. The fish, by the way, were for my aquarium at home. I saw what looked like the head of an iguana lizard peering at me from a thicket of ferns. I was wading in the bed of the stream at that moment and approached to have a closer look, when the hamadryad—and not an iguana as I had thought—reared up and towered quite six feet above me from its elevated position on the bank. The reptile was trembling with rage, and its black eyes glittered as it exhaled the air noisily from its body. I was not carrying even a stick, so I stood perfectly motionless. After some moments the trembling subsided, the inflated hood went down, the snake lowered itself and slithered across the stream not five feet away. Halfway across it halted, and regarded me again to see what I was going to do. I did nothing and I still did not move. Then it resumed its course and disappeared amongst the ferns on the other bank.

On the second occasion I was sitting behind a tree on a forest fire-line near Santaveri, on the Baba Budan hills, while a tiger-beat was in progress. Suddenly I heard a peculiar whistling sound from the jungle behind my back. It somewhat resembled the alarm signal made by a bull-bison, and accordingly I expected the bison to show up, when a hamadryad broke cover and crossed the fire-line quite close to me. In that case, however, I doubt if the snake even saw me as I did not move a muscle.

Most people to whom I have related these two incidents say that I saved my own life by not moving, and that had I done so the snakes would have attacked at once. Having never been attacked before by one of these big reptiles I cannot offer any opinion. However, there is no doubt that I was more lucky than the unfortunate German zoologist who came to Agumbe some years ago to catch a pair of hamadryads for a zoo. He caught the male first without trouble. A couple of days later he attempted to catch the female. She bit him. He died there in the jungle itself. In that instance the old proverb that 'the female of the species is more dangerous than the male' proved itself to be literally true. Against this I remember witnessing many years ago at Maymyo, in Burma, the performance put up by a wayside snake charmer. Incidentally she was a Burmese lady, and a very beautiful one at that, as I can still recollect. She took a hamadryad out of a basket and danced before it till it had extended itself some feet above the ground with hood inflated. Then she deliberately kissed it on the mouth. I examined the snake later. It had its poison glands and its fangs. But the hamadryad was a male I remember, and as I have said, she was a very lovely Burmese lady. Perhaps that was why she met with more chivalrous treatment than that unfortunate German scientist.

The ordinary Indian cobra is too well-known to require much description. Contrary to the stories told, it rarely exceeds six feet in length. There are two varieties in India, the first with the widely-publicised spectacle 'vee' mark, which is called the 'biocellate' variety, and the other with only a single white spot on its hood, ringed with black. This is known as the 'monocellate' variety. Here and there specimens are met with that have no mark at all, although their hoods are just as well developed.

Colouring is a very unreliable means of identifying cobras, as they are to be found in all varieties and shades from jet black to various kinds of brown and even reddish, whitish or greenish hues. Grey and brown are the most common colours. Even young cobras, when they are hatched and are just six inches long, are deadly venomous. They are also far more aggressive during the first two years of their lives. They mellow in temperament as they grow older, and very old specimens are not given to biting without extreme provocation. At this age they can be completely tamed while in full possession of their fangs and poison sacs.

Cobras lay quite soft-shelled eggs, about fifteen in number, each about the size of a pigeon's egg, in a shallow hole or among decaying leaves. To hatch these eggs successfully requires indirect heat from the sun together with considerable humidity. Without humidity they shrivel up.

The krait averages about three feet in length and is a slender black snake with white rings around its body. It is very swift in movement, but at the same time is very shy and nervous and generally dies in captivity within a day or two of being caught, for no apparent reason.

The king cobra, the cobra and the krait are known as 'colubrine' snakes, and their venom causes a collapse of the entire nerous system as a primary symptom. Each has two fixed fangs, the length of the normal cobra's being about a quarter of an inch, the hamadryad's about half an inch, and the krait's about one-eighth of an inch.

The 'viperine' snakes are the Russell's viper and the saw-scaled viper. They also have two fangs, one on each side. These lie flat against the back of the mouth when not in use, but can be erected and rotated about their base as an axis. The fangs of a big Russell's viper grow to a full inch and can pierce through a soft-leather boot, putties, pants or thick woollen stockings. A cobra's or krait's fangs, being 'fixed' and not rotatable, cannot do this. The Russell's viper itself is a stout snake growing to a little over five feet in length and possessing three rows of diamond-shaped markings running down its back (one to the centre and one on each side), joined together in chain-like fashion and of a rich dark brown. For this reason it is sometimes called the 'chain-viper'.

The saw-scaled viper hardly exceeds two feet in length and is a brown snake with white 'notch' markings across its back. Its distinctive feature is that it possesses rough keeled-back scales. When annoyed, it coils round and round against itself, the scales producing quite a loud rasping sound in the process. This gives it its Indian name of 'pursa', 'poorsa' or 'phoorsa', which is a phonetic rendering of the sound made by the rasping scales.

The 'colubrine' snakes have grooves down the backs of their fangs along which the venom trickles when ejected from the poison-sacs.

The 'viperine' snakes have channels down the centre of the fang itself, like the needle of a hypodermic syringe, for the passage of the poison. Naturally, because of this, the wearing of thick socks, putties, long trousers and soft boots is practically no obstruction to the bite of a viperine snake, although they may do so to that of a colubrine, for, being exposed, most of the venom will be absorbed by the material itself or dispersed against the leather of a boot. The longer, rotatable, hypodermic-like fangs of the two deadly vipers ensure that the unfortunate victim receives a lethal dose more or less intact, just as it is expelled from the venom glands. This is particularly so in the case of a Russell's viper, the tremendously long fangs of which will penetrate any normal material.

The chief effect of viperine venom is to cause haemorrhage, which gives the victim a good deal of pain.

Of course, it is impossible to name more than average periods of time for a bite by any one of these reptiles to prove fatal to a human being. The other factors involved are the age, health, constitution and physique of the victim; the size of the snake itself and whether it has bitten any other creature recently; and the amount of venom that has actually entered the victim's blood stream. The average time in which death normally occurs might be as follows:

In the case of the hamadryad, about ninety minutes; the krait, two to three hours; the cobra, four to six hours; the Russell's viper, twelve to thirty-six hours; and the saw-scaled viper, anything from three to seven days.

The nonpoisonous snakes of India are very many in number. Perhaps the most interesting is the python or rock-snake, which may measure up to eighteen feet in length, while the Malayan variety grows to thirty-five feet. It kills its victim by coiling around it and crushing it to death, after which it swallows the whole animal. The victims, of course, range in size from rats and rabbits to pigs and small deer, according to the size and capacity of the snake itself. During the Burma campaign against the Japanese an account was given of the shooting of a 'reticulated python'—which is the name given to the Malayan species which is also to be found in Burma—over forty feet in length. In its death-throes it vomited the body of a Jap soldier it had swallowed, complete with helmet. I do not vouch for the truth of this story, although it appeared in the Press. The idea that a python covers its victim with slime before swallowing it is quite erroneous. Its jaws, like those of all snakes, are not hinged together, but are quite separate units. The outer skin being very elastic, it is easy to see that a snake can swallow creatures several times the size of its head and girth.

Other nonpoisonous snakes include many varieties of ground snakes; several species of very slender whip-like and fast-moving tree snakes; stout, lethargic worm-like sand snakes; and a large number of fresh-water snakes. One of the sand snakes possesses a blunt tail which looks like a second head, so much so that it is still widely believed that this reptile has two heads, one at either end.

I have always been fascinated by snakes, and for no other apparent reason I formed the habit of keeping them as pets at the age of eight years. As a result, I was considered quite frightful among the girls and something of a terror at school. I know I got quite a kick out of releasing reptiles in cinemas, in Sunday school and even in Church. The name of 'snake-charmer Anderson' still clings to me to this day, in my forty-eighth year.

Snake venom has many medicinal uses, and I am certain is a still unknown remedy for many ailments and conditions. The fact is that this field has not yet been thoroughly investigated and exploited owing to the danger consequent upon experimenting on a human being with these venoms. Viperine poison in small diluted doses and in accordance with the laws of homoeopathy, where the small dose of a particular poison is known to counteract a large dose of that same poison has been proved of, sterling value for the very condition of haemorrhage which it produces when a large or lethal dose is administered. This venom is used by dentists and others to stop excessive bleeding after a tooth extraction or minor operation.
